Othello stands with Hamlet, King Lear, and Macbeth as one of Shakespeare's great tragedies. The play created a high concentration of emotion and has its share of violence. Othello a middle-aged general, a Moor in the service of Venice, becomes so incensed with jealousy through the trickery of the sinister Iago, that he kills his young and innocent wife, Desdemona. Iago, angered at not being chosen as Othello's lieutenant, plots revenge on Othello and his lieutenant Michael Cassio. Iago, pretending to be loyal, convinces Othello that Desdemona has committed adultery with Cassio.

Time Winters gives a commanding rendition of Iago, one of the most coveted roles in all Shakespeare. Ray Aranha as Othello powerfully portrays the disintegratation of a noble and confident leader into a trembling, pathetic dupe. Aranha has a rich voice and his vivid facial expressions produce several passionate moments.

Greg Patnaude gives a strong performance as Cassio, and Nancy Siddons-Daniels is an appealing Desdemona. Robert Putnam plays a lively Roderigo, Iago's fall guy; Julia Brothers is solid as Iago's wife, Emilia; and Neave Rake is colorful as Bianca, Cassio's mistress.

The lesser characters are not developed as it was Shakespeare's intention to focus on Iago, Desdemona, and Othello. One of the three is almost always on stage and the viewer is ever conscious of the tensions involved: the intrigues of Iago, the illusion of Desdemona's adultery and Othello's vacillating perceptions of what is really happening. If the first half becomes more lively, this could be a first rate production.

UVM Moves to Rutland!!

BY BABA SNELLING

Come quit their barren lands
And leave them on their hands
'Twill make you great amends
to Rutland go.

Thomas Rowley

Irate UVM President Lattie Coor announced today that the University of Vermont will open its doors in Rutland this fall. "I'm sick of living in Burlington," Coor said. "And this town has been living fat off the University for far too long. I want to go to Rutland where we'll be appreciated."

Coor was optimistic that the University would take shape on the present Rutland County Fairgrounds. "UVM students like the outdoors, so they can sleep in tents for a few years until dorms are built. I anticipate no housing shortage."

"This move will save the University and the state of Vermont millions each year. We won't have to bribe the Medical Center Hospital to take care of the Bishop's House, and we won't be operating those expensive Frats and Sororities."

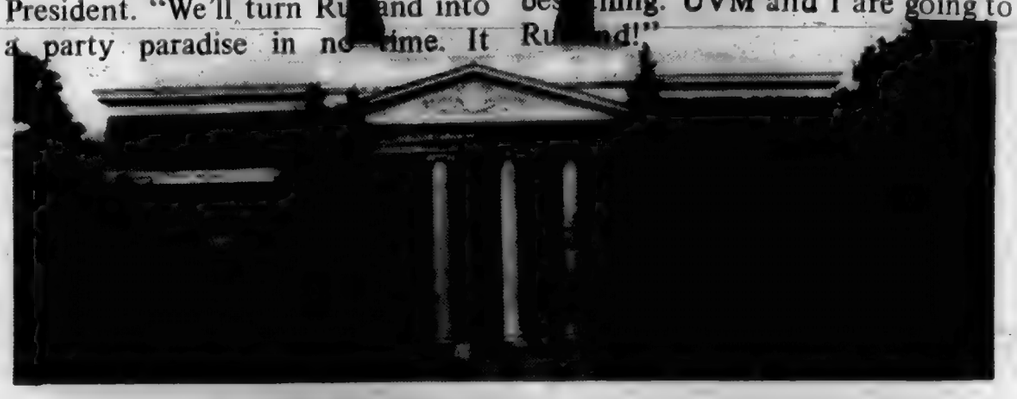
For the first year in Rutland, Coor will stay in the home of portly Rutland Mayor Gilbert Bodnick. "We all have to make sacrifices," Coor explained. "But the advantages are obvious: 1) the climate in Rutland is better than Burlington (by 2 degrees a year); 2) there are more bars per square foot; 3) the ski slopes are half an hour closer."

Coor also mentioned that Rutland does not have a Pyramid Mall threat. "If Pyramid were built, the UVM students would spend all day shopping and would have no money to buy alcohol or bribe professors."

Burlington Mayor Gordon Paquette could not be reached for comment, but sources close to the Mayor reported that he was overjoyed.

"After nearly 200 years of student-town friction, those bums on the hill finally got the message. UVM can move to New Jersey," one source spouted. "Now we won't have these wild orgies, drugs, drugs, drugs, rapes, traffic congestion, and crowds on Church St. all day Saturday. A few merchants may go out of business, but so what? As long as we get rid of those long haired faggots, their prissy, horny girl friends, and those perverted professors, I think we're doing Burlington a great service!"

No immediate plans were announced for the remaining UVM buildings, but two rumors have been circulating: (1) sell them to the Burlington Slumlord's Association; (2) turn the dorms into a topflight nudist colony (i.e. no real change).



"I don't care what happens to those buildings," croaked one local alderman. "So long as they start paying property taxes, and let me take a whirlpool bath in the gym."

And what of student reaction on the Rutland move?

"I think it's great!" smiled Jake Orf, UVM Student Association President. "We'll turn Rutland into a party paradise in no time. It means I'm that much closer to my cocaine connection in New York, and I hear the town girls are real easy!"

Sally Cumquat, head of Tri-Delt sorority, was less optimistic. "I don't want to freeze my butt this winter! Rutland compared to Burlington is like Genesee compared to LSD! Besides, I'm a psychology major and there are plenty of weird people in Chittenden County. (Not to mention that I'm having an affair with a local bank president!)

Coor closed off his press statement by saying, "The Vermont Legislature screwed my University last session, they told me I could go to Hell. Well, I'm gonna do the next best thing: UVM and I are going to Rutland!"

Clones Make Better Lovers

BY JOHN SMITH

Everyone today claims to be able to "do it better," but the truth is they can't.

"The only way to improve sexual performance is to make yourself over: get cloned!" says Dr. Duro Cell of Middlebury College.

Dr. Cell reports that male clones last an average of five hours longer, "enough to satisfy the most frigid female" — and female clones are very loving and supportive. Clones tend to be much less aggressive than their originals: male clones do not beat females, and female clones do not bark orders in bed.

The big advantage of a clone-lover is that they cannot reproduce so no birth control precautions are necessary. Clone-lovers are also very popular among homosexuals and narcissists (Go F— yourself!)

Dr. Cell offered one word of caution: "Never let a clone couple sleep together, the bio-rhythm feedback will short-circuit their brains!"

The cloning process is relativelv inexpensive depending on where you go. A doctor will charge about $50, while Woolworth's has a $22.95 special which takes only five minutes.

According to Dr. Cell, clones have been around since history began, and there may be as many as a billion clones on the earth today! Proof? Whites, blacks, and yellows all say of one another, "They all look the same to me!"

Dr. Cell also gave a preview of his latest book, "Clones I Have Known," including such luminaries as Henry Kissinger (how else can he be in two places at once), Cheryl Tiegs (what a pair!), the Smothers Brothers, Ted Kennedy, and, of course, Lee Majors.

Moons Mob Montpelier

BY HENRY HUDSON

It was supposed to be the First Annual "Moonlight in Vermont Contest" — just innocent boys and girls pulling down their pants and exposing their bare behinds. But before the contest was through, the State House lawn witnessed one of the strangest demonstrations in Vermont history.

It all started when the third contestant in the women's division, Fanny Abare, was showing off her luminous twin lumps. There was a sudden loud crash and in marched the followers of Rev. Sun Myung Moon, protesting that "Moonies" were being discriminated against.

As a gesture of conciliation, the Moonies are offering jars of soothing vasoline to bruised and battered Mooners. Upon hearing of the offer, one Mooner winced, "Amen-er-A Moon to that!"

Later, one Moonie commented that "Mooning" in humans involved two buttocks ("These things travel in pairs") whereas the Unification Church believes in oneness. "There is only one big Moon and that's our founder and spiritual guide, Sun Myung Moon."

One contest judge tried to explain the difference between "Mooning" and "Moonies," but to no avail. In no time, creamy cans became black and blue beaten buttocks. Police were called in and the Unification Churchers fled.

Partially Decomposed Student Found in Fridge

BURLINGTON — A bizarre disclosure has rocked the normally placid and serene University of Vermont campus. A partially decomposed coed was found in a closed refrigerator on the third floor of Terrill Hall on the University of Vermont campus.

The body of Lucinda B. Provendor, 19, of North Tonowanda, N.Y., was discovered by Ben K. Miller, the University supervisor of inventory, as he made his usual summer rounds surveying the University's equipment. Terrill Hall is the home of the UVM's Home Economics department.

According to a spokesperson for the University's Public Relations Office, the incident is both tragic and isolated; "that whole cramming into refrigerators fad passed by years ago."

It is true that students used to jam themselves in massive numbers into telephone booths and the like, but no one was ever heard to attempt a solo effort.

Ms. Provendor was a sophomore Home Economics major. According to a secretary in the office of Home Economics' director Raymond Cowles, Provendor was last seen in her Basic Fundamentals of Nutrition class. The class had been preparing souffles in laboratory. The same laboratory where the coed was found in the refrigerator.

A spokesperson for UVM Security was puzzled as to how the young woman could have gotten in the refrigerator.

The only other contents of the refrigerator was a half-baked souffle and a box of baking soda, which masked the odor and probably was the reason that the body was not discovered for such a long time.

A fellow classmate of Provendor's who did not wish to be identified, told the Vermont Enquirer that Provendor was not well-liked and "couldn't cook for shit."

Provendor lived on UVM campus in the Simpson Hall. When the Vermont Enquirer went to her room on the fourth floor they found over $56 worth of unreturned bottles. Her nextdoor neighbor in Simpson, Marylou Fennel, when contacted at her summer residence on Cape Cod, was not surprised to hear of Provendor's death. "She was weird. I have nothing more to say, just plain weird. You know she wore the same clothes everyday, just a pair of blue jeans and a Hoss Cartwright t-shirt."

Ms. Provendor's body was discovered in the above outfit. Police report no sign of sexual abuse.

Ms. Fennel elaborated "Who is going to touch a 180 lb. girl with eczema?"

Due to the Buckley amendment, University officials were loathed to say anything about the deceased student.

LSD Fights Tooth Decay

The mind expanding drug LSD has been found to be a decay preventive dentifrice when used in a conscientiously applied program of oral hygiene and regular professional care.

The only drawback is that teeth turn every color of the rainbow and begin making music which can keep you awake at night. The "acid" toothpaste should be used only once a week, and use should be discontinued if brains begin to drobl out the ears.

Aliens Walk on the Face of Earth

Clem Phillips, a 33 year old brick layer from Farnsworth, Nebraska, and his wife, Edna, claim they saw a bonafide unidentified flying object (UFO) land in the A&P parking lot Sunday, July 30.

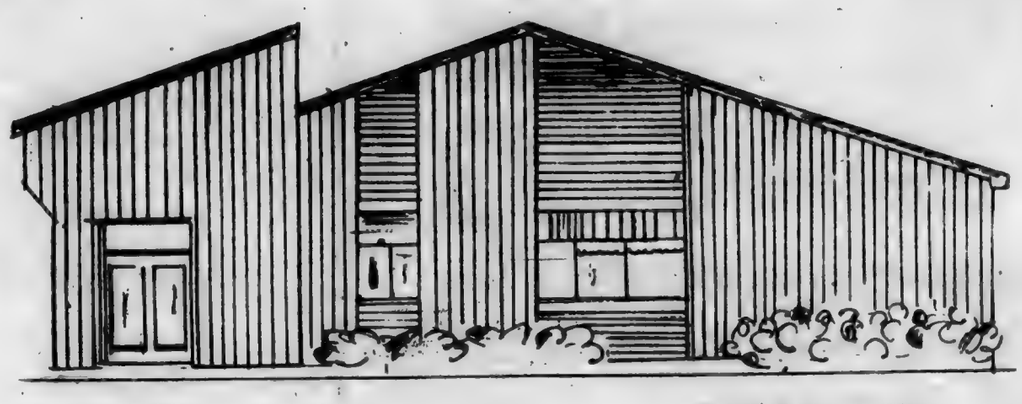
"It was nothing like we'd ever seen before," said Clem. Although Edna was trembling and in tears throughout the Enquirer interview, she did say "it was nothing like we'd ever seen before."

The two say they saw a large frisbee shaped object the size of three dump trucks land in the parking lot. "There was lots of sparks and stuff, all over, and God what a light from that thing," said Clem. "We thought Jesus was finally come to save us." "My, there was lots of sparks and stuff all over, and..." said Edna. "Shut up," said Clem.

Afterwards, according to Clem, "Four things got out that looked as if they crossed a steer and a chicken. They were surrounded with an eerie orange glow." Then, they all walked over to the A&P. "Looked as if they were going shopping," said Edna.

One of them then slapped the other in the face, "if that's what ya call it," said Clem. The others turned and "sort of floated" over to the others. Then, a fight began. "Jumpin' Jesus," said Clem. "You'd think they was trying to kill each other." They finally stopped fighting two hours later. Then, the really weird thing happened.

"Yup, one of 'em walked over to a tree and took a piss right there," said Clem.



Clem and Edna then ran back to their homes and within minutes, the local and state police arrived on the scene and cordoned off the area. "The lieutenant looked just like Telly Savalas," said Edna. "Shut up, Edna."

The Enquirer has learned the urine sample was lifted off the pavement by NASA space officials, however, NASA declines comment on the matter. The Enquirer has also learned that NASA feels the extraterrestrial urine could be a link in some evolutionary chain.

Be that as it may, the Phillips' lives have changed a great deal. For example, Clem and Edna were guests of honor at the opening of "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" and "Star Wars." The mayor of Farnsworth, E. Lef Laibey, explained to the Enquirer, "well, hell, Clem and Edna know these guys, why shouldn't they be guests of honor?"

Needless to say, Clem and Edna are overjoyed at the notoriety they've received. "It is," they claim, "an experience we'll never forget." Clem and Edna want all Enquirer readers to know that out of space visitors are not all that bad. In fact, they've started an Enquirer "I'm a space visitor meeter club." Write to Clem and Edna in Farnsworth for more info. Include your $25 registration fee.

Pyramid Mall Wins Approval

WILLISTON — Officials for the New York-based Pyramid Mall Co. cracked open a case of Dom Perignon champagne today to celebrate the final approval for construction of an 82-store shopping mall in Williston.

The District 4 Environmental Commission granted Pyramid an Act 250 land-use permit despite speculation that it wouldn't because of questions raised concerning air and water pollution problems. The three-member panel thus ended nearly a year of hearings which assessed the legality of such a construction project by viewing it through the ten requirements as outlined in Act 250.

Pyramid official Gary Roger, toting a magnum of the 1969 French champagne shortly after the decision, approached the panel's chairman, Duncan Brown, and emptied the bottle's contents onto Brown's head, exclaiming, "We never could have done it without you, Rogg, ol' buddy!" Roger then handed Brown what appeared to be an airline ticket and a brown manila envelope.

The apparent joy which was in evidence at Williston's Central School, site of many — and the final — hearings, was not in abundance in other parts of the county.

In Burlington, Mayor Gordon Paquette was said to have launched a model of the proposed Church Street Mall off of the roof of City Hall smashing it into tiny pieces all over Church Street. Officials for the Mondev Corp. were seen carrying gasoline cans into their underground mall, also on Church Street, as an apparent effort to collect the insurance money they would receive should a fire break out in the Burlington Square Mall.

Rumours swept the streets around Taft's Corners, the hub of Williston, that Pyramid officials had bribed key political figures in the state to facilitate their efforts in seeking approval. A number of those officials who allegedly received payoffs could not be reached for comment as they were all attending a political convention in the West Indies.

The other officials the Enquirer tried to contact were either in conference, on vacation, on another line, at lunch, too busy, or simply not available, according to their secretaries. One Enquirer reporter, when he tried to attend a meeting of the Williston selectmen, was knocked unconscious as he entered the Town Hall and awoke later on sprawled out on the Hall's parking lot.

In Washington, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., backed down from his proposal that Pyramid construct a mall in Burlington rather than in Williston and said he would have to evaluate the Environmental Commission's decision, refusing any further comment. Leahy then boarded a Pan Am jet after his brief news conference which was held at a Washington D.C. airport.

Burlington Crimelights Cause Cancer

BY GORDON AILES

Those orange glowing sodium lights of downtown Burlington cause a rare form of skin cancer, a recent study by two University of Vermont physicians has found. Dr. L. X. Ray and Dr. Ray Diation reported that Burlington has more than its fair share of mutants and pointed to the bright lights as the culprit.

"The sodium lights have the same effect as a micro-wave oven," Dr. Ray explained. "The molecules of flesh are disrupted and change color, sex, and religion."

"I would caution anyone going Downtown after sunset," Dr. Ray added. "Youngsters will stunt their growth and adults will grow lumps. Housewives are extremely susceptible to the lights."

Is there a cure? "Just one," Dr. Diation said. "Alcohol."

"We like to live dangerously in this town," one alderman said. "Either we get crime or cancer, but not both. Take your pick."

Baba Says, "The thing that really turns me on about Lattie is his ability to cry."

"I just adore him," said Baba A. Snelling, "he's such a leader, such a tower of strength, such a president of UV.t."

Baba spoke to Enquirer reporter Ink Sipton in an exclusive interview last week. Ink picked up on rumors that Lattie and Baba had been seen carousing around town in Lattie's luxurious option-loaded Honda CVCC. Ink spotted the secretly love birds in the Windsor lounge, closer than this — holding hands and guzzling Schaefer's cheek to cheek.

"Lattie is such a powerful man. Just think — his policies and academic decisions affect the fate of over 8,000 young adults before they enter the job market."

Ink asked Baba what she found physically attractive about Lattie. "Oh, it's the way he moves his mouth when he talks. He always opens it much too wide for what comes out of it. I just love that. Also his shoes, they are so stimulating. Just thinking of those presidential toes inside those shoes, oh, I can't describe the feeling I get." At this point Baba took a long drink from the bottle of room-temperature Schaefer in front of her. Baba just loves a nice bottle of warm Schaefer after a long day.

"The thing that really turns me on about Lattie is his ability to cry," said Baba. She told the Enquirer she loves all men with power, like her husband, but that Lattie is special because he "has another side, a human side more compassionate than anyone else. I remember when he came over to my place after Senator Clark came to speak on Africa. A student, obviously one of the ones Lattie's policies and philosophies on life didn't reach, a low life anyway, had asked him about UVM endowment money in South Africa during the question and answer period. Well, Lattie broke right down and cried in my arms. I was never so touched. He told me it was the first time he'd ever been caught off guard by an inferior, you know. And he said he'd learned new respect for students. He was amazed at the guts the kid had to stand up and ask him, Lattie Coor, president of the University of Vermont, a question so controversial. Then he cried again. Oh, I was never so touched."

Baba said she has no plans to marry Lattie, for the simple reason that her present husband, Governor Richest Snelling, was more powerful than Lattie. "Why give up all that power and money for a little compassion from a Kansas boy?" Baba told the Enquirer.

As for his part in the situation Lattie has little to say. He told the Enquirer any rumors of an affair between Baba and himself "were just not in the ball park." He said he respects the Governor and his wife and "would not in any way want to tamper with the delicate political relationship he and the Governor had by taking his wife out on the lam."

But Enquirer photos have shown Lattie and Baba at the Windsor more than once. "More than six times in the last seven weeks I've seen Lattie and Baba waltzing into the Windsor on a Saturday night to enjoy a few warm Schaefers, and each other's company. And I mean close company. They sit on opposite sides of the table, but I can tell by the look on their faces that their knees are touching," said Enquirer photographer F. Horse Blatt.

"Pot Made Me Pregnant!"

"When the doctor told me I was going to have a baby, I didn't believe it. I hadn't slept with a man in a year," says Miss Martha Mooper of East Corinth, Vermont.

"The only thing that could have done it was the marijuana I lived on to get me through the winter. I smoked it, ate it in salads, made marijuana tea, sniffed it, and shot it into my jugular vein. Why I should have known that weed-with-roots-in-Hell would do me in!"

Miss Mooper mentioned the possibility of an abortion but said she would have to sell a few pounds of reefer to raise the money. But Miss Mooper said she would call the baby Mary Jane if a girl and Boris if a boy.

Boris? "That's right," Martha said. "If I got pregnant from pot it had to be a Communist plot."

Johnny No-Mind and the Brain Dead Band Roll Into Town

"Neat, keen, and an American teen's dream," is the way Rolling Stone characterized punk phenom Johnny NoMind and the Brain Dead Band. Rock idol NoMind and the BDB will wind up their current white-hot North American tour with their long awaited appearance at Burlington's Memorial Hall on September 31.

Johnny NoMind, leader and spiritual advisor of Brain Dead, first achieved national and international notoriety when he decided to transcend his traditional punk trappings and had his entire head surgically removed to coincide with the release of their first single, "Three Bricks Shy of a Load."

Although it was considered a medical impossibility for a human being to survive without a cranium, NoMind brushed aside warnings from the medical profession as well as criticism from the press who accused him of sensationalism. "Who needs a noggin when you got Rock and Roll?" NoMind countered.

Then, in the most generous and selfless gesture the music world has seen since Elton John donated his Pinball Wizard shoes to the Rock and Roll Museum in Cranston, R.I., NoMind presented his head to the people of Burlington, Vt.

"It was the least I could do for all the boffo folks in Burlap," Johnny said, choking back a tear. "I mean... living in this town must be tough, tough, tough, tough, tough."

According to Mayor Paquette, the City of Burlington was "pleased shitless" with the gift. Plans are underway for the construction of an all-weather glass enclosure in Battery Park to house the priceless trophy. The display case will include a revolving pedestal with NoMind's noodle singing the Brain Dead best in quad while synched with an assortment of Day-Glo strobes.

"This is really going to be a fab tourist attraction," the Mayor said. "It may be enough of a shot in the arm for the downtown area that we can dump that crappy Civic Center idea."

If crowd reactions during the rest of the tour are any indication, Burlington could be in for a high old time Friday night.

While Rolling Stones, Zeppelin, and Who fans are content to throw firecrackers, frisbees, hats and shoes on stage, Brain Dead fanatics aren't happy until they see some heads roll.

Several survivors of a frenzied self-decapitation session during a Brain Dead concert in East Jesis, South Dakota are reportedly in sound condition and enjoying their scalpless state.

"Hell," one survivor quipped, "I haven't felt this good since I started smoking pot."

So if it's a good time you're after, get out and get down at Memorial on September 31.

And remember: "Dead Heads, NO. Brain Dead, YES."

THROWING UP!

If you're tired of eating in "ordinary" restaurants (none, of course, are featured in "Spotlight"), then your tastebuds will be scintillated by the coruscating culinary delights at Burgerrhea. The newly opened Four Season (heated in winter and air conditioned in summer) Inn is a striking blend of gothic and modern American design nestled in rustic Williston at the mall.

Innovation and imagination are the keyword for both decor and fare at the inn. One might believe that the great American Master, Norman Rockwell, dined here and was inspired to paint the cheeseburger and fish fillet murals that adorn each intimate wood grain plastic booth. Classical dentist office music, flush toilets with padded seats, and woodsy rhubarb scented toilet tissue are other features designed for the most in atmosphere. Furnished in the tradition of the Black Cat and Durf'n Burf, the inn will no doubt attract the intelligentsia of Burlington's gourmet population.

The menu offers sumptuous entrees from 48 cents to $1.49. Each is delicately prepared by trained chefs at least two hours before it reaches your table, and served by waiters elegantly dressed in burnt orange hotpants with fuchsia tops. The wine list features wines not found in any other Burlington restaurant — included are Ripple, 1986; Bali-Hi 1981; and North Avenue Liebfraumilch 1978.

From a long list of house specialties, we chose three dishes. The vegetarian special was a superb dill wrapped in a hot dog roll with mustard and tomato catsup. The fish dinner included deep fried Vermont style carp and sucker fillets covered in Winooski River Sauce. The Big Rrhea boasted two fillets of top ground chuck within a sesame seed roll, topped with importea whey. All three were well prepared and the portions were more than adequate. Also, Doggie Bags (similar to those found on airlines) were provided gratis to all who ordered dessert. If you've never been to Burgerrhea, it would be an excellent opportunity to sample Burlington's finest food.

Why I Love Burlington
(A continuing series of patriotic proclamations by lifelong Burlington residents)

"From the sodium street lights, hey do you know we have sodium streetlights? Yeah, not the regular kind, I'm talking sodium. Rather than the bright, drab white glow you see when you come into New York City, Burlington gives off an orange glow. It's just beautiful, you know beautiful, like everything in this city. Sodium lights don't cause cancer either, and the cops say crime is down over 20 percent with the lights. They're wonderful. When you come out of the bars at night, they're easy on your eyes too. Drunks around here say they can see better in the morning and all of 'em say it's because of the sodium lights."

"Hey, we got 51 bars. Now, chew on that a while. Fifty one of the most beautiful bars in the world. There's absolutely nothing wrong with the insides, the people of, or the drinks they serve at any of them neither. I love Burlington. Take Finbar's, for example. Beautiful fans on the roof give it that 1930's look. Gorgeous, you know. And the drinks and food they serve, delicious. Cuisine extraordinaire, non? I know a little French. Oh, the Canadians that come down here are all great people, not a rotten apple in all of them. Just good people. Hell, there's no other kind in Burlington.

"Well, down the street from Finbar's is All-American there. Talk about great food, you know what I mean. Biggest subs with the most meat, choice meat too, and friendliest service you ever saw. Love it. Love Burlington. Then, oh the Flynn. Now that's a theatre. It seats over 1,000 people. Some say it's a firetrap, but they have to be from out of town. Just a rustic, basically unretouched theatre. Gorgeous. Have plays and concerts there, too. I'm talkin' plays and concerts. Never a bad one at the Flynn. You know why everything, even the movies they show are always great? Cause it's the Flynn in Burlington, yeah.

Back to my original point, yeah, 51 bars, and every one of them is great. You can go rock your socks off at Neutral Grounds to the best bands every night. And they serve those yards of beer. What a way to wet your whistle. Three or four of those, each of them has four beers in it, and you're ready to go. Where? Probably to the Chickenbone. Smal. comfortable, best prices in Burlington. Specials every night! Free chili on Fridays. Can you believe that! Only in Burlington. Only great things like that could happen in this unblemished city. I could go on for days about this, but I know you probably have a deadline, so I'll close with these final statements:

Burlington is great,
It can't be beat.
Whether you are sober
Or blasted off your feet.
People are friendly,
Love a good time,
Never a bad word.
And they can always spare a dime.
Yeah, Burlington

Good-bye "Electro-big-sound"

The "Electro-Big-Sound" brands may be found in just about any kind of store. They are easy to spot because the speakers are usually as big as a house, and the control panel looks like the cockpit of a modern jet aircraft.

The next time you see one, listen to it, really listen to it. After a few minutes the bass starts sounding like someone is hitting the side of a rubber boat with an oar (Thud! Thud! Thud!). The highs sound like a tray of silverware dropped onto a floor (crash), tinkle, tinkle). If a vocal sounds like the singer is singing in a bucket, or through a megaphone, don't be surprised. (If you can't hear any of those things you might consider having your hearing checked).

We could go on for hours talking about how the turntable plays a $7 record like a diamond cutter cuts glass . . . so we won't. Instead, we'd like to offer you an alternative to those "Electro-Big-Sound" brands that don't sound that bad . . . they just don't sound that good either. Good-Bye "Electro-Big-Sound" . . .

Hello System $329

System $329 is "An amazing blend of Hi-Fi components at a "Compact price." Just $14.85 a month with $32.00 down.*

The BSR 2260 turntable is fully automatic and equipped with a diamond stylus. You can stack up to 5 records and it will play all of those records and shut off automatically.

The control center of system $329 is the JVC JR 61W stereo receiver. It offers more than any "Electro-Big-Sound" compact could, like 15 watts each channel, and FM sensitivity of 1.8 uV to bring in those distant FM stations clearly.

The Advent 3 speakers of system $329 are not as big as a house, in fact, they are "compact." The Advent 3's bring you all of the music. The bass notes are solidly robust, and teh highs are crisp and precise, never shrill or harsh. And a singer sounds as though they are singing in your living room.

Why should you spend your hard-earned money for Electro-Big-Sound when you can afford exceptional sound from System $329.

Clones Have More Fun

INTERCOURSE, Pa (AP) – Scientists have discovered a small group of look-alikes in this Amish Pennsylvania town and are amazed by the fact that the group members are oblivious to all national and world affairs – and love every minute of it.

The group of exactly 12 males and 12 females is apparently the result of experiments by famed clone researcher Dr. William B. Williams.

Williams said he has been secretly working with his 24 clones over the past 20 years, adding, "Since they all come from test tubes, they don't have any worries about birth control."

"Resultingly, they spend most of their time having sex – they don't know who Jimmy Carter is and couldn't care less. But they sure think the world of Linda Lovelace," Williams said.

Study Shows Students Can Read, Write

BY JOHN CAMPBELL
Gannett News Service

WASHINGTON – A landmark study just completed by more than 20 top government researchers shows that 90 percent of all U.S. college students who received diplomas this year can identify correctly the words "Dog" and "Cat" out of a list of more than 100 other words.

In addition, the same study determined that 86 percent of the college graduates tested were able to write letters home to their parents.

With growing concern over the deterioration of higher education, President Carter commissioned the researchers to engage in the study last year, and appropriated $12.4 million for the scientists to work with.

Joseph Califano, secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, said of the study: "We now know that the value of our university system has improved vastly over the past 50 years. The test scores of all the students are so high that it's a wonder there's any problem with education at all in this country."

The college graduates were given two tests. The first had a list of 100 words ranging in difficulty from "Go" to "Automobile." The students were then asked to circle the words "Dog" and "Cat" after they had been read by a researcher monitoring the test.

In the second test, the graduates were asked to write a brief essay in the form of a letter home entitled "What I did over my summer vacation." A vast majority of the students who completed the test had fewer than 12 spelling errors and less than three non-grammatical sentences.

Researcher David Berkowitz called the results "astounding! I didn't realize the 1978 graduating class was this smart!"

The study took about 10 months to devise, a spokesman said. Once the test forms had been printed up, random sampling of college graduates from colleges across the country, including Harvard, MIT and Stanford, were chosen and assembled in different cities. The test scores were made available yesterday.

One MIT student who took the test said, "I had quite a bit of trouble with the first part – there were so many words in the list. The second part was simple, though. I write my parents every week."

Another student, this one from Stanford, said, "I thought the test was going to be stupid, so I didn't study for it – but I lucked out because I read "Dick and Jane" last weekend. I'll never underestimate government researchers again."

Essex Third Graders Seize Administration Building

BY SCOTT McKEE
Free Joke Staff Writer

ESSEX TOWN – Rioting elementary school students took control Wednesday of the principal's office at the Essex Middle School, and held ten secretaries hostage who they said wouldn't be released until their demands were met.

Apparently angered over the vacation and cafeteria policies of the Middle School's administration, and armed with water pistols, frisbees and dart guns, more than 30 third-graders stormed the school's administrative offices shortly after noon and demanded that

About two hours after this unfolding drama began, the leader of the terrorists, Jimmy "Butch" Berster, yelled through a megaphone to police the demands of the students.

The first of the demands, Berster said in his squeaky voice, was that the school stop serving creamed chipped beef as the main course every Wednesday. In line with this demand, he said the students want more machines that dispense "junk food" so students can bypass the cafeteria all together at lunch if they don't like the main course.

"We're in the process of covering them from all sides. We're specially trained to counter terrorist activities, but our main job is to make sure that no one gets hurt. This is going to be a tricky situation, though. Third graders can be unpredictable as hell."

Town officials were unable to remember if anything like this had ever happened before in the town's history.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A bizarre combination suicide-murder has authorities here baffled as the city's chief medical examiner has announced that a woman was allegedly murdered by her husband — five minutes after her husband had died from a self-inflicted hanging.

Details at presstime were sketchy, but Chief Medical Examiner Dr. Boris Kowalski said, "It appears what we have here is unexplainable in modern medicine as we know it. We have an apparent suicide — followed by a murder that was apparently committed by the suicide victim shortly after his death."

ZANE GRUDER IN HIS YOUNGER DAYS
...claims he has died four times

Life After Death, Man Says

BY RUDI CHURCH
The Associated Press

EAST CORINTH — An East Corinth man claims he has conclusive evidence that there is, in fact, life after death.

Saying that he himself has died four times, Zane Gruder, 78, has piles of his own obituaries and coroners' reports.

Gruder said that he has died of natural causes twice, drove his car into a quarry once, and was crushed once when one of his cows he was milking fell on top of him.

"It's really not all that big a deal," Gruder said. "But the trick is to wake up before they put you six feet under — then getting back on your own two feet becomes a little difficult."

Special Report

Gruder described the time during which he had allegedly been dead as "peaceful. I had time to think about a lot of different things."

State officials, upon hearing of the claims made by Gruder, called him a "quack merely seeking publicity."

The officials say they have no record of Gruder ever having died — or having lived in the first place.

Gruder, however, stands firm by his belief that he has passed away on four separate occasions. All four of the obituaries he has appeared in the St. Louis (Mo.) News-Dispatch Inquirer Gazette and news clippings concerning his two accidents have no names attached to them, only details from the same newspaper.

Gruder said that once he can teach the world about his technique for raising oneself from the dead, he will be rich and the entire world immortal.

Montpelier Too Hot, Cold

Free Joke Capital Bureau

MONTPELIER — A move to transport the state capital building to an area where the weather is "more pleasant" has been gaining support among legislators in the past few weeks.

Among the areas that have been named as possibilities for the relocation are Key West, Florida, New Orleans, Louisiana and Nashville, Tennessee.

One legislator was heard to comment, "It's just too (expletive deleted) hot in this city in the summer, and it's too (expletive deleted) cold in the winter. What's more, we get a mud season rather than Spring."

Another legislator said, "It would be a lot more efficient for the legislature if we were in an area where the weather is less inclement and more predictable."

The move, which originated as a joke in the Senate by Lt. Gov. T. Garry Buckley, was picked up by key senators as being serious and at least one senator ordered his staff to undertake a cost/benefit analysis of such a move.

Estimates from that study show that in order to move the building itself, the cost would be about $1 million for each mile the building is transported. The study also said, however, that for each mile over 1000, the cost per mile drops by $500,000.

The building would most likely be taken to the ocean and then floated by barge to its ultimate location.

Thus far, there has been little opposition to the move from those people who are candidates for offices in the upcoming primary elections. The general mood in Montpelier was one of disbelief that such a thing could ever happen. Nevertheless,

Angels To Meet Starsky, Hutch

HOLLYWOOD (AP) — Rumors that have been running rampant during the past week were finally confirmed Wednesday when an ABC spokesman said that "Charlie's Angels" and "Starsky and Hutch" will team up for the season premiere this September.

The three beauties posed in the series as crime-fighting detectives, Cheryl Ladd, Jacklyn Smith and Kate Jackson, are slated to appear opposite the macho, undercover policemen, David Soul and Michael Glazer, in the season opener.

Informed sources said the show will be a two-hour special that will pit the five stars opposite Russian KGB spies who are trying to steal valuable information from a top secret strategic air command post in Omaha, Nebraska.

In the episode, the sources said, the Angels will appear in a bathing beauty contest clad in skimpy bathing suits and will shortly afterward be tossed into the ocean only to reappear in revealing wet T-shirts. Starsky and Hutch will counter by entering a weight-lifting contest in which Hutch's trunks will split at the seams as he attempts a 500-pound jerk.

The story-line was apparently conceived by NBC executive Fred Silverman who hid the idea in a bookshelf while he was employed at ABC. ABC officials, upon finding the memo Silverman had written to himself, were elated with joy.

Study Finds Alcoholics Drink Liquor

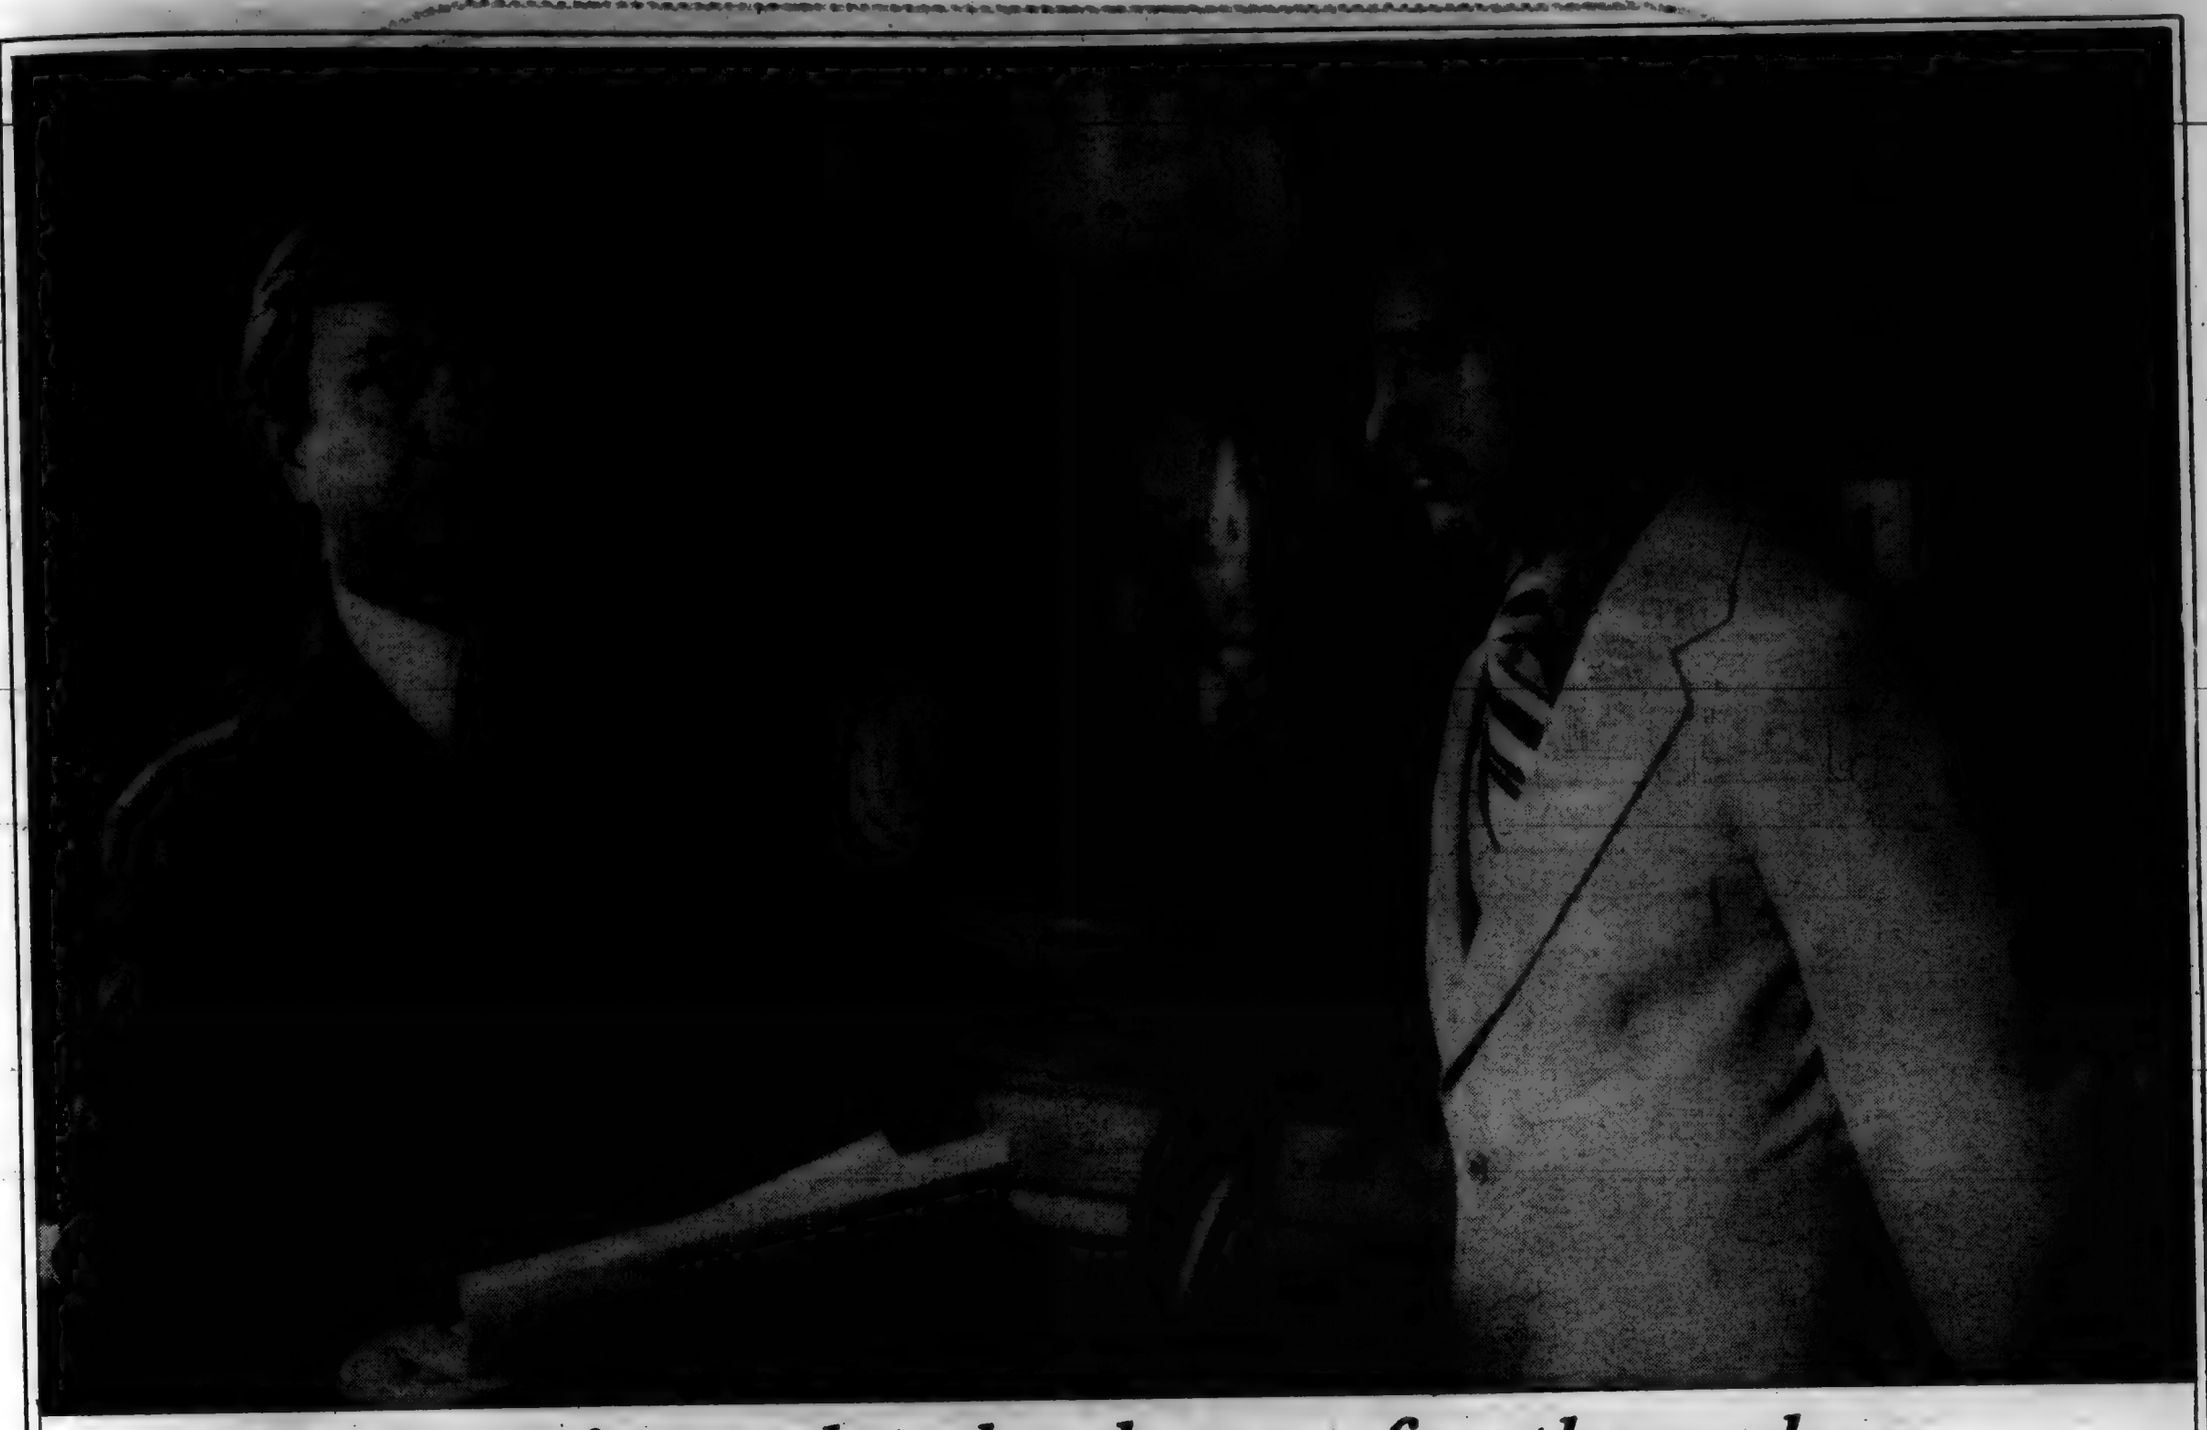
WASHINGTON (AP) — Conclusive new evidence released Wednesday shows that the consumption of liquor is directly related to the likelihood of becoming an alcoholic.

In a report published by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, researchers have found that the liquors most closely related to alcoholics are: scotch, gin, vodka, beer, whiskey, rum, tequila, brandy, wine and Richard's Wild Irish Rose.



A spokesman for the bureau said that the report has been ten years in the making and dispels all other knowledge previously held about alcoholism being related to the weather.

Burlington's a college town: 51 bars, Ivy League atmosphere. Summertime's sweet. The students are gone, a citizen can go downtown and have a night on the town without being degraded by rich college kids. In the winter though it is busy. It's also cold. Real cold. College studs abound, a local guy doesn't really stand a chance with college women. It's cold, alright. But it's also prosti season:

Burlington's Housing Crisis, Part 89

By Tom Toma

No, this is not the last in a series! Once again, the continuing saga of little old ladies living in mansions and All-American hockey players living in igloos cries out to be told! And I, Tom Toma, am the one to tell all!

"Burlington is Vermont leader in people per square inch, and mighty proud of it too. Don't tell people to leave their beloved Queen City. No, Sir! It's a nice place to live, drink, and sleep. In fact, this summer I've slept on floors, on boats, in chairs, in tents, indoors and out. So what's the fuss?

It's these damn students, clawing each other for space to stay, like trying to see how many of them can fit into a telephone booth. You can see hundreds of 'em spilling out of houses on weekend nights! These kids starve themselves and then go on lead paint chip diets; no wonder the drop out rate is so high; and no wonder Burlington's housing supply is deteriorating thanks to these human termites!

What's the solution? Let the kids sleep in the bars – they live there anyway. Let 'em sleep in the UVM library too (I haven't seen anyone awake there in years!) It's these closing rules that force students, who could care where they stay, to look for apartments.

Another housing crisis, by the way, is the lack of houses of ill repute. Some of these college girls could have both a place to live and a chance to work their way through school. I bet the tenants of such houses would be fulfilled to capacity! Heh-heh!

UVM and other area schools could take great steps toward solving the housing shortage by purchasing a fleet of Winnebagos. Freshpeople should be required to live in a 'Bago and will have an option to purchase. 'Bagos could be parked at Centennial Field and Gutterson Field House. Think too of all those nice camping trips, and driving around campus in style ("Hey baby, ever been bagged in a 'Bago?"). In short, a 'Bago is an investment in the future, which an apartment is not.

In a related development, I heard a rumor that UVM is moving to Rutland. This is the best solution to the housing crisis I've heard so far!

UVM dorms will free up for needy low-income families, and condominiums can be built on the UVM Green. In no time we'll pack new residents into B-Town to keep this city prosperous, congested, and profitable for slumlords (like myself).

In Part 90, we will explore alternative housing such as dried manure mansions, paper-mache palaces, gopher holes, tree houses, and candy bar condominiums. Remember, in good old American architecture, the bricks keep coming out the backside.

Sally's fourth husband, the father of her nineth, tenth and eleventh children, is now a physicist for the Exxon Corporation. Her most recent and eighteenth husband was recently laid off in Seabrook, N.H. Her dad was an American flyer in Seattle, Washington in 1945 when the U.S. dropped the big one on Japan. Sally's anti-nuke sentiments are reflected in her poem, "One at a Time:"

Oh I wish when I have to see it
They'd go just one at a time
I've always liked long movies,
And how the good guys shine

"Well, that one about how, you know, in long, long – I mean really long war movies when Kirt – Kirk always looks so good by the finish? Well, I wish those guys would go just one at a time so the film could last longer. I mean, there's nothing wrong with a long war. It builds character. It's kinda like acid, you know. I just want it to last longer."

"Drugs," claims Sally "play a vital role in any author's life. I once sang to a bus for three hours after tooting. It truly loved me." In "Ode to Al," Sally tells the physical properties she gives drug paraphernalia in her writing (Al is a long, plastic instrument):

Oh Al I love you so
When I breath from you, I forever let go
When I see your bubbling bottom,
I get excited and want to bubble too.
Bubble, bubble, bubble.

Sally also dabbles in chiseling. "We had a big rock in my front yard when I was a little girl, and my mother always used to throw forks and spoons and stuff like that against it to try to take it apart."

Her most recent work, titled "Wall," was recently on display on the UVM campus Waterman green. "A whole lot of birds and old men stopped by and told me it looked real nice," said Sally, who explained "not that attention makes any difference to a real artist."

Following her near fatal car accident in 1959, most relatives say Sally has turned into a 'lune.' Sally, however, called

Antiseptic: The Count's Dizzy Bite

By JEFF ARONSON

Late one night, I was reading in my room when an old friend, Count Dean Ruskula, of Camp Hill, Transylvania, dropped in to say hello. The Count was quite irritated, since he could find no girls walking around after 11 P.M., and thus had not eaten for days.

For those of you who do not know Dean, he was the perceptive statesman who in the early 1950's proclaimed that the yellow demons of the Red Vampire Republic would never invade North Korea if we did. So many of them actually entered the fighting there that their yellow glow equalled that of the sun, and he disintegrated into dust. He returned in 1960 to become Secretary of State under the young, enlightened President Teenage Frankenstein.

Count Ruskula was unhappy with the world and he complained bitterly to me.

"How have I managed to fall into such disfavor? Why, I can hardly go anywhere these days without people trying to attack me! My lectures and speeches were once in demand – they were revered as gospel. Now, virtually nobody believes them!"

I told the Count that his speeches were beginning to rival his movies in believability, and that even Bella Lugosi was not always appreciated.

"It isn't even safe in the Great White Castle anymore!" Our new President, The Warhawk Who Ravaged Saigon, actually had a wild-eyed radical for an advisor; the lunatic suggested that we do something to help the cities! Thank Zues the foolish goblin resigned."

I reminded him of the story told of his nation's founding father, Dr. Boris K. Frankenstein. When he ignored the demands and needs of the local townspeople, they drove him and his monster out of the Great White Castle. He was attacked in the press, his polls went down, and he was finally killed when he was thrown from a fiery windmill.

"But the real problem," the Count continued, "is those agitators like the Creature From the All-Black Lagoon, who run around the cities demanding to know why villainous movie monsters are always black. Just because Corgo, King Kong, and the Spider were dark doesn't mean anything – what about the Mummy or the Blobb?"

I politely informed Dean that the Mummy was not the real villain in his movie – the dark-skinned priest with the mustache was. And the Blob was simply a fine example that not all light-skinned folks were 100% angels either. I recanted quickly as the Count bared his fangs. Recovering his composure, he continued.

"At least there's some sanity left in the world. Say, have you heard the latest all-is-well report from Vietnam?"

I was floored. I never knew that Transylvania was one of the "Allies."

"We most certainly are! Did you know that we have over 350 men fighting over there? Why, that's more than the South Vietnamese drafted last year! All specialists of course. Gorgo and his mother are helping with the recent naval surveillence of the North Korean coast, and the Birds are acting as lookouts for your flyers over North Vietnam. I'm sure you've heard of the exploits of the Man-Eating Vines Who Devoured St. Louis, who are helping to keep the enemy on the defensive at Khe San!"

I commented that in light of recent events, his country had certainly helped our cause. Why, then, was General Westmoreland asking for another 206,000 troops?

"That's so we will be able to turn the corner in Vietnam."

I suggested that we would all become quite dizzy if our government claimed to have turned yet another corner in Vietnam. Perhaps it was time to reevaluate our involvement there, to throw some new light on the problem?

"Don't do that," Count Ruskula cried, "our entire effort could turn to dust!"

UVM professor named to kite chair

Sanford Grimms of mechanical engineering has been named to the American Flyer endowed chair of mechanical engineering. The associate professor who claims he has been a kite flyer since "I can remember," was elated when he heard the news. "All my life I wanted to be a pilot," he said. "But so much time is spent on studying useless information instead of flying. And of course, there are those rules about this and that and drinking."

He continued, "Kite flying, ever since the Chinese has been man's true expression of freedom. No rules, no bizarre landing patterns, just the ultimate release which is cutting the string at the end of the flight."

Grimms, who teaches three courses, one in mechanical engineering, "Basic Designs in Flight"; one in psychology, "Fear of Flying"; and one Evening Division course entitled, "Flying after 40: Alone and Together."

The endowed chair which carries a stipend of $16,000 per annum also comes with a five-year supply of lightweight cotton and polyester rags for use as kite tails.

UVM coed wins Maidenform

Debbie Pincus, a sophomore from Starksboro, has been named winner of the $3600 Maidenform scholarship. The scholarship was presented to Debbie after she won Maidenform's 1978 "Full Figures That Dreams Are Built On", wet T-shirt contest in Daytona Beach, Florida during Spring break.

The contest which featured coeds from across the country attracts many spectators who are also college students on drunken vacations. During the "spring party olympics" as the students call them UVM won many of the individual events including fastest beer chugged, fastest marijuana cigarette rolling contest and most deceptive double dealing contest.

In an elated moment, Debbie thanked both her parents for endowing her and her maternal grandmother who Debbie claims, "showed her the way."

Debbie, who claims her interests and major at UVM are the hockey players, wants to return to Florida next year to defend her national title.

Rise and fall of fraternities is Vermont Seminar's subject

The rapid decline in quality and quantity of the UVM Fraternal Order has prompted Dean of Students Keith Riser to suggest and implement the far-reaching study of just what went wrong. Using guest speakers such as Dr. Benjamin Spock, Terry Bradshaw and John Belushi, star of the recent cinematic expose on fraternity life, "Animal House," the three-month seminar will attempt to explore sociologically and non-sociologically just what befell a system which was so tried and true since the days of the Greeks. And as Riser noted, "It was the Greeks before the Geeks, we sometimes forget that."

Many alumni have already expressed interest in the seminar. They have pointed out at recent homecomings that they have noticed the old college try just was not there.

Anne Beauman, director of alumni relations, pointed out that a popular contemporary film like "Animal House" may be just the shot in the arm that the fraternity and sorority system needs. "Kids have to understand what fun a fraternity is. The social stratification that develops out of a fraternal hierarchy is just what happens after graduation."

This, the second year of the well-received Vermont Seminars, opens with a lecture by UVM's Vice President for Affairs within the Academic Community Robert G. "Animal" Farms speaking on "The Origin and Necessity of Nicknames in Fraternal Life," on September 27 in B106 Angell Lecture Center. The fun begins at 8 p.m. Bring your own.

Dr. Coor has been our leader for two years. During this time, several changes have occurred within the university, both physically and in policy. In an interview with Russell Flannery and John Letteri, Dr. Coor candidly discusses the improvements he sees as having been accomplished, and the areas that need further work.

18 Bernard O'Shea, a newspaper publisher and former Vermont state senator, and Edwin Granai, a member of the House of Representatives, are running for the Democratic nomination for governor. Mr. O'Shea is a strong opponent of nuclear power, big government, and an advocate of tax cuts, the decriminalization of marijuana, and a strong financial commitment to UVM and other schools. He favors an aggressive promotion of farming in the state, and strongly dislikes Governor Snelling's autocratic style of running state government. Mr. Granai stands for many of the same things, with a strong emphasis on keeping Vermont for Vermonters and curbing rapid and unchecked industrial and commercial growth in the state. John Letteri interviews the candidates on page 18.

The Return of Burlington's Fall Housing Crunch

As a result of unexpectedly high numbers of incoming freshmen and returning resident students, the Department of Residential Life is currently faced with a housing shortage.

The shortage has caused the placement of 241 randomly selected freshmen students in temporary housing areas, and the rental of the North Wing of the University Health Center by Residential Life for the housing of 18 female freshmen.

Steve Peterson, Director of the Office of Residential Life, said the situation was "unfortunate," and attributed the cause to unforeseen events which left the University without other alternatives.

High Yield

An unexpectedly high freshmen "yield," or the number of students who actually accept the University offer of admission during their senior high school year, is the main cause of the University's inability to house the entire freshman class, an fall 1978 semester, and therefore accepted a greater number than customary. With 69 percent of Vermont residents accepting enrollment and 62 percent of out-of-state students from the inflated number of acceptees, the University found 100-150 more overflow students than originally had been anticipated.

"I Love It"

Although a number of students eventually may spend a full semester in temporary housing, the currently tripled and quadroupled freshmen residents contacted by the Cynic appeared pleased with their accommodations, and in no hurry to move their belongings in the immediate future.

"We like it," said Wright Hall freshman Tom O'Donovan, who noted that his only current concerns were "the people on the floor who want their lounge back." Faith Brown, a Simpson fourth floor lounge resident, said "We like it a lot," and expressed disappointment with an inevitable separation from her current roommates. One unidentified Davis Hall student simply stated, "I love it!"

Peterson attributed the casual acceptance of the temporary facilities to an effort by his staff to communicate with parents and students during the freshman orientation sessions earlier this summer, which advised that the lounge situation could possibly happen to them. Peterson said he hadn't received one complaint regarding the temporary housing, and his lone gripe (as of Tuesday afternoon) concerned the general condition of a dormitory, a problem which cannot be easily rectified.

The On Campus Rush

Although UVM is experiencing a slight dip in the number of on-campus students requesting housing, the percentage still stands at 77, which is comparatively high to the 59-60 percent average of the early 1970's. Regionally, a recent Boston Globe article reports that while all Hub colleges reported increased requests for on-campus housing, Boston College led all by having 85 percent of its students requesting such housing. At UVM, Peterson attributed the rise to "one, an economical factor particularly in this community where housing is difficult to find, and difficult to find in the configurations students want — at either the right size or the right cost. In order to be economical in living off campus, you have to sacrifice some privacy..."

"Two, I think UVM is doing some things on campus through student government and with staff that make residence halls a more attractive place for

"We like it," said freshman Tom O'Donovan, who noted that his only current concerns were "The people on the floor who want their lounge back."

The Word From Residential Life Director Steve Peterson Regarding Housing

Swanson Photo

"It's unfortunate that we have had to start the year with so many students in temporarily assigned space; and although this makes it difficult for those students, our staff will be accessible as possible to seeing that their needs are being met in terms of their satisfaction."

students to live," concluded Peterson.

Coop/Coolidge Update

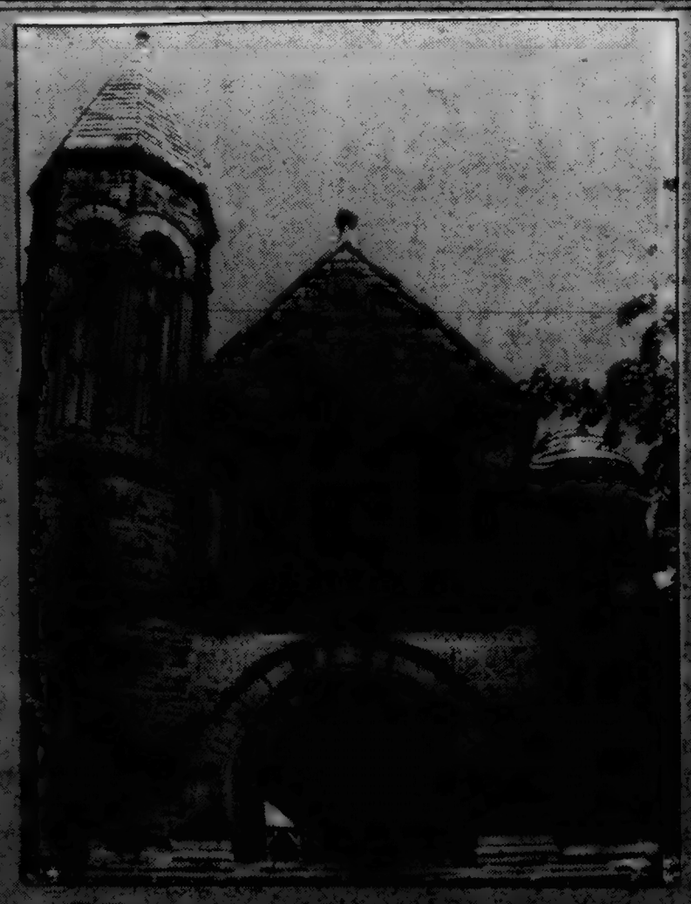
Peterson said the success of the Hamilton Cooperative Dorm, a resident hall program founded last semester through joint cooperation of the Student Association and Inter Residence Association, was "extremely exciting."



For a $130 reduction in the yearly room rate, Hamilton residents will perform all housekeeping and maintanance duties. Initially proposed by S.A. Senator Peter Corbett, the dormitory's student government will be elected by the residents themselves, and will be aided by a Residential Life staff of Resident Advisors and a Hall Advisor.

Although the dorm was not filled by returning upperclassmen, the interest shown by the entering freshmen has resulted in the creation of a waiting list for the dormitory. Since disappointed or unhappy students can be replaced by "someone who really wanted to be there," the program theoretically "should work perfectly," said Peterson.

Only a very small number of returning resident students will be housed in the newly renovated Coolidge Hall, a dormitory formerly noted for fierce partying, drug sales, and derelict activity in general.

"You know what Coolidge Hall used to be..." stated Steve Peterson. "I don't think it will be like that anymore." Indeed, the dormitory has been carpeted, newly furnished, and undergone the installation of new heating and lighting, which Peterson remarked "students will never see." Upperclassmen other than Coolidge residents were refused access to the dormitory during last April's room choosing process because, said Peterson, the IRA Housing Committee felt that "the pattern of destructive behavior" must be changed. Of the remaining Coolidge residents from last year's residence, Peterson said he had "great faith" and later added that he did "admire" the dorm's heritage.

House Candidates to Debate in Billings

The Student Association (S.A.) will sponsor a debate between incumbent Representative J. Daniel Mahoney and Arthur H. Bloomberg, Democratic candidates for the Vermont House of Representatives, Ward 1, District 4-3. Both candidates are running in the Vermont Primary on September 12, 1978.

"Past S.A. administrations have not shown an interest in the election of local representatives," recently commented S.A. President Charlie Clark. "Hopefully, Friday's debate will generate an awareness among UVM students concerning the importance of local issues and their effects on UVM."

The debate will be held in Billings Center, Marsh Lounge, at 1:00 p.m. on Friday, September 8. District 4-3 is very important for UVM because it encompasses much of the UVM campus and many University students and faculty live within its borders. Following the debate, questions from the audience will be welcomed.

Library Constuction Falls Behind

The library expansion project, a $3 million venture expected to increase seating capacity at Bailey Library by 95 percent, has fallen behind schedule.

It had been speculated by informed sources here the project was eight weeks behind its target completion date. Ray Lavigne, associate director of Administration Support Service, said he would not speculate on how far behind the project was, but admitted it was "a little bit behind."

Efforts are being made, however, to correct the situation. Lavigne said the project should be back on schedule by December 1 of this year. He said some of the tradesmen have been put on ten hour days, and six day weeks. In addition, Sweet, Inc., the company building the library addition, has added additional personnel in both the trade and managerial areas. Further, Sweet has postponed putting in the basement slab until a later date to enable them to do the first floor and the roof before the colder weather sets in.

He said the scheduling problem, and the additional help hired will have "no effect" on the cost of the project. The construction cost of the project is "around $3.5 million," Lavigne said. The completion date for the project has now been tentatively set for July 15, 1979.

The majority of the money to fund the project will come from money generated through an increase in the library fee for students. The $34 fee is million over 18 years to help fund the project. In addition, the state of Vermont has agreed to grant the university $1 million, and private gifts are expected to cover the rest of the cost of the project.

Currently, the Bailey library is 60 percent below seating capacity requirements set by the American Library Association. It had been built in 1961 when the enrollment at UVM was only 4,400. The university now enrolls more than ten thousand undergraduate, graduate and medical students.

The 73,000 square foot addition is expected to ease crowding in the main building, which was built to house 500,000 volumes, but now has 700,000 volumes. Another 45,000 volumes are stored off-campus. The addition will increase student seating by 95 percent, collection space by 84 percent, and work space by 29 percent. UVM officials have said the new library will be adequate until 1990.

The building is being erected by Sweet Associates of Schenectady, New York, the low bidders on the project. Perhaps one of the reasons for the schedule problems is Sweet's president recently resigned, and the chairman of the board for the company, Ansell Sweet, has taken over his duties. Livigne said Sweet has already been to the construction site three times, and said Sweet is committed to having the project completed on time.

The university's push for expansion first began in 1972. In 1976, the Board of Trustees approved a plan for the expansion, and in 1977, the legislature approved the university's request for $1 million.

The construction site has caused two major inconveniences for students. First, normal walking paths toand from different parts of the campus have been disrupted. For example, if one wanted to go from the bookstore to the Cook Science building, one has to walk completely around Royall Tyler Theatre to get there. Without the site, a direct path was available.

The university, however, has taken some steps to alleviate this problem. They printed a large number of maps, outlining where the construction site was, and alternate routes to take when going and coming on campus. In addition, signs have been posted at intervals around the construction site indicating what direction one should take to get to his destination from a certain point along the construction site.

Second, and probably more important, the work at the construction site during the day affects the concentration of those trying to study in the library. It is rather unsettling to try and deal with any kind of reading or problem solving with a jack-hammer for accompanying music.

—John Letteri

Get Involved...

(PR) – The Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) is a student funded and run environmental, consumer and health research and advocacy group dedicated towards working for social change in Vermont. VPIRG has proven to be an effective lobbying organization, and has gained respect in many quarters of Vermont government and in the eyes of Vermont citizens. The greatest attribute of VPIRG is the educational opportunity it offers scores of students each year.

Every fall VPIRG staff members focus on a variety of issues important to Vermont. The issues are weighed in terms of the desired impact on Vermont, the ability of VPIRG to handle the issue, the probability of effective results and public acceptance. Staff and student proposed projects are then presented to the Board of Trustees for comment, revision and approval. One major consideration is the number of students that can be involved.

VPIRG NEWS

Students can become involved with VPIRG in a number of ways. Students have little difficulty choosing projects that suit their interests and needs. The commitment of student time and energy varies from in-class reports to independent study projects for CREDIT and even full-time thesis projects for several semesters'-worth of credit.

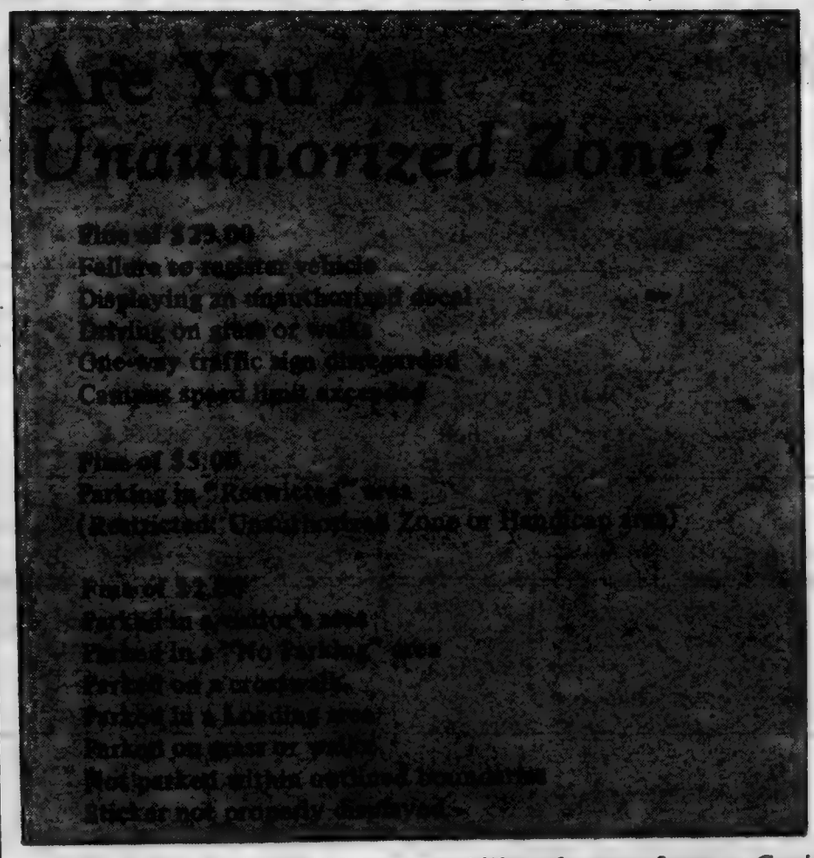
If you are interested in finding out more about VPIRG, working on a project this fall, or becoming a representative of VPIRG in your dorm, there will be an organizational meeting Monday, September 11 at 5 p.m. or call Lisa Shulock at 862-2841.

Despite an on-going parking shortage in the main campus area, the University has expanded its parking facilities only "insignificantly" since last semester, according to UVM Traffic Security officer Robert Gonyeau.

Of the roughly 2,100 available parking spaces in the Main Campus area, 58% are reserved for faculty and staff, 42% for resident students, and 0% for commuting students, who must park to the rear of the Agricultural Engineering Building, which is accessible only by East Avenue.

The University is restricted by commitment to pave only a certain acreage of the University. It has increased the number of available spaces in the main campus area by 'remarking' parking lots in both the John Dewey Hall and Given Medical Building areas. However, "it takes quite a few spaces before you actually save anything," said Gonyeau, who projected that five or six additional spaces would be created per lot.

Since collegiate enrollment is expected to level off or decline by 1985, UVM, and colleges in general, have been reluctant to undertake expansion programs. Although the leveling of the Bishop's House would create increased parking facilities at the DeGoesbriand Hospital, the demolition would have little or no immediate effect on the University community at large. In other campus areas, however, the University does claim to have created a parking lot east of the Wilkes-Davis-Wing dormitory complex, which currently is a gravel covered area. In fact, area residents essentially founded the area last semester, which eventually evolved into a popular "mud bowl site" last spring.



Other alternatives to alleviate the shortage include the creation of a pay visitor's parking area. This, however, has been set aside for the time being. Gonyeau dismissed a mid-summer rumor that parking would be restricted on University Place due to students parking on the incline between the street and the sidewalk, saying "it has been discussed," but "nothing has developed." In a recent Cynic interview, Gonyeau noted that "security can't make decisions — just recommendations."

Ticketing

Although security "tries not to" ticket vehicles during the first week of the semester, according to Gonyeau, —— were issued last semester. This semester does not promise a decline. Ticket fees range from $25 to $2, for offenses ranging from exceeding the campus 20 MPH speed limit, to "not parking with outlined boundaries."

Although one former Cynic News editor termed the operation "a joke," Gonyeau stressed that students should take advantage of the ticket appeals board if they feel a citation was issued unjustly. He also said that the board, which consists of one on-campus student, one off-campus student, one faculty member, and one security officer, hears the cases of "almost as many faculty and staff members as they do students." "They're the ones that scream even louder than students," continued Gonyeau. "The appeals board is quite a help — it's something that students should be aware of — at least more aware than they are now," the security officer said.

Seminar Series Opens Second Season

Yugoslav Dissident to Speak

(Special Press Release)

The second year of the well-received Vermont Seminars Program gets underway at the University of Vermont with the visit and lecture of noted Yugoslav dissident, Professor Mihajlo Mihajlov.

Prof. Mihajlov's speech, "Life under Communism in Russia and Eastern Europe," on Tuesday, September 12, at 7:30 p.m. in Memorial Lounge in Waterman, is an extra presentation in the University's often labelled portable faculty program.

This year's Vermont Seminars Program is divided into three areas. They are for 1978-79: (1) The Holocaust: Perspectives Past, Present, and Future; (2) Irish Studies and (3) The Rural Options in Urban America.

Distinguished visitors, as part of the program, will give public lectures in their field of expertise, as well as conducting classroom discussions in University classes that are organized around Seminars topics.

The opening of the Holocaust Program with the keynote address by noted author, Elie Wiesel, will take place on Sunday, September 24 at 8 p.m. in the Ira Allen Chapel. Wiesel, who the New York Times Book Review labelled as "one of the great writers of this generation," will give an overview of the Holocaust.

Other speakers to address this tragic period are: Professor of History John S. Conway, from the University of British Columbia (Oct. 19); Rabbi Irving Greenberg, who is the director of the Jewish National Conference Center (Oct. 25); C. Peter Brooks, who was the New York Times' Berlin correspondent from 1937-41 (Nov. 1).

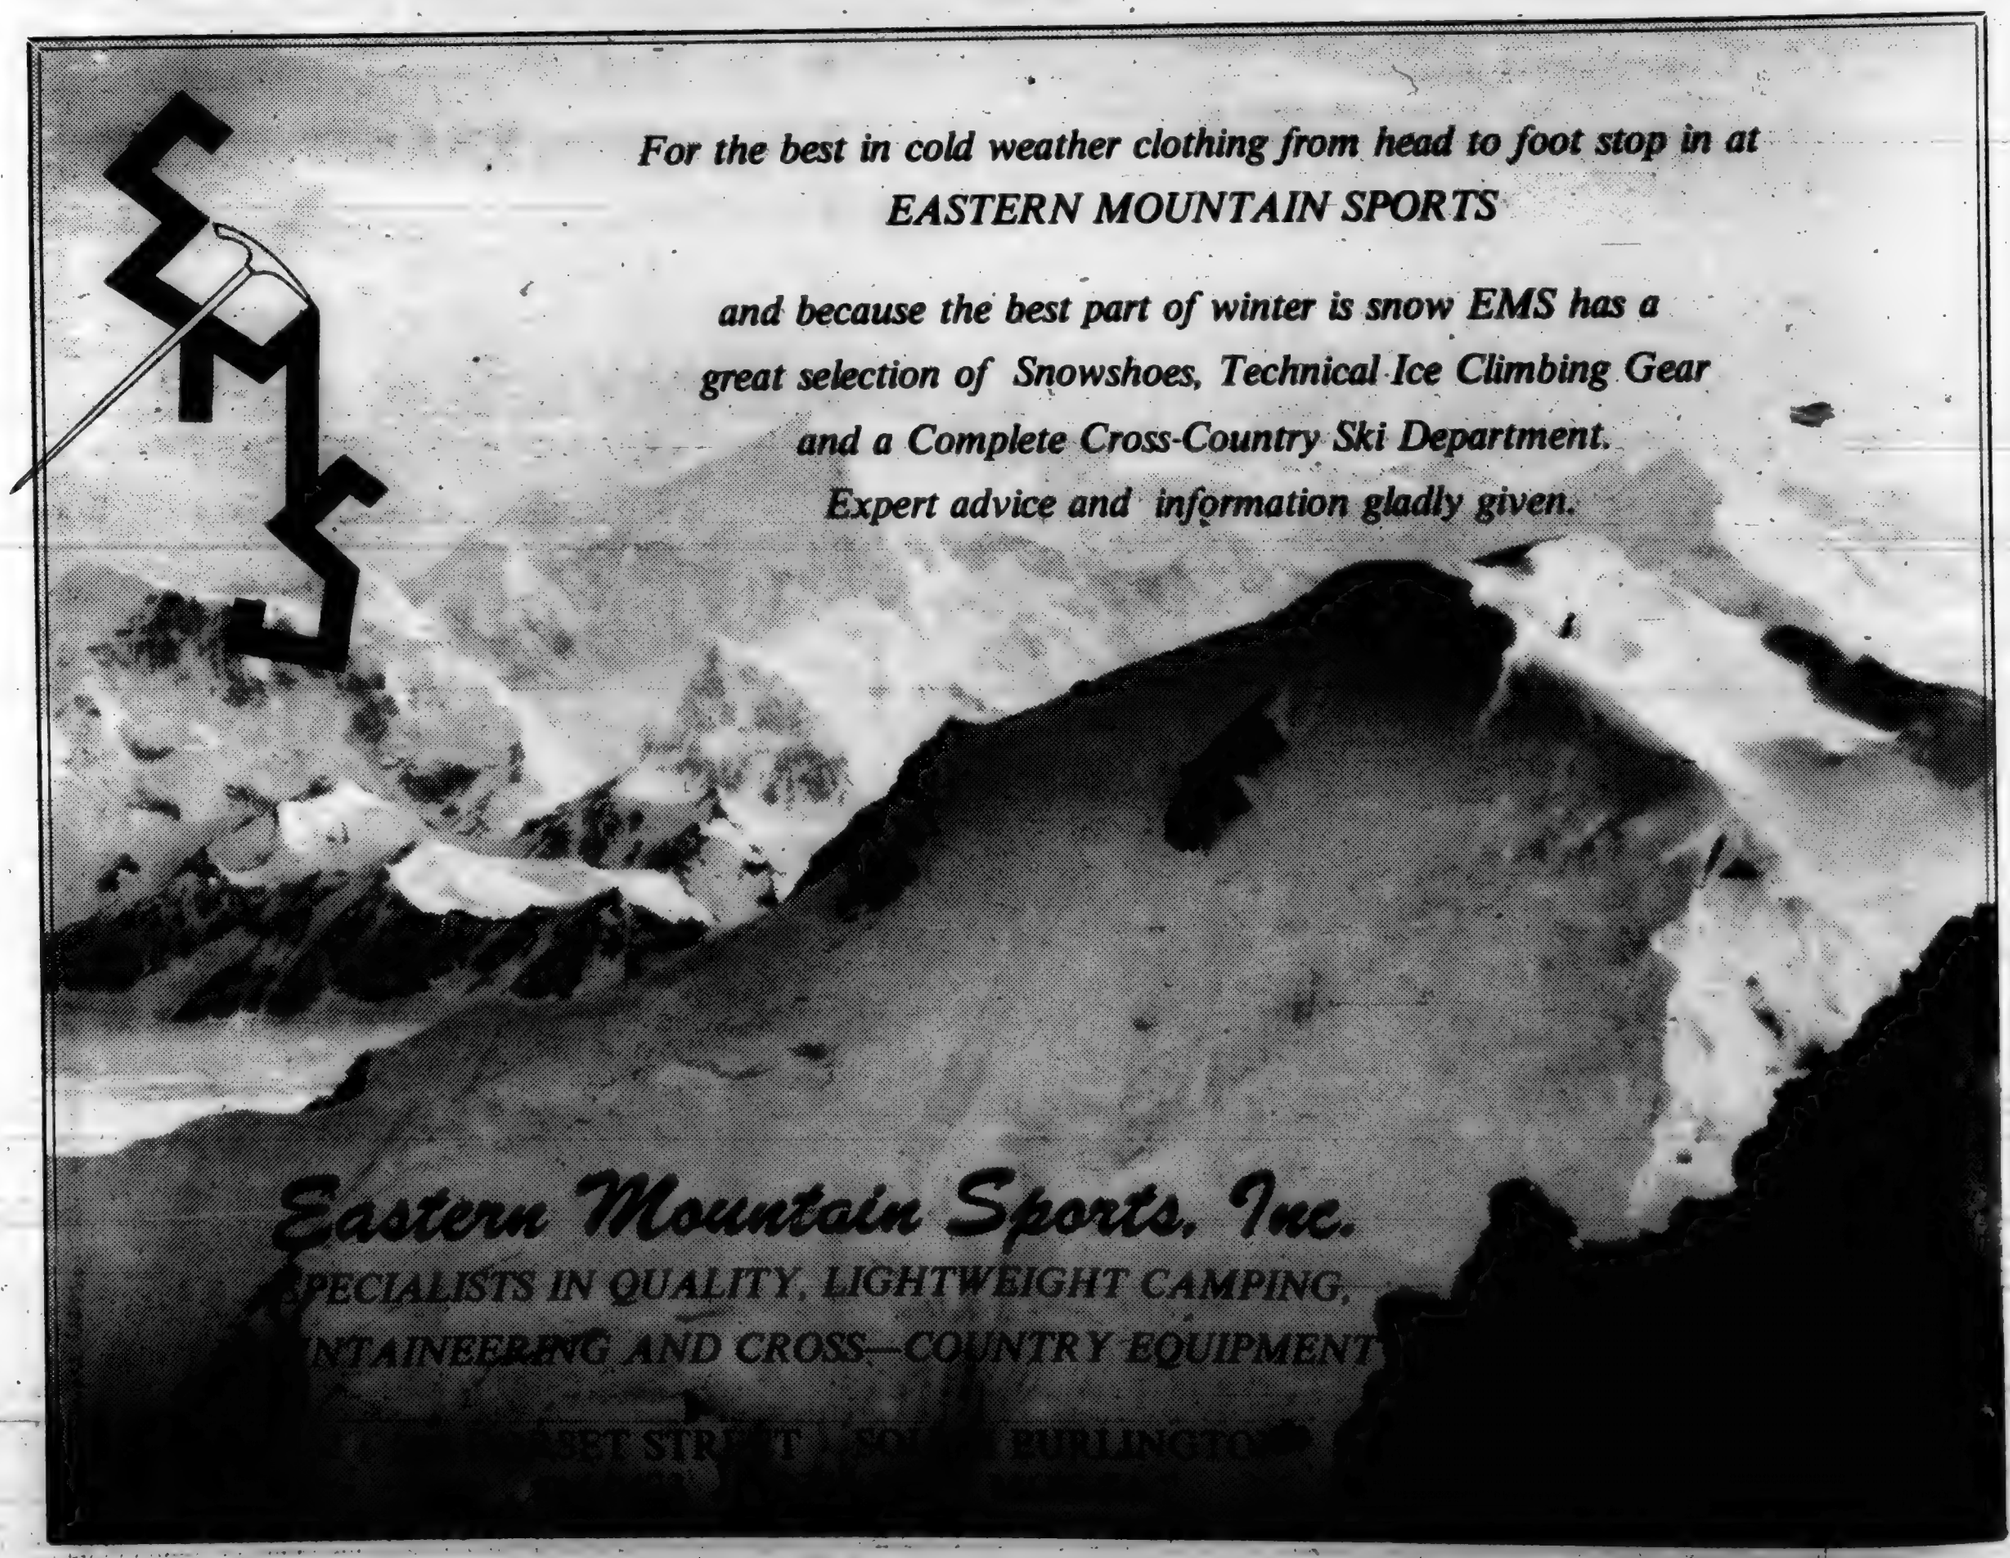
Also, Terrence Des Pres, author of The Survivor, and Lawrence Langer, author of The Age of Atrocity: Death in Modern Literature, both will speak on November 8. On November 15, Professor of History at UMass, Henry Wyman, will address the American Response to the Holocaust.

The Holocaust program is co-ordinated by Professors Raul Hilberg of the department of political science and Samuel Bogorad of the English department.

The Irish Studies program under the direction of Tony Bradley and Sid Poger of the English department, begins on October 4 with a speech by Irish historian and author Thomas Brown. The famous Irish playwright Brian Friel will be appearing on a to-be-determined date in November.

The Rural Options in Urban America series, under the leadership of Professor Garrison Nelson of political science, begins on Sept. 20 with a speech by Change magazine editor Richard T. Margolis on "Rural America: Why Bother?" at 8 p.m. in the Living/Learning Center's Commons.

On Sept. 25, Richard Saudek, chairman of the Vermont Public Service Board, will speak on "Hydropower in Vermont: Issues, Conflict, and Resolution."



Other speakers include: Richard Czaplinski, chief water resources planner for the Vermont Agency of Environmental Conservation (Oct. 2); Richard Hill, from the mechanical engineering department of the University of Maine at Orono on the Dickey-Lincoln Dam (Oct. 12); Bernard B. Berger, director of the UMass Water Resources Center (Oct. 16); Clay Cochran, executive director of Rural America (Oct. 16); and John Ehrenfeld, Chairman of the New England River Basins Commission (Oct. 23).

And John Kovalkic, a professional staff member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the U.S. House of Representatives, who will speak on "Water Quality in the United States: Conflicts, Their Resolution and Federal Policy," on November 13.

Dr. Norman Alpert of physiology is this year's chairman of the Vermont Seminars Program.

Last year's inaugural topics were "U.S. Power and the Third World: Past Present and Future," and "The Harlem Renaissance."

All Vermont Seminar's Lectures are free and open to the public.

Questionable management at the Bookstore

During the month of September, thousands of students pour into the bookstore to spend their summer savings into the hands of waiting cashiers. Traditionally called the "rush" period by bookstore manager Hosmer Graham, the bookstore is expected to make over $100,000 as students return to school and stock up on not only books, but health and beauty aids, toiletries, and sundries.

Yet, the "rush" may be one of the few times the bookstore actually makes money. Graham said the bookstore lost $16,000 in July, and called a loss of that sort not unexpected. Further, in fiscal year 1977, the bookstore lost over $39,000. Figures for this year were unavailable as yet.

In 1976, the bookstore's net operating profit was $49,971. In 1977, however, the bookstore reported a net operating loss of $109,851, an overall decrease of 319.8 percent. Sales were up in 1977 by more than eight percent over 1976, but the cost of sales was up 12.8 percent. Finally, the adjusted loss for the bookstore in 1977 was $126,679. Graham said the bookstore is entirely owned and operated by UVM, and any profit or loss the bookstore experiences goes into the general fund to pay off the building's debt. He said the bookstore tries to remain in the black, but with the slow summer months, it isn't very easy to do.

Complaints are often leveled at the price of books the store has. In fact, however, the bookstore does not set the prices, nor are they out of the ordinary for New England schools. For example, a survey of several textbooks showed prices were the same at UNH for the surveyed textbooks. Graham said the prices are set by the publisher, and the store sells them at the manufacturer's list price or less. He said the store is a member of the National Association of College stores, and that the organization has been trying for several years to try and hold prices down.

Another common complaint of students is that all too often, books they are looking for simply aren't there. Graham said this results from a lack of communication between the bookstore and the faculty members who order the books. He said requisitions for books are due from faculty members on May 1 for the following fall semester. Yet, only 18 percent of the requisitions are filed with the store at this time, he said.

Faculty members have their problems too, however. A number of professors are not aware of the courses they will teach the following semester until early April and late May. Furthermore, registration for students is a slow process with results for class size a difficult number to estimate.

Graham said the store operates on a profit margin of zero, and was here to provide the basic needs of students. For example, in 1977, the bookstore sold over 1.2 million dollars worth of books, and over $500,000 in supplies, which represents more than 80 percent of total bookstore sales. Further, Graham said the store does not seek profit, but to "cover our expenses and objects of service by having available the necessary tools of education."

Graham said the problem of theft at the store was not higher than the national average. However, two new security cameras have been installed and they have beefed up security personnel in the store.

Improvements for this year will center mainly on providing more of what the student actually needs, and less of the "impulse" items, such as posters and knapsacks. Graham said they will expand the "munchie" items, such as candy, health foods, and crackers. In addition, the store's stock will contain an office product line, items which have been traditionally left to the academic departments to order.

Yet, the bookstore remains a nightmare to any student trying to purchase his or her books for the semester. The aisles are barely passable for two people side by side, let alone try and carefully pick out a book. The problem is compounded when the lines from the register back into store aisles, making the selection of some items nearly impossible. The store is simply not large enough to accommodate students at the "rush" period.

Perhaps Farrah and her friends, along with other preppie-catching items such as UVM T-shirts and mugs, could be removed during the "rush period." Consequently, the book store's space would be more properly allocated to serve a pertinent need — books. The additional space might be used for more aisles, or perhaps provide breathing space and a place for the lines that inevitably develop to go.

High book prices simply cannot be avoided. However, it appears rather odd that a store with such a terrific demand should not be able to consistently show a profit. If retail stores downtown had the same demand the university store has guaranteed, there would be a lot more millionaires in this state. Maybe the management of the store deserves a long look. For the conditions at the bookstore, although fair during the months of low demand, are quite ludicrous during the first weeks of school. And to expect anybody to wait in line for two or three hours to buy anything is equally lacking.

The Bishop's House Dilemma: Will It Ever Go Away?

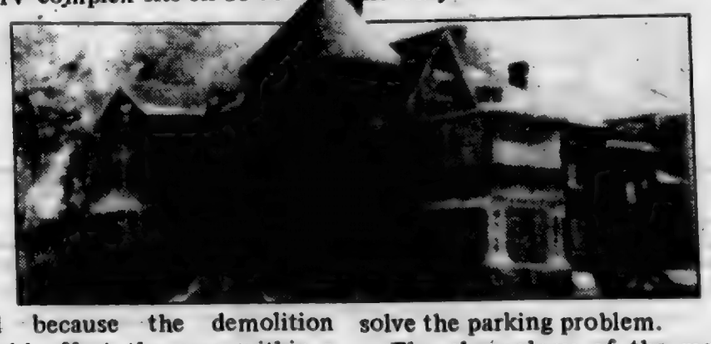
The Bishop's House is still standing.



Only a year ago, the fate of this 124-year-old, 26-room mansion looked bleak as its original demolition date had been set for the first week of September. But that date passed, as did all of the other potential demolition dates.

The Bishop's House case has been mired in the judicial system over the past year as an attempt to determine whether or not the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont is required to obtain an Act 250 land-use permit from the state Environmental Board to raze the structure.

Vermont Superior Court Judge Ernest A. Gibson, Jr. ruled early this summer that such a permit is required, and because a permit-obtaining procedure could easily spell defeat for the MCHV, Gibson's decision has been appealed to the Vermont Supreme Court. Even if the Supreme Court rules in favor of the Hospital, though, the decision would most likely come too late in the fall to break ground and another construction season would be lost.

Gibson also ruled, however, that the Committee to Save the Bishop's House, the most vocal opponent of demolition, would have to post $80,000 bond to compensate the Hospital for its legal costs if the Committee was desirous of staying in the legal battle. Thus, the Committee has more or less dropped out of the picture and the state Environmental Board has been left to "carry the ball," as one committee member put it.

The Bishop's House controversy could develop into a "test case" if the MCHV is required to obtain an Act 250 permit. Because the entire MCHV complex sits on 33 acres and because the demolition would affect the area within a 5-mile radius (i.e. parking, traffic flow, etc), the Bishop's House case would be a good one for the Environmental Board to help precisely define Act 250.

Another factor which would play a role is the fact that South Williams Street is listed on the state's Register of Historical Sites. And since UVM is the ultimate landlord of the DeGoesbriand Unit of the MCHV (UVM is involved in a complicated lease-back arrangement with the Hospital as part of the University's plan to use one-third of the building as an out-patient facility. UVM owns the building and thus, is ultimately responsible for the additional parking spaces the MCHV claims it needs.), and might be considered a state "agency," an alteration of any historical site – the Bishop's House – by such an "agency" must be reviewed by an Environmental Board to obtain a land-use permit before the alteration can be made.

The parking problem, interestingly encugh — the reason the MCHV first purchased the Bishop's House and the surrounding property — has now become severe enough so that shuttle buses to and from Gutterson Field House are being used. Shuttle buses, an idea proposed last year by the Bishop's House Committee, were ruled out by the Hospital trustees as the latter group maintained that demolition was the only cost-efficient means to solve the parking problem.

The chronology of the main events surrounding the Bishop's House controversy, briefly stated, as they have unfolded since December, 1976, is as follows:

December, 1976: The MCHV purchases the Bishop's House for $400,000 and its land for $400,000. The MCHV only wanted the land, but the Roman Catholic Church insisted they buy both. After the initial stages of the deal were complete, the MCHV tried to back off, but couldn't. (After all, if someone bought your used Volkswagen Bug for $10,000, and then wanted their money back, would you give it to them?) The MCHV knew they had gotten a lousy deal, because they could have installed a parking deck for less than the purchase price of the house and its land.

A one-year, renewable demolition permit is issued.

April, 1977: The Burlington Planning Commission votes 3-2 in favor of demolition. Head of the state Environmental Board, Margaret Garland, was a member of the Commission at the time and voted in favor of demolition. Ms. Garland has since abstained in all Bishop's House-relating voting.

July, 1977: The Committee to Save the Bishop's House is formed.

August, 1977: The Burlington Board of Aldermen votes 7-4 to table without discussion a resolution to reconsider demolition.

September, 1977: The Bishop's House Committee applies for an injunction to halt demolition in Vermont Superior Court. Judge Wynn Underwood granted the injunction saying the Environmental Board must determine whether an Act 250 permit is needed.

October, 1977: The state Environmental Board rules that an Act 250 permit is needed. The MCHV appeals to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, in turn, later rules that Underwood should have made the Act 250 decision himself, not the Environmental Board. Back to Superior Court.

June, 1978: Superior Court Judge Gibson rules that a permit is needed. Gibson also says that the Bishop's House Committee must fork up $80,000 if they want to play ball. The MCHV again appeals the permit decision to the Supreme Court — a decision which is still to come.

There are other major aspects of the Bishop's House controversy; such as the fact that the Hospital has sued the parties aimed at blocking demolition, including Sigma Nu fraternity; and also that the UVM trustees have appropriated $100,000 for a parking deck should it prove necessary.

The final fate of the once residence of the first Vermont Roman Catholic Bishop is still in question, but will probably be made much clearer once the Supreme Court decides whether or not the Hospital's appeal has any merit.

SLS In Second Year; Seeks New Interns

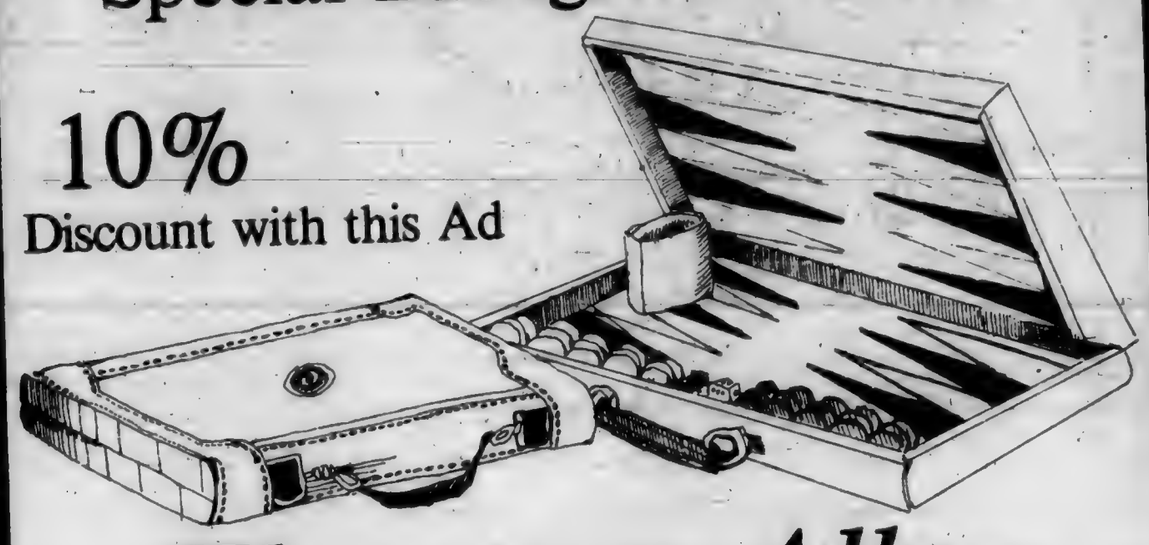
Given the high cost of professional legal advice, the average college student frequently can not afford to consult an attorney with regard to a pertinent legal question. The UVM Student Association realizes this situation and provides students with a Student Legal Service offering the maximum amount of assistance legally permissible – at the lowest cost possible. Located on the second floor of Billings Center in the Northwest corner, the S.L.S. is a pre-paid information and referral service consisting of one licensed attorney, two student directors, four student interns (to be), and various volunteer workers. Presently, the Student Legal Service specializes in five areas of the Law: Criminal; Consumer; Utilities; Traffic; and Landlord/Tenant.



When a student encounters a legal question or problem pertaining to one of these above categories, the S.L.S. acts to provide that student with information describing the laws, terms, processes, judicial institutions, and outside agencies relevant to his or her problem. By allowing the student to fully understand the nature and implications of his or her problem, the S.L.S. aims to provide students with a rational basis from which they may resolve their problems without the aid and fees of a professional attorney. Aside from the administration of information and referral, the S.L.S. is also involved with student seminars, student publications, and independent research projects.

As preparations for this new Fall semester are still being made, the S.L.S. is seeking four student interns who will be responsible for the daily operation and management of the S.L.S. office. Under the constant supervision of the attorney and the student directors, each intern will be trained to assist students with legal problems and to administer the various services provided by the Student Legal Service. Students interested in becoming interns need not be Pre-Law and may receive up to three academic credits per semester. Applications for intern positions may be picked up and returned at either the S.L.S. office or the Billings Front Desk and should be completed by September 10th. No applications will be accepted after September 10th. For further information regarding the S.L.S. or the intern positions, contact either the S.L.S. office (656-4379) or refer to the S.L.S. Student Handbook which may be picked up at the Billings Front Desk.

A Candid Conversation with the Chief

In an interview with the Cynic editorial board, Dr. Lattie Coor, president of the University of Vermont for the past two years, aired his views on a broad range of policy issues. Dr. Coor proved to be an affable gentleman with an avid interest in sail planing, and one of the tougher interviews we've ever had. Dr. Coor served as Washington University's Vice Chancellor before coming to UVM, and had been affiliated with Washington University in various roles since 1967. He graduated with high honors from Northern Arizona University in 1958 and received the President's Award for Outstanding Student in 1956 and 1958 at Northern Arizona. He received his masters degree in Political Science in 1960, graduating with honors from Washington University. In 1964, he received his doctorate in Political Science from Washington University. He is married to Dr. Ina Coor, a professor of Psychology at UVM, and they have three children.

—John Letteri

John Letteri: In the two years that you have been here what do you see as the areas of improvement at the University?

Lattie Coor: An improved sense of morale among the students and the faculty, a sense that this can be a very special university, with a distinctive future; a stabilizing of the financial base of university, balancing the budget so that unexpected expenditures don't cause program changes that we don't expect; a completion of the unfinished major physical requirements of the campus – the Library and the gym – even though there is more we must do on the gym; a drawing together of the physicians in the ambulatory care facility and doing some of the other physical improvements needed on campus; and setting the stage, and this is not personal, it is happening throughout the campus, for a discussion of the educational future and admission of the University. Particularly, the undergraduate program and what we can do to make it better.

JL: In the same vein, what areas since you have been here do you see as needing further work? That haven't come along as you expected, that need an additional boost?

L. Coor: Our finances and the share of our support that comes from the state of Vermont, though it has improved in the past two years, continues to require additional attention. Coupled with that, the understanding throughout Vermont of the role that this university can play in serving the citizens of the state, who come here as students, but more broadly in serving the state in general in its research and its service. As well I think, the mechanisms of governments within the campus, while they have improved in very significant ways, are on the threshold of still greater improvement in the future. And the Faculty Senate is not disappointed at all and I am quite impressed with what has happened but it is just reaching a new stage of maturity, for example, the student leadership mechanism – the Student Association.

JL: Along that same line, the first item you mentioned was financial support and the state of Vermont will have, according to reports, between a 7-8 million dollar budget surplus. Will the University be applying for those funds or a portion of the surplus, or will they stick with the appropriation?

L. Coor: It is not clear whether there will be a separate consideration for that surplus. What we are doing as a result is establishing the basic principles for financing the University in the biannium, the years and fiscal year '80 and '81. We have done that in a set of principles that the trustees considered and adopted just this past weekend at their meeting in St. Johnsbury. And then we will be considering the specific requests we will make of the governor and the legislature, when the board meets here on campus the end of the first week in October. It is our intention to describe the full needs of the University and then to, if the board approves those, to see that they get fully before the governor and the legislature. It will be up to the governor and the legislature to decide whether it is surplus accumulated or continuing funds would be the source.

J.L.: Since you have been here you have placed a larger emphasis on professors publishing, doing research and service. I was wondering why.

L. Coor: I believe that in every faculty member's life there should be a balance with a major commitment to teaching – that is essential except for those faculty members who are exclusively research faculty or service faculty as our extension professionals. Teaching is the dominant commitment they have. But I also believe very strongly that a faculty member cannot be a good teacher unless they have an active scholarly life, that means integrating that work in their own professional scholarly life with what happens in the classroom. It is not different from what faculty members on good campuses do, nor is there a difference from what faculty members on this campus have done. It is an effort to more systematically evaluate and encourage faculty members to enrich their scholarly activity at the same time they pay more attention to teaching so far as service is concerned that inevitably will vary by faculty members. Some now in the College of Education and Social Service for example have direct ties with teaching professionals in the state, others may have much more direct commitments in the classroom and the laboratory and therefore won't have as much service. I guess in summary it is an effort to say that a faculty member must continue to be growing and be creative in order for the teaching to be strong. We are seeking to insure that everybody pursues that kind of balance.

Russell Flannery: Do you feel presently that student input into tenure is at a satisfactory level?

L. Coor: Student evaluation of teaching and the range of activities of faculty members I think is not as good as it should be; it is good, I think that the work of the Albatross has been done. The work being done in the individual schools to draw on the evaluations is good, but it is not as systematic as it should be. Now one of the things in response to John's question that we are doing, whenever a promotion or a recommendation to promotion whether it's tenure or otherwise comes to this office, we require that the department has evaluated the teaching and is able to show us how that teaching has been evaluated, now, that is causing a lot of departments in schools to think much more consciously about how they involve students reviewing the quality of teaching than they have in the past. It is good, but it is not as good as it can be and it is not as good as it is going to be because we believe very strongly in having that evaluation as part of the over-all performance of the faculty member.

R.F.: Is the relationship between colleges at UVM more or less closely bounded than at other universities?

L. Coor: It is less so than many of the various private universities, where at Harvard the colleges they call them "each tub on their own bottom," and financially they are, but operationally they are as well. They function almost as totally separate units. It is less so than at smaller colleges where everything is comprehensive, it is about the same as it is at universities like ours where the difference in the curriculum of a two-year professional program is very different – the requirements are different – than a more general four-year program. It is not an unusual inhibition, let me put it that way, I think the climate is as positive and strong here as it is on other campuses. It is just a question of all of us being self-conscious about what the education of this institution should be.

J.L.: That brings up something else. About the end of April, beginning of May, Education teacher Jim Corologos resigned and left two or three classes. He made the charge that the reasons he resigned were: he didn't think that getting a doctorate and pursuing research and things like that was that necessary. And he felt that education today is creating managers who want to know what to learn rather than leaders who are looking how to learn. And I was wondering how you would respond to that?

L. Coor: I don't know the individual case, so I can't comment on that, but I find the overall goals of the modern university including this one, as rich and as strong as they have ever been in American higher education. What I would find is the absence of a common ground in which people do work. And I find much greater specialization that tends to cause different programs to vary a great deal. But in terms

That was an unfortunate step that I believe is an exception to the cooperative planning that the university and the state colleges have been doing in the past two years for what we call "out reach education" of those activities that take place off the campus – Continuing Education, Extension Education, the role of Vermont ETV – the kind of service activities happening from the campus. The cooperative plan that we have developed over the past two years and I don't know the details of the Johnson Plan. I saw it announced and I think, as many educators have noted including the state college itself, it was a little premature. We are not serving the adult population of Vermont as well as we must. And to serve it well, we need to have a stronger involvement of all the higher education resources – the University, the state colleges, the private institutions when their programs are of interest. For the past two years we have begun to develop a very good cooperative plan. For example, last year we had a joint course listing with the state colleges of every off-campus course offered in Vermont in one four-page insert in every major daily in Vermont. Citizens could see what courses were available. With the appointment of Dr. Fischel as the new associate Vice President for Out Reach we are going to take an even stronger step in that direction and the Johnson State announcement was a bit premature.

R.F.: Will Dr. Forsythe play a more substantial role in legislative relations than his predecessor, Dr. Powers?

L. Coor: No, not in legislative relations. Legislative relations, since I have come here, have been organized directly out of my office. I really spend the time on that and I believe that should be the case. We did make a change in this office a year ago when Dr. Powers was in charge of it, moving the budgeting function that had previously been in this office over to the office of Academic Vice President. Basically, because I believe that academic planning and financial planning have to go hand-in-hand. The only change we made in the job when Dr. Forsythe came was to change the title. It has been called Executive Vice President for some years and that is a little misleading. People ask me what it means, and it is hard to describe. We now call it Vice President for Administration, and that is what Dr. Forsythe does. And that was what Dr. Powers did as well just this past year. It is the office responsible for all our financial affairs for all of our general administrative affairs. Dr. Miser, for example, reports to Vice President Forsythe, and it is the office that draws all of the construction, for example. But the basic structure has not changed except for that shift we made a full year ago.

But the basic structure has not changed except for that shift we made a full year ago.

R.F.: Will you be changing your approach toward legislature?

L. Coor: Will we be more aggressive, is that what you are asking? I think our approach will continue to be as it has been in the past, to present our case as clearly and as forcefully as we can, to make sure that everyone, every public official who has a decision to make on this process and the executive branch and legislative branch know what we are seeking and why we are seeking it and critically know the relationship between the state appropriation and the tuition. That's the very key thing, and I'm not sure that was done as clearly as it could be last year, just by the way our budgeting process was done. We will be clearer about that this year and to be just as informative and forceful as we have been in the past. Will the strategy change? Not particularly, we are getting a broader base of citizens in Vermont, parents and students, and legislators, but also people from general walks of life, who know what the University is doing and who know what its needs are, and I think they will join in the chorus of a little more than in the past. Could I make an observation on student life and the student body because I am very much intrigued with what I see happening in successive years of senior classes now, the search for some new traditions that will build a much greater sense of class spirit and with that university spirit on the campus. I don't know how it will work this year because I know the senior class, and with it the student activities, or Student Association, is working on it. But I sense a much stronger desire for the student body to really coalesce than I did two years ago, to come together around some common themes and common events – Oktoberfest, Winterfest, Red Square Affair are obvious events that are growing. But also around some traditions – Senior Week – there is talk of a Senior Walk again this year as I mentioned earlier. I find increasing evidence of students being interested in these basic questions about their education at UVM, and what we can do to strengthen it, and how we can make it a better place. I just note that to you because it is one of the most strong and positive voices that I have heard on the campus because I am very much impressed with the way I've sensed it grow this year. I also find the kinds of things the Cynic is paying attention to, that are discussed in Student Association, that are very constructive in terms of these issues on how can we make the University of Vermont a better place to be educationally and personally for everyone who is here. You didn't ask me that, but I do want to note that because it is very important in this overall question of morale sense of what we are and where we can go.

R.F.: Have you ever considered a State of the University address to the student body?

L. Coor: Yes, I have. In fact, I would like to do it, but I don't know where or how. I do a State of the University Report that comes out annually and will be out again this October in the Vermont Magazine. You may have recalled the one last year. I also do regular reports to the Faculty Senate and the Staff Council and to the Board of Trustees, which get reported. But I would love to have a forum in which I could address the entire student body, both to tell them what is happening and to tell them what is on my mind and a give-and-take where people could ask questions. We don't even have that for the incoming Freshman class; there was a convocation for the entering Freshmen until the early 1970's, and it just fell by the poor attendance. People just weren't coming to it. I'd love to have that. I think that is how we build a community. But I haven't yet found a way to do it successfully. If you or any of your readers have any suggestions, I would be very much interested.

Can Snelling Be Defea

Both Bernard O'Shea and Ed Grani believe so, and

Ed Granai

All photos by Rob Swanson

Cynic: In a recent interview, you mentioned several things that you'd like to accomplish as governor: to give Vermonters a chance to express their concerns, to relieve the pressure of property taxes, to design a state policy on aging, energy, and to create an equal balance between economic growth and environmental protection. Yet you didn't mention your ideas regarding state aid to education. Specifically, what are your plans for funding for colleges and universities?

Granai: You're talking about higher education?

Cynic: Um-hum.

Granai: Education has always been a top priority for me. I haven't served on a legislative education committee, but I've always fought very hard in the legislature for educational funding, and specifically for the University of Vermont. I was struck when I started at the legislature four years ago about the fact that the university does not have a strong statewide constituency. It's viewed in the legislature, and presumably the legislature reflects their constituency, as a Burlington institution. So I've worked very hard during my years at the legislature to promote UVM as a state institution, and specifically, a higher education institution of top quality available to Vermont students, hopefully at a price they can afford. I'm alarmed at the fact that the percentage of UVM's budget funded by the legislature has steadily gone down and despite what anyone says, the financial commitment that you make to a program or institution is a measure of your support for that institution. I've always been in favor of a strong commitment to the University of Vermont.

Cynic: So, if you are elected, should we expect a more fair appropriation of state money to UVM?

Granai: Yes. I think the University does need funding from the state. I think it's ironic during the time of recession in 1973 the legislature said to the university, we can't afford to give you any money, and they get a whopping surplus two years in a row and still say we can't afford to increase your funding. The question a person at the university has to ask is, is there a commitment of the state, and particularly on the part of the Snelling administration, to strengthen the university and help it be a quality institution affordable to Vermonters.

Cynic: There's been an awful lot of talk about the budget surplus, what do you feel about it? Do you feel it's a good thing to have, or do you feel it represents a choking of state programs to create an aura of good fiscal management on Snelling's part?

Granai: A surplus is preferable to a deficit. A surplus, $21 million last year and $8 million this year, indicates there is something wrong, presumably with our forecasting and fiscal management of an administration that claims to be good at fiscal management. I think it represents the business mentality of the governor, in trying to run the state the same way he does a business. I don't think the state has a right to make a profit; in business you have to make a profit to keep going, that's your goal, but in government, a continuing surplus clearly indicates overtaxation. The fact is that the governor stopped short on tax relief last year when he blocked the repeal of the tax on clothing and medicine because he didn't think we were going to have enough money. Then, we end up with an eight million dollar surplus. I think this is either deception or fiscal mismanagement, it's either one or the other.

Cynic: Do you have any proposed use for the surplus?

Granai: Yes, I think the surplus should be returned to the people. The biggest pressure people are currently feeling is the property tax, so I think part of the surplus should go to increase the property tax rebates to Vermont homeowners and renters; part of it should go to increased state aid to localities for public schools; and the sales tax on clothing and medicine be repealed. The size of the surplus and the current revenue forecast indicate that these things can be done without increasing the tax burden on people because we are still experiencing real economic growth – there will be the revenues to do this without increasing taxes.

Cynic: You've compared Governor Snelling's way of running the state government to a Nixonian autocracy, and charged Snelling's administration with stifling state employees and state employee initiative. How would you handle state employees and staff?

Granai: I think Mr. Snelling and I are two very different types of persons. I'm a businessman and have been a businessman for 25 years, and, I think, a successful one. My style of management is quite different from Mr. Snelling's. I will not concede he is an effective manager. Number one, he campaigned on the promise to reduce the number of employees in state government. He's inflated his own personal staff, presumably because of his style of management, where he wants to make every decision and run every program in the state. He's added nine positions to the executive office staff, where there are now 31 positions with a payroll of one half million dollars. That payroll is double what previous governors have had. This is the governor's office in Vermont, not the White House. That's a greatly inflated staff. He has added 341 state employee positions, and 22 percent more appointed positions. Now, this to me is not good management. Beyond that, he has periodically issued gag orders to department heads and...

Cynic: Gag orders.

Granai: It's a characterization used in press accounts to characterize memorandums from some of his (Snelling's) agency heads saying 'clear everything with their office before you talk to the press, or to the public, or to the legislature.' He and his agency heads have stifled free and open communication between government and the people and within government to the point where, in terms of my contact with state employees and feedback I'm getting, morale among state employees is at an all time low despite the fact the legislature has given them substantial increases in pay. I don't know if the word is substantial, but we've tried to bring their salaries up after the recession years when it was difficult to give them increases. The morale is still lower than ever because of the oppressive style of management, and this becomes an issue for the voters because it may also affect services. The taxpayer worries about the value for the tax dollar paid and if the people are discouraged and browbeaten and have low morale, then they're not going to be providing the services.

Cynic: I see you have also charged that Snelling has failed to come up with a unified state energy policy or established credible control of the state's utilities. Do you have an energy policy planned?

Granai: I would propose and re-introduce a bill we worked very hard on last year in the legislature. The administration blocked it in the Senate after we had passed it in the house. The bill would create an energy planning department independent of the Public Service Board, and a consumer advocacy section to protect the rate-payers' interests. I think the whole question of energy is far too important to leave to the consensus of private utilities. The utilities are not making adequate proposals for future energy sources. If we had an energy planning department where the state could take the initiative, the state could take the lead in energy planning. As far as I can see now, the state simply reacts to proposals by various utilities. We need a strong energy department.

Cynic: You've said "if we lose the farms, we lose Vermont." I was wondering if you'd elaborate on that.

Granai: When you think of Vermont, you think of a rural state and an agricultural economy. That's more than an image. Historically and currently, it's a very important part of our way of life. Currently there are 13,000 farms in Vermont, and the numbers now show that at the present rate of decline, by 1985 there will be only 7,000, which means within the decade Vermont farming will be gone to Vermont if we leave them to the impersonal economic forces that exist. Economics as we now practice them are going to put Vermont farmers financially out of business. I think the state needs a commitment saying farming and the agricultural part of our economy are essential to our way of life and we're going to have to make a commitment to it. Commitment means an aggressive promotion of farming and support in terms of making available low interest loans, tax incentives, tax relief for farmers, encouraging or providing assistance to farm management, an aggressive effort on the part of the extension service to help assist the farmer. It isn't that farmers aren't willing to work hard, but they need financial management assistance, and there's no reason we can't provide this for them. In this business of putting industry against farming, we all say we want jobs, but the fact is that we can't sit here and watch 6,000 jobs, which are agricultural jobs, which represent Vermont and watch those disappear and wring our hands. The development section of the Agriculture Department has a budget of $35,000. The Agency of Development and Community Affairs has a budget of $250,000 to promote business and industry coming into Vermont. It has various kinds of loans and subsidy programs that amount to millions of dollars to promote

o, and recently explained to John Letteri why.

Bernard O'Shea

"Snelling hasn't started any agricu... promotion programs. I would... move the Agriculture Departmen... away from a regulatory agency to a promoter of aggressive plans to help the farmer."

Cynic: I noticed in your press releases that you are concerned with such things as energy, overtaxation, and the plight of the farmer. Your position on state aid to higher education, however, wasn't specifically mentioned. How strong a commitment will your administration make to UVM and other colleges and universities?

O'Shea: I have been chairman of the higher education commission of the state of Vermont for the last several years. I know the problems of higher education pretty well. It was already stated to both of the state college administrations and to the university that I would be a governor supportive of higher education. The crucial question is how to gain the resources with which we support higher education. One of the real problems over the years in Vermont is that we have placed the financing for the elementary and secondary education on the property tax. That is pinching more and more. What I have proposed in this campaign is the changing of that formula so secondary and primary education is supported primarily by a mini local income tax. I think the people are ready for this judging from the responses I have been getting from the campaign around the state. This would mean more funds would be freed up for other purposes instead of the forty million dollars that we now need for state aid to primary and secondary education. With this tax we would need only about ten million dollars. So we would be able to relieve the taxpayers at both the medium and lower income level. I think the regular income tax we have now, which is the federal tax, which a piggyback in the state, has quite a few loopholes. Remember Jimmy Carter promised he would bring tax reform a few years ago. Still, it's a lot more equitable and a fairer tax than the property tax which really taxes people on fixed incomes, particularly retired people. So, in this way, I would be the most effective governor for higher education which for the first time will begin to put all education under its own tax space for primary and secondary education and this means that the legislature will be prepared for much more handling and be more supportive of higher education.

Cynic: How do you view the state surplus and what are your plans, if any, for use of the surplus monies?

O'Shea: The way Governor Snelling has behaved with the budget is the worst kind of politics. He's trying to take opportunistic advantage of having a surplus, and he's even set in his mind what the surplus should be; so his lieutenants around him have not found funds or accounts at appropriate times or postponed reporting them for another month or another fiscal year so that they could conform to the surplus he set in his head. This is the worst kind of political leadership. What I would do as governor is to report the state's income and expenses once a month, and it would be non-political. I would be in consultation with the legislature and the joint fiscal committee and we'd keep the surplus as low as possible. In other words, the surplus really means we're overtaxing the people. I would even risk a deficit rather than go for a surplus. I would also be a much tougher governor in terms of pruning state budgets. But I think the surplus game should be put behind us, and we should consult with the legislature before we announce the monthly report so the people wouldn't be confused and feel that we're playing games with them.

Cynic: The House passed a bill decriminalizing marijuana in the last session, but the Senate did not. What is your position on the decriminalization of marijuana?

O'Shea: Personally, I don't care for marijuana or any other drugs, but the people who want and like marijuana, they have a right. I would be supportive of the House vote on decriminalization, and I think in the next session, if I'm governor, you'll see a decriminalization bill passed. A lot of people want it, and I shouldn't impose my own personal lifestyle in terms of the law.

Cynic: Would you explain your proposed Quebec-Vermont intergovernmental commission and what you see it as accomplishing?

O'Shea: This came up during a talk I had with Rene Levesque, the premier of Quebec, and he was very interested and supportive of a close relationship with Vermont. What I'm proposing is that we have an intergovernmental commission between Quebec and Vermont which would be membered by people who vote, mandated by the parliament there and the legislature here, and appointed by the Prime minister and governor. I would move with the purpose of gaining more hydro-electric power, more educational exchanges, and indeed borrowing from each other's educational system because we have a lot to learn from what Quebec has done over the last ten years in lifting the skills, the insights, and the general education of the young Quebecois. In the field of agriculture, there is already some cooperation, but there could be a lot more. Then, generally, we could help solve a lot of problems like Lake Champlain and be supportive and complimentary to the international joint commission, for example helping with the problem of building a dam on the Richelieu River.

Cynic: Since Governor Snelling has almost silenced state employees, and closed up the government in general, and at the same time seemingly disregarded the farmer in favor of big industry, I was wondering what proposals you might have to alleviate these two problems.

O'Shea: Well, you're asking two questions. First, it would be more my style to open government and I would pursue policy to do so. The work force in this state would be more cooperative and more productive if they felt more open, and a leadership should encourage that. The state work force needs a new leader, that's pretty clear. I've advocated the Labor Relations Board have on as a member a delegate from the Vermont State Employees Association, and I've recommended the state look more supportively on second careers for people. I've also advocated against double dippers, people drawing income from one level of government and another income from the state level. I would be a governor more concerned with the people in state government. I'm more of a team person, and not an autocrat. Now, your second question concerning...

Cynic: Governor Snelling is encouraging large industry to come into the state, for example, the Digital Corporation. So my question is what kind of industry would you encourage to Vermont?

O'Shea: I would encourage capital into the state. I'm very supportive of new capital in the state, it's the way you develop. But I would also be strong in the kind of capital that comes in. I would tend to pursue more small capital, more industry of a smaller kind, which I think is more appropriate for the state. I don't fault the governor entirely. What I'm saying is we can't afford to let any more rural Vermont disappear. Pretty close to a billion dollars of our two and a half billion dollar economy in the state is agriculture or agriculture-related. We are seeing more and more farms go out. We had at one time 25,000 farms and now we're down to four thousand. If the present governor stays in office, we'll see that number down to two thousand. He hasn't started any agriculture promotion programs. Specifically, the change I would make would entail a substantial reorganization of the Agriculture Department, moving it away from a regulatory agency to a promoter of aggressive plans to help the farmer, to put him on the offensive rather than the defensive. It should be established with state statutes consistent with 1980, and not those written a generation ago when Vermont farming was assumed, and not thought of as threatened. Now I think we are in danger of seeing Vermont lose its total rural environment. It's not just aesthetically bad to see the open spaces disappearing, but it represents a change in the lifestyle of Vermonters as well. I've also proposed an Agriculture Development Authority which would give low cost loans to farmers to build silos or buy machinery. My opponent (Granai) has picked up on this too, and that's good. I'm glad he's supporting me. Some farmers are paying 15-17 percent interest on loans. I think that's unconscionable. We have to get the cost of capital down. We also have to try and create markets for them. More than 90 percent, and again my opponent has picked up on this, more than 90 percent of the food consumed in Vermont comes from outside Vermont. We are a rural agricultural state. It doesn't make any sense. The present administration is silent about this, their head isn't into it. We need a governor who will pursue these programs.

Cynic: Governor Snelling admittedly has faults. Yet, he is a Republican incumbent, he has presided over two years of economic well-being...

O'Shea: He's been lucky.

Cynic: He's a pretty strong candidate, and my question is why have you entered the race and challenged him?

O'Shea: Because I think I'm the strongest person to challenge him. I think we need a strong governor and I would be that. He's been weak in my estimat... He's industry and we've got $35,000 to promote agriculture. And that's incredible. It demonstrates the priorities of the present administration. I would propose the agency of development be just as concerned with agriculture as industry.

Cynic: You're running against a popular, incumbent governor who's presided over a couple of years of economic well being, he's a Republican in a predominantly Republican state. Why did you choose to run against him?

Granai: I think basically because I am a native Vermonter and have a very deep feeling and love for my state. I feel we're at a very critical point of our development. Vermont exists in the middle of the highest population concentration in the country. There are tremendous pressures on Vermont to become a part of the megalopolis, to become an extension of the population centers, to become a suburb, if you will, of the major cities, a bedroom community and/or a playground and force Vermonters into being a servant class. You look at the employment statistics, the biggest increase, month after month, is in the service area. I don't think this has to be. Governor Snelling represents the big business, big development mentality, and one aspect of this is there's been absolutely benign neglect of environmental issues. Despite what he says, you look at his record, at what he does from day to day, and I think we're ignoring the farm and agricultural community. You put all of these things together and you have a situation which is alarming and endangers Vermont. If we try to identify, and if the person who is governor tries to identify for Vermonters the values which are special to Vermonters, to our way of life, I think Vermonters will be willing to make the commitment to promote these values, and to promote our way of life so that we can continue to be a place where personal values and interpersonal relationships along with adequate space can be an important part of our life. All the reasons people want to come to Vermont from the large population centers must be preserved, and if so, then we won't have to worry about going after the kind of industry that we want. If we maintain the quality of life in Vermont, and the clean industry, and the labor intensive or higher paying, or whatever, will be knocking at our door.

been passive in letting the budget grow; income comes in and he puts more and more of it into the existing bureaucracy. I would be tough about priorities we set, and see that those priorities are undergirted so that we can do things for education and farming with a strong leadership. I'm running partly for that reason and also because I'd be a heckuva lot better governor. I don't think people can see the difference between the rise in prosperity, which is reflected well on the face of the governor, and the lack of any new programs in state government. Personal income is growing, but we still have the status quo, watching the governor playing games with the surplus instead of using the surplus for what I think are human needs. The strength of my administration is that we'd meet our immediate human needs with monies from increased income. We'd also look at substantial tax cuts, both at the middle and low income levels.

This governor is not only playing games with the surplus, but also with politics. If he's elected, I think he plans to run for vice-president. I think people ought to look at that and see if they want to re-elect a guy who'll be running for the vice-presidential nomination in 1980. He's already made signs, substantial signs, that he wants to be vice president and he wants the nomination. He's been to Michigan to support Gerald Ford, and in a sense pushed out Bill Milliken, the governor out there. Bill would be a good vice-presidential candidate, he's attractive and bright, but obviously can't run with Gerald Ford. So I think Richard's already chosen his nominee for President and he would run with him. He's got ambitions on a national level and will use the state house as a launching pad for those ambitions. Myself, a man of modest means, a man of tougher drive, and a man with a team of people who will make substantive changes in government, will benefit the state and its people.

Food Fads & Facts

If We Are What We Eat, We're In Trouble

Barry Gustin

Have you ever imagined what it was like to walk through a food store 75 years ago? It was an experience completely unlike that of walking through a modern day supermarket. In fact, if our great-grandparents spent a day shopping with us, they would be thoroughly amazed and possibly even shocked.

Along with such traditional foods as milk, apples, and lettuce, they would see an array of industrial-age products that would leave them wondering whether they were in a toy, hardware, or food store. Taking a typical item and reading the list of ingredients, they would see such things as sodium caseinate, polysorbate 60, hydrogenated vegetable oil and propyl gallate. Indeed, they would be hard-pressed to tell us what we were eating.

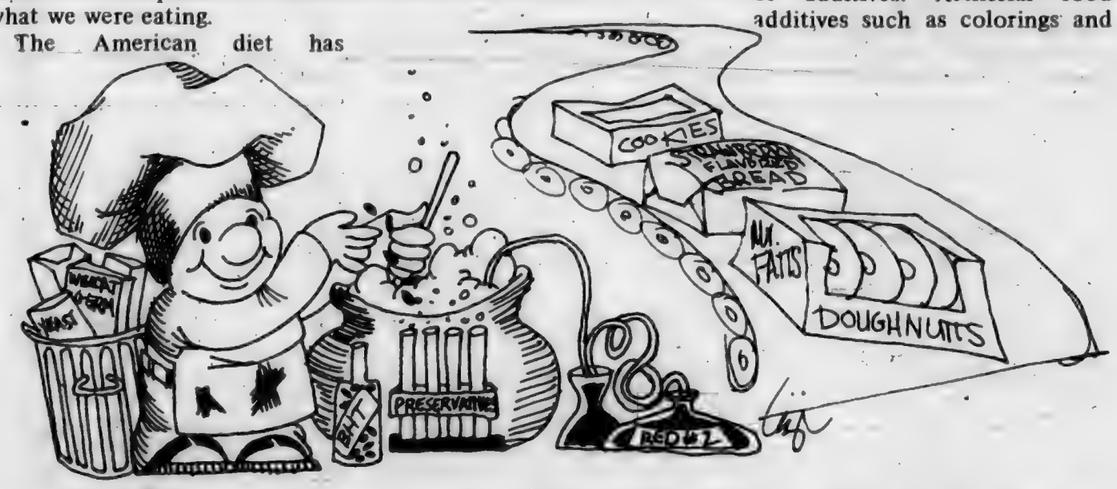
The American diet has changed drastically since the beginning of the century. As technology, urbanization, and big business have increased, the food industry has made the American appetite worth over $200 billion a year. Not surprisingly, the industry chooses to market most aggressively those foods that are most profitable. "Specialized" foods – those that are unique and can be sold by brand name – bring higher returns to manufacturers than do basic commodities which are highly competitive. Store owners also guide our food choices by placing well-advertized products at certain strategic places such as at "end of the aisle" displays or at the check-out counter. Even children are influenced by eye-level displays of their favorite sugared cereal.

Vending machines were rare a hundred years ago. Now, about $10 billion a year or 5% of our food dollar is spent at these machines. But the largest development over the years has been the restaurant. Presently, one out of every three food dollars is spent at restaurants, especially fast-food establishments. The limited choices that are available in a typical fast-food restaurant have encouraged a trend toward a diet composed of relatively few different foods. Although supermarkets still offer a choice by stocking fresh vegetables, fruits, and other nutritious foods, Americans are more often than not deprived of that choice elsewhere. For example, try to buy your fish-o-fillet on a whole wheat bun or try to get a can of orange juice or an apple out of a vending machine.

The amounts and types of food we eat have changed over the years. (See accompanying chart.) Generally, "whole" foods have been sorely neglected while refined and reconstituted foods have become dominant. In 1910, Americans consumed 3.6 pounds of rye and barley per person. In 1976, this figure had dropped to 1 pound. Wheat flour, used primarily for bread, was an important staple of the traditional American diet, providing a major source of nutrients. Since 1910, we have eaten 48% less, dropping from 215 pounds per person to 110 pounds per person per year. Whereas flour and grain products supplied 38% of our calories in 1910, they furnished only 19% of our calories in 1976. Whole grains and their flours used to be America's chief source of protein providing 36% of the total. Today, our protein intake is primarily from meat, the consumption of which has increased steadily over the past 25 years. This increase in meat has also been partially responsible for the increase of fats in our diets.

The idea that Americans should get as much protein as possible is erroneous. The average American consumes nearly twice the National Academy of Science's Recommended Daily Allowance of protein and roughly three times the amount recommended by the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization. Since medical evidence tends to suggest that diets excessively high in protein may be harmful, the belief "if some is good, more is better" is in error.

1976 was a landmark year for the soft drink industry. Americans drank 493 eight-ounce servings each that year – an all-time high and a 12.3% (54 serving) increase over 1975. This has occurred with a simultaneous decrease in total milk consumption from roughly 47 gallons per person in 1945 to 33 gallons in 1976. Soft drinks are cheap, shelf-stable, and well-advertized. Unfortunately, they are also calorie-filled and nutrient-empty.



These dietary changes would only be of academic interest if it were not for their linkage to significant changes in public health. The proliferation of industrially refined and processed foods has led to a reduction in the nutritional adequacy of the American diet. Although some technological advances have increased the safety of the food supply, the greater consequence has been to rob the food of most of its nutrients and to contribute substances that have no known nutritional value.

The average American annually consumes about 7 lbs of additives. Artificial food additives such as colorings and flavorings do not serve any legitimate purpose. They simply provide an inexpensive method for the food manufacturer to reduce his own cost by substituting imitation constituents for the "real thing." For example, artificial color makes egg bread look yellow while caramel color makes white bread look like whole wheat. An artificial color even imitates the orange in some brands of orange juice. Other commonly used additives (preservatives, emulsifiers, stabilizers, etc.) have made it possible to concoct totally new products. These "brand name" foods are highly advertized and usually produce high financial returns for the manufacturers. Of the $6 billion spent on food advertizing in 1976, the vast majority was for snack foods, overly sugared breakfast cereals, and nutritionally worthless soft drinks. It is not that the food firms are trying to produce bad food. Rather they are not trying to produce good food. Their objective is to produce profits, and food quality is only a second consideration.

This economical short-cut has backfired. The Food and Drug Administration is discovering that many of these chemicals, especially the colorings, lead to severe disease in laboratory animals.

Red dye no. 2 and Red dye no. 4, two of the most widely used food colorings, recently were removed from the market when it was found that they caused cancer and other structural changes in animals.

Another group of additives, "nitrites," are used to give hot dogs, bologna, and other packaged meats their bright pink color, which adds to their appeal. Furthermore, they allegedly prevent the growth of bacteria which cause botulism, a type of food poisoning. It's been known for many years that these "nitrites" in combination with other substances in the stomach form "nitrosamines" – powerful cancer causing agents. As the controversy over this additive increases, a ban is inevitably forthcoming but it is inconceivable that such a hazardous chemical could have gotten into our food supply in the first place. With adequate testing, a safer preservative could easily have been found. The same can be said of BHT, another commonly used preservative which has come under attack by the FDA for its ability to produce lung tumors in laboratory animals.

One by one, previously acceptable chemicals have been banned – but what about the damage already done? Is it fair to say that the yearly increase in cancer deaths during the last quarter century is due, in part, to the ingestion of these toxic substances?

Public trust in the food producers has not been well placed. Even in the rare instances when artificial chemicals are not added to foods the industry compensates for its good heartedness by withdrawing most of what is worthwhile in a process they so eloquently titled "refining." When wheat is milled down to white flour, more than half of each of 14 essential vitamins and minerals are lost. The "enriched" white bread on American grocery shelves replaces only four of them. Yet these nutrients are essential to health. Consequently, they must be procured elsewhere.

The potato, a dietary staple through the ages, is a cheap and nutritious non-fattening food. In 1960, the average American ate 108 pounds of potatos, 85 pounds of which were bought fresh. In 1976, Americans were eating about the same amount of potatos but only 48 pounds were fresh. The remainder is refined and used for french fries, potato chips, and other products. The nutritional losses are great bur worse, these oily products are an addition to a diet already too high in fat.

The process which produces sugar is yet another example of food refining. The result of this process is 99% pure crystalline sucrose devoid of any of the original trace minerals and vitamins. Sugar used to be considered a treat because it was used sparingly. In 1976, the word "treat" has faded into the distant past as Americans consumed nearly 100 pounds of table sugar mostly hidden in the multitude of processed foods such as soft drinks, snack foods, ketchup, biscuit mixes, canned vegetables, and cereals. Including other forms of caloric sweeteners (corn syrup, dextrose, etc.), we now consume over 125 pounds of total sweeteners each year per capita. In perspective, Americans ate only about 102 pounds of beef in 1976. In 1909, sweets comprised only about 11% of the daily intake of calories but in 1976, this statistic was up to nearly 20%. Sweeteners furnish virtually only calories to our diet, and either displace other more valuable substances rich in proteins, essential fats, fiber, minerals and vitamins or contribute additional calories to the diet possibly leading to obesity (overweight). Obesity, in turn, increases the risk of heart disease, diabetes, and other health problems. Furthermore, the sweeteners cause tooth decay – particularly when eaten in sticky foods or as between meal snacks.

In 1977, the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, with George McGovern as the chairperson, released a timely report linking the average American diet to six of the ten leading causes of death in this country including heart disease, cancer, diabetes, and stroke. Although far from perfect, the report, "Dietary Goals for the United States," is "long overdue considering the urgency of the problem of nutrition-related disease and the confusion of the public as a result of conflicting information it has been receiving," according to Dr. William Kannel, a leading neart disease researcher at the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute. The paper stresses that Americans are consuming too much total fat, saturated fat, salt, and sugar, and do not eat enough whole grains, fresh fruit, and fresh vegetables.

TOO MUCH FAT!

The most alarming change in our diet since the turn of the century has been our growing fat intake. We eat 28% more fat than our ancestors 60 years ago. Because fat is the most concentrated source of food energy supplying 9 calories per gram, overconsumption could very easily lead to obesity and then to other health problems. Forty percent of all adult Americans are overweight. Clearly, this represents a serious problem. In addition, statistics given by Dr. Gio Gori, Deputy Director of the National Cancer Institute, have shown that there is a strong correlation between the increasing consumption of dietary fat and the increasing incidence of breast and colon cancer — two of the most common forms of cancer in this country. Giving special attention to saturated fat whose major source is meat and dairy, the Senate committee provided evidence showing that saturated fat elevates the level of cholesterol in the blood, consequently producing an increased risk of heart disease. Since heart disease is the leading cause of death in this country, claiming over 700,000 lives annually, a reduction in saturated fat by reducing the consumption of meat and whole dairy products is warranted.

Okay. One could say this all makes a great deal of sense but where could one find "good food," low in fat, salt, sugar, and non-essential additives? At first glance, it appears as if there are no alternatives. Every major road in America is crowded with fast-food outlets while supermarkets are filled with nutritionally inferior convenience foods. This is perpetuated by an advertizing program which supports these foods. Even the majority of physicians who receive little or no nutrition education in medical schools are at a loss to advise us on matters of diet and health. Is there anything left to eat? The answer is enthusiastically Yes!

Seek out bonafide whole grain breads. Eat plenty of beans, fresh vegetables, low-fat dairy ( yogurt milk, cheese), chicken, fish, fruits, lean meats, and whole grain cereals such as brown rice, barley, and oatmeal. With these foods, one could produce an array of delicious dishes. Some of these foods, it is true, may contain small amounts of unwanted chemicals, but the objective for the health conscious consumer is to simply minimize their intake. So do yourself a favor. Explore your supermarket, co-op, or natural foods store. Make it a point to try something new every week. Consult a cookbook for how-to information. If we bought less of the "bad" foods and demanded more of the "good" foods, the manufacturers and store owners would be happy to oblige. Their interests would simply be redirected. Maybe then, our great-grandparents would have a more comfortable and enjoyable visit.

"We eat 28% more fat than our ancestors 60 years ago. . . 40% of all adult Americans are overweight. Clearly, this represents a serious problem."

Soccer Cats Eye Yankee Conference Crown

By Steven Larose

Daily practice sessions and scrimmages are allowing the University of Vermont varsity soccer team and coach Paul Reinhardt to piece together a puzzle that includes a new defensive system, more offensive patience and a greater willingness to interact as a team.

The Soccer Cats have been holding daily workouts for several weeks, after a lukewarm showing in a scrimmage against Onita State. In a recent interview Coach Reinhardt remarked "the scrimmage showed that we have to find our direction and formation, and we had to design a new program. It was a learning process that pointed out the things that needed to be done. In these practice sessions we have placed emphasis on conditioning and pairing players. We've been reviewing the basic fundamentals in order to establish a system of play."

Reinhardt stated that he has a grasp on the individual strengths of his players and has developed a system. But he cautioned that the players must support that system to assure its success. "My ultimate goal is to have other teams come into Centennial field and adjust to our style of play. But to do this we must believe in what we do."

The Catamounts will have to work hard together to achieve a dominating role on the field. According to Reinhardt, the squad needs the willingness to interact between the individual kickers and their respective lines. Reinhardt conceded that he is still developing a system. He plans to blend the system and his instruction into a controlled scrimmage that hopefully will iron out any of the kinks the soccer team still has. Players are currently [illegible] baffled by the new formation, but [illegible] commented that they perfect a primary system before they can even begin to map out an alternative plan. Reinhardt declined to detail the mysterious new formation, but he did disclose that it is patterned more after the personal attributes of the individual players than last year's 3-2-2-3 formation. Last year found considerable pressure was put on the halfbacks to keep the ball up front, whereas this year Reinhardt hopes to control the ball better and have more midfield support.

A closer look at the Vermont Soccer picture this year finds the attackmen (front line) dropping back more quickly to play a greater role in defense. Although this will create more running and pressure for the forwards, Reinhardt hopes that will cause more early turnovers. Reinhardt will do more substitution on the front line this year to enable the Cat forwards to keep fresher and apply greater pressure.

Graduation has thinned the half and full back lines considerably, with Tim Beal, Geoff Greig, Carl Christensen Mark Stevenson and Mark Clements not returning this year. Reinhardt, however, sees no shortage in talent this year, as Dan Bryant and David Allen have been elected Co-captains. According to Reinnardt, these two seniors create an environment in which the team can be productive. "These two captains provide quality leadership and set an example for the other team members," remarked Reinhardt.

Bart Farley and Peter Nostrand will return as UVM's pair of goalies, who Reinhardt rates as "extremely capable." Dan Bryant, UVM Soccer's "Secretary of Defense" returns to his sweeper back position. The Cats' scoring punch should come from Zareh Avakian, Mike Winstanley and Larry Stone, a 'B program' recruit. When questioned about the halfback line's assets, Reinhardt simply stated "hard work. Barry Ryan will be all over the place and Brian Fleming returns with his special brand of hustle." On defense, the Cats will rely on Peter McLiverty and Freshmen recruits Greg Ward and Bill Nedde. Dan Taranovich and Jack Milbank return to anchor the fullback line. Reinhardt also singled out Jeff Merrill as having excellent potential on the front line.

Reinhardt remarked that his main goals were not to allow the opposition to score easily. "Under the new system we will have more time on defense to draw the ball back and regenerate an attack. We must control our reactions and be more patient," the soccer mentor stressed.

The individual team members' attitudes are meshing now and are building to a point play combination that can be Reinhardt. "Although in the early assigned on the field," said practice sessions, players were concerned with survival and struggle, the team members' thoughts have turned to those of support and assistance now that the final cuts have been made and the UVM soccer roster is complete," Reinhardt remarked.

Reinhardt predicts that Rhode Island and UConn will be contenders in the Yankee Conference race, with Boston University and UMass as serious threats. When asked where UVM would fit into the scheme, he replied, "right in the thick of it.

On any given day any one of those five top teams can beat each other. It's getting too close for comfort." Reinhardt has his sights set on doing well in the Yankee Conference, but insisted that the first three away games will be the key to how successful UVM will be.

Reinhardt concluded by commenting that things look brighter each day for the soccer cats, and he has seen a measurable amount of growth each day. But he cautioned "the true test is a contest."

Last year the UVM soccer team racked up 12 wins and 3 losses with 1 tie. Regular season losses were at the hands of Rhode Island (1-0) and Keene State (3-1). Vermont lost their first round bid in the NCAA's to Rhode Island, 1-0. This year, Vermont will kick off with a home-opener against St. Lawrence at Burlington on Sept. 19 (Tuesday) at 3 p.m. Then the Cats travel to Plattsburgh St. and Boston University on Sept. 21 (Thurs.) and Sept. 29 (Fri.), respectively.

A Comment on the Gubernatorial Race

In the campaign for Vermont's democratic gubernatorial nomination, the discussions of issues reflect a commonality among contestant ideologies. Mr. Granai and Mr. O'Shea have each expressed concern over the plight of the Vermont farmer and the possible loss of Vermont's rural environment due to the business mentality of the present administration. Both candidates favor the decriminalization of marijuana and increasing state aid to education.

The two men most rigorously share a strong dislike for incumbent Republican Richard Snelling's use of the budget surplus as a political tool. Some might argue the eight million dollar surplus is not an issue at all, that debates on the surplus cloud discussion of other more important matters. The surplus, however, represents the very core of Governor Snelling's style of governmental management. The very fact a surplus exists at all indicates taxpayers are not benefitting as they should from a healthy economy. Mr. Granai proposed a repeal of the clothing and medicine taxes, as well as a badly needed increase in funding to state programs. Mr. O'Shea proposes slashing property taxes and has said the surplus really means "overtaxation."

In addition, the surplus seems to grow closer and closer to Governor Snelling's forecast as administration officials "find" lost checks or rediscover unused accounts. How timely these new funds appear to enter the picture. And what prior knowledge does Vermont have of these unexpected bequeaths of cash? None. Again, the surplus lends itself to a discussion of Snelling's style of management. Government employees are told what to say and when to say it on a regular basis. Mr. Granai said state employee morale was at "an all time low."

Finally, when governments show a surplus, in essence they make a profit. Businesses make profits, state governments should not. When a government is run like a business, then a business mentality becomes an integral part of the state government. Businesses are encouraged to come to Vermont by an agency armed with a $250,000 budget and low interest loans, among other incentives, in a state that depends on agriculture for half of its economy. In the words of Bernard O'Shea, "it doesn't make sense." Farmers are assisted with an agency with a budget of $35,000. Mr. Granai and Mr. O'Shea propose programs that will aggressively promote farming, offer low interest loans, and provide educational assistance via the extension service.

In conclusion, Vermont state government is led by a man whose policies indicate he has no real sense of what Vermont needs, operates a closed, inflated bureaucracy, and doesn't address energy or environmental issues with any emphasis. Fresh ideas in line with the development, energy, economic, and environmental needs of the state are essential. Indeed, it is time for a change.

—John Letteri

Later...

Although it mentally seems Summer has yet to begin, this issue marks the 1978 Summer Cynic's final edition, as well as my last editorial contribution to this publication.

Since I could not fit my previously scheduled closing piece, "The Falacy of a Philosophically Diverse Faculty at UVM", into two and one half inches, I'd simply like to thank those who contributed to the Summer Cynic's most successful edition yet.

This issue's third section is simply titled "Vermont", which is a premier supplement in a Cynic "Back to School Issue." By selecting articles ranging from skiing to sightseeing, we hope to ease the Back to School Issue's traditional flood of short stories.

If you have any interest in print/media-related fields, i.e., journalism, graphic design or sales, the Cynic is 'looking for a few good people' and will hold a general informational meeting on Monday, September 11, at 8 p.m., in lower Billings Center. If you have had writing or graphic experience, please bring a sample of your work. If you're an admitted amateur but are willing to learn, just attend. The future is yours.

The Politics of Science

In a world where a multitude of non-scientific factors (social, cultural, economic, political, etc.) generally govern the direction society takes, one cannot help but wonder at the benign neglect of most science courses to these forces of the world. For four consecutive falls, the science major returns to an academic world of freeze-dried facts, preserved in test tubes and textbooks, and passed on like family heirlooms from generation to generation. The problem lies not in the inherent irrelevance or sterility of the sciences (a widely held belief of humanities majors), but rather in the failure of these disciplines to acknowledge societal influences on scientific fact. This head-in-the-sand approach has made for some rather rude awakenings for scientists throughout history as well as in the lives of present day scientist and students. Examples of this are not limited, and for the sake of argument, I have chosen a few of the more obvious.

In the late 1800's, Swedish chemist Alfred Nobel stumbled upon the idea of adding the calcified crushed remains of long-dead sea animals to nitroglycerin, a highly explosive but unstable liquid. The new material, dynamite, was as explosive as nitroglycerin but easily handled, and it revolutionized the art of modern warfare. Nobel was so saddened by the applications of his discovery that he left the bulk of his fortune in trust, monies from which are now awarded annually as the Nobel prize.

While on the subject of explosives, one must not forget Albert Einstein, whose theory of relativity paved the way for the atomic bomb. It is only speculation as to what was going through Einstein's head when he saw the newsreel photographs of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Perhaps he was one of the first science majors in history to wish that someone had stolen his notebooks. In his later years Einstein was to speak eloquently but fruitlessly against the development of nuclear power.

UVM students get their doses of irony as well, particularly in subject areas relating directly or indirectly to food. Once again though, students don't always realize the political implications of the material they are learning, repeating in a less-dangerous way the mistakes of Nobel and Einstein.

For example, Plant and Soil Science students learn about the dangers of broad spectrum pesticides (chemicals which kill both harmful and beneficial insects and other animals). Many of these pesticides are now banned in the U.S., but not in foreign countries, where they continue to be applied. Why? Because American chemical companies put tremendous pressure on the Congress and the EPA not to restrict their foreign sales. The result? Chemicals that are dangerous enough to be banned in the U.S. are produced within our borders and shipped overseas. More DDT is being used worldwide now than in 1967. Never mind the incalculable health and environmental consequences for the people of these countries, what about the scientific "fact" that insects are simply too dumb to recognize national boundaries? This succinctly political-economic reality cannot be gleaned from the standard entomology text, yet historical examples of non-indigenous insects wreaking havoc on U.S. agriculture abound.

Anyone who has ever taken a climatology or meteorology course probably knows about the crucial influence of the Amazon river basin on global weather cycles. What you don't learn is that this vast but extremely fragile rainforest ecosystem is currently and rapidly being decimated at bargain prices. Rural land in Brazil sells for about the cost of a cigarette pack per acre, and with government encouragement, transnational corporations have bought up huge tracts for the sole purpose of harvesting timber. No significant attempt at reforestation has been made, and besides, with land that cheap, who wants to? Unfortunately, it's a scientific fact that uncovered land in the tropics can turn into a permanent cement-like substance after a few rains. It's also a scientific fact that no trees can grow on this "soil." The resulting changes in drainage and evapotranspiration (water evaporated from the ground or through plants) over areas of widespread deforestation could well mean drastic alterations of global weather patterns. Experts can debate the meterological consequences of Brazilian Deforestation ad nauseum, but what it means to a farmer is that "if it don't rain, plants don't grow." If this ever happens it will be because of political and economic reasons and not because scientists didn't forecast or warn against it.

Scientists are often the first to argue that the function of science is to explore, not interpret, and science courses generally reflect this 'what-me-worry' naivete. The reason frequently given is that there is too much to learn already, and professors cannot be bothered. The trouble is, if scientists cannot or refuse to account for the sociopolitical forces that determine how data is applied once it becomes available to the public, how can they hope to do effective, meaningful research? In a generation where technology has produced such socially useful inventions as napalm, germ warfare, neutron bombs and feminine deodorant, it becomes increasingly difficult to argue the merits of blind knowledge as a prerequisite for good scientists.

Looking at UVM from this perspective, it is good to know that things are looking better for the future, if only because they can't get much worse. For the first time ever, the nutrition department is offering a course entitled "The Politics of Food." If the reading list is any indication, the course promises to be thought-provoking. The technology department lists a course in "Technology and Society" and the environmental studies, education and social services and sociology departments have offered similarly oriented courses in the past. In addition, the Center for World Education in 534 Waterman has scores of books and other resources on global problems and the role of science.

Hopefully, more and more academic disciplines will discover that science is more than just the one-dimensional pursuit of facts, and reflect this in their course offerings. It is not necessary for biochemistry courses to discuss politics for half a semester, but a couple of lectures or maybe a course in each department would certainly help in keeping future scientists more in touch with reality. Perhaps this is just an idle dream, and if history is any precedent, things are not likely to change. Still, contemporary scientists such as Barry Commoner, Amory Lovins and Michael Jacobson have shown that it is possible to be socially concerned and still be a good technocrat. One can only hope that in the future, scientists like them will prove to be the rule and not the exception. Pass the artificial bacon, please.

Eric Kilburn

Student Association

UVM STUDENT ASSOCIATION 1978-1979

The Student Association has been open all summer preparing for what should be a very full and successful school year. Here is a sample of what we've been working on so far, and an indication of the direction in which we hope to lead S.A. this year.

ISSUES

Rathskellar Bill

The "Rathskellar Bill" passed last session by the Vermont State Legislature could affect UVM in two ways. First is the possibility that campus events which want to serve alcohol be legalized. Currently the University does not hold a license to sell or even give away alcohol. This will probably be an outcome of the passage of the bill. Second is the possibility of the creation of a pub or Rathskellar on the UVM campus. Given the proximity of UVM to downtown, this might not be a needed item. However, such a pub might improve school spirit and solidarity providing a place where students, faculty and staff could meet on an informal basis. Any feedback on this issue would be welcomed by the Student Association.

Student Grievance Process

At the present time there is no formal procedure enabling a student to register a formal grievance against an action of a faculty member or administrator. One possibility would be to establish a student grievance process for both academic and non-academic grievances. Most of the academic grievances handled by this formal hearing body would be procedural in nature. For example, students could bring a grievance against a professor who did not attend most scheduled classes during a semester. Non-academic grievances would be complaints against an administrative arm of the University.

Curriculum Changes

The Board of Trustees, Faculty and the Administration are researching the existing curriculum to see if it is the best type available. Debate on the questions of what constitutes a good curriculum and who should determine it should be starting on campus this semester. The Student Association plans to take an active role in placing students on the various committees which will determine the direction UVM will move academically.

Internal Transfers

Each year many students who wish to change their majors run into difficulty when the change necessitates a transfer to a different college at UVM. Most of the problems stem from a lack of consistency among colleges. The Student Association will be investigating the various transfer requirements which now exist at UVM.

EVENTS

Legislative Day

The Student Association will sponsor Legislative Day on Monday, December 11, 1978. On Legislative Day, all Vermont Legislators are invited to spend a day on campus to become more familiar with UVM students and academic programs. A successful Legislative Day will require the cooperation and enthusiasm of many UVM students. Fifty student hosts will be needed. We are hoping to have as many Vermont resident student hosts as possible in an attempt to match some legislators with their constituents. If you are interested, please come up to the S.A. Office for more information.

Student Trustees

One position on the Board of Trustees for students will become vacant this spring. Applications for this very important and challenging position will be available on the first day of classes. A series of four introductory seminars will occur on four Thursdays in November and are required. These seminars will be given by Keith Miser, Dean of Students, a panel of Trustees currently on the Board, President Lattie Coor, and Chairman of the Board, Louise Swainbank. More information on the selection of Student Trustees will be forthcoming.

Elections

Elections to the Student Association Senate will be held on October 3, 4 and 5. There are thirty-seven Senatorial positions. Petitions to have your name placed on the ballot will be available in the S.A. Office on Monday, September 18th and are due at 5:00 p.m. on Friday, September 29th. We encourage anyone who is interested to come up to the S.A. Office (Billings Center) to discuss the possibility of running. Look for more details in the weeks ahead. Good luck in the coming year.

SERVICES

Treasurer/Assistant Treasurer

This year, the financial responsibilities of the Student Association will rest with both a Treasurer and an Assistant Treasurer. The Treasurer will deal with policy development and assist the Treasurers of the various clubs and organizations upon request. The Assistant Treasurer will deal primarily with running the office on a day to day basis. Since the position of Treasurer is so vital to the success of many groups, it is hoped that this split in duties will provide improved service to students, while at the same time create sound financial policy for the years ahead.

Bank

The possibility of having a branch bank on campus is being seriously considered by the UVM Administration and Board of Trustees. A service such as this would have inmeasureable benefits to students, as loans, traveller's checks and basic check cashing could be handled on campus. An extension to the Bookstore which would include a central ticket office is currently the main location under consideration.

Student Legal Service

The Student Association maintains a Student Legal Service to assist students with legal problems included in any of the following categories: (1) Criminal, (2) Consumer, (3) Traffic, (4) Utilities, and (5) Landlord/Tenant. The Student Legal Service's phone number is 656-4379. Office hours will be posted early in September. All students who are currently enrolled and have paid their Student Activity Fee are eligible to use the Student Legal Service. Since the Student Legal Service is directed and operated by students, all interested students are encouraged to apply for intern positions.

LITTLE FEAT 9/29 & VAN MORRISON 10/14

By Alan Marshall

"The Dead helped our buying power," said Pat Butler, chairman of S.A. Concert Bureau.

With that Butler proceded to announce a fall schedule consisting of Little Feat, Van Morrison and one other concert, which he termed "undisclosed." "We have a good reputation, and that helps us compete with big-time promoters," Butler said. UVM's handling of past concerts, from Zebra and Sea Level to the Heron and Benson show, are like medals in the closet for securing future top-rate shows.

And despite the numerous complaints about the locale of concerts, UVM's Patrick Gymnasium, the Grateful Dead complimented UVM as one of the finest colleges to give a show. They had compared UVM with Rochester, Dartmouth, and Syracuse – others on their tour. The Dead told Butler, "acoustically Patrick was a lot

Classical Music Dominates the 1978 Lane Series Schedule

(PR) — Despite financial problems and a lack of an adequate performing facility, the University of Vermont's George Bishop Lane Artists Series will open its twenty-fourth annual season of concerts and plays, and its first seasonal association with the Vermont Symphony Orchestra.

Seventeen events are planned for Burlington's concert halls, with the return of favorite performers being a major feature of the 1978-79 Season. Encore performances by violinist Isaac Stern, pianist Vladimir Schkenazy, modern dance legend Martha Graham's Dance Company, and English lutenist Julian Bream highlight the list of artists who will come to Burlington to entertain Vermont audiences.

It is perhaps the four-concert season with the Vermont Symphony Orchestra that is the special innovation of this twenty-fourth season. Conducted by Efrain Guigui, the Orchestra will give four concerts in Burlington's Memorial Auditorium. Guest artists appearing with the Orchestra will include the incredible young American violinist Eugene Fodor, Burlington's Elizabeth Metcalfe, soprano Judith Raskin, and America's greatest composer, Aaron Copland, who will conduct his own "Piano Concerto."

The unprecedented combination of the state's two major cultural activities will provide the best qualities of both to create the beginnings of an orchestral season for Vermont's largest community. A seasoned, well-trained orchestra under the direction of a dynamic and experienced conductor matched with some of the finest artists in the country to perform works not normally heard in Vermont. The combination will allow not only Burlington to hear more music, but will make it possible for the Orchestra to offer more diverse programs in its tours of Vermont.

The tentative 1978-1979 Series schedule is as follows:

Sept. 23 – THE PASSION OF DRACULA – 2:00 and 8:00 p.m. at Flynn Theatre.
Sept. 30 – The Vermont Symphony with Eugene Fodor, violinist – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Oct. 11 and 12 – Martha Graham Dance Company – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Nov. 2 – Julian Bream, guitarist – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Nov. 11 – Trinidad Folk Festival – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Nov. 17 – Concentus Musicus, Vienna – 8:00 p.m. at St. Joseph's
Nov. 20 – The English Chamber Orchestra with Vladimir Ashkenazy, pianist – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Dec. 2 – Vermont Symphony with Elizabeth Metcalfe, pianist – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Dec. 13 – Harry Blackstone Jr. Magic Show – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
Jan. 27 – The Moscow Philharmonic – 8:00 p.m. Memorial.
Feb. 24 – The Vermont Symphony performs Haydn's THE CREATION with Judith Reskin, Charles Bressler – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
March 14 – MUMMENSCHANZ – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial
March 22 – Beaux Arts Trio – 8:00 p.m. at St. Michaels.
April 20 – The Vermont Symphony conducted by Aaron Copeland with Robert Miller, pianist – 8 00 p.m. at Memorial.
April 25 – Isaac Stern, violist – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.
April 28 – Pilobolus Dance Theatre – 8:00 p.m. at Memorial.

Sept. 23: "The Passion of Dracula" is a genuine old-fashioned horror-thriller based on the original Bram Stoker novel, and is a terrific evening of romantic, Gothic entertainment. It is filled with wonderful special effects that give it its devilishly Gothic feel... including blackout, mists rolling in, howling wolves, flames... even a bat or two.

Jean-Pierre Aumont will star as the horrific Count Dracula, but he may be remembered in any number of fine films and plays that he has done over the course of his varied career. Born in Paris, Aumont made his American stage debut with Katherine Cornell in San Francisco, a part that later led him to such movies as Lili in which he starred with Leslie Caron, or more recently in Day for Night, the Truffaut film that won him great critical acclaim and Mahogany in which he starred with Diana Ross. The Passion of Dracula is another credit to a long and successful list of performances.

Little Feat Stompin' Into Town

Pat Butler deals with the concert situation

better than many of the fieldhouse set-ups we played in."

With word around to agents that UVM is a concert town, the Concert Bureau is more likely to get first-class shows. This year is no exception.

In three weeks, September 29, Little Feat is coming to town. And soon after, on October 14, Van Morrison will be in Burlington for one show. The Concert Bureau is working on a third concert for November which technically is still undisclosed. Close sources say the bureau is looking at a Bruce Springsteen on November 4 which is simply awaiting confirmation.

With a long list of successful concerts behind them and two or three solid shows in the air, the University community and Burlingtonites can be assured of topnotch concerts, as in the past.

Pousette-Dart/Bromberg, Scott-Heron/Benson, Pure Prairie League/Charlie Daniels, and the Dead, all in the last year, have come off well. In a once removed sense, Pure Prairie League is returning for the upcoming Little Feat production.

Eric Kaz and Craig Fuller, two members of the original Pure Prairie League before breaking ties to form the American Flyer, and now simply called Kaz/Fuller, will appear as a support act for Little Feat.

"The support act," different from a warm-up band, is scheduled to play for 40 minutes, and then combine with Little Feat. Butler, the bureau chairman, said they will use the same equipment. After jamming with Little Feat for a few songs, Kaz/Fuller will walk off stage to let the main attraction bang away.

The growing popularity of Little Feat, with their newly released "Waiting for Columbus," called for a $10,000 contract plus 80% of profits above the breakpoint; that's high when compared with a $6,000 price tag for Bonnie Raitt, but the concert bureau expects a $1500 profit with a sellout. Little Feat hasn't played in this area for a while so Butler expects a "dynamite show."

The seating arrangement in the gymnasium will mock the one for the Dead concert. 3,400 floor seats in front and 780 obstructed vision seats. Van Morrison's act will have only the floor seats.

Van Morrison's 30 day East Coast tour will be his first time out in four years. Butler said "the dates went fast for him, so he was able to get a high price."

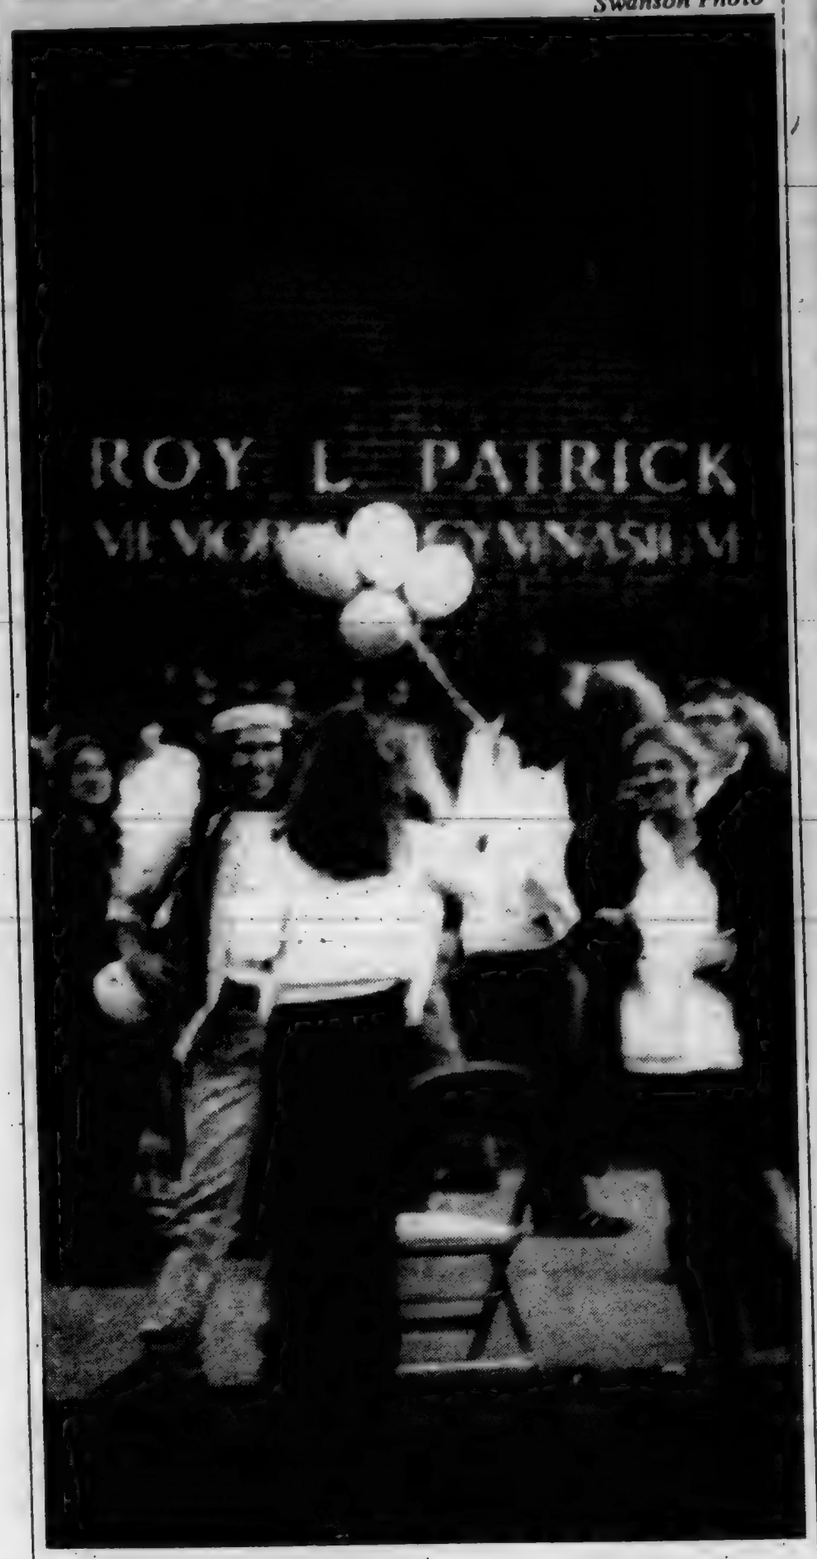
An evening with Van Morrison, without a warm-up band, hits the concert bureau for fifteen grand and the student concert-goer for $6.50, $7.50 general admission. "This same show would cost $8.50 in the city," said Butler. "We gear our ticket prices without profit motivation so they are fairly decent. Our $15,000 offer is a good one. He was notorious for not going out on tours, and now he's expensive.

*******

"Who would do well," said Butler, is the first weeding process of how concerts are chosen. He explained that last spring the concert bureau, seven strong, wrote down fifteen bands they'd like to see.

"Everyone wants to see a Ronstadt show or Bruce Springsteen, but you have to be realistic. We have a good reputation, so lots of times we can hook a show coming out of Boston," said Butler.

"First comes the routing problem after writing down the shows we'd like to see," Butler said. "We had Billy Joel and Jackson Browne on our list but they're on the West Coast until spring. So we're keeping an eye for them then. After talking to a few agents, we come down to a smaller list."



"Lots of times it's favors. The bit promoters can buy six shows at once from the agents and turn favors out of it. The whole thing is buying power."

"If a college doesn't have the know-how or reputation to buy a concert, they will do it with a promoter. We've been fairly secure so we don't do promoter shows. The Gil Scott-Heron/-George Benson show we did with Wild Rose productions. We still do the work but they finance it and reap the profits if any. Promoters are entering this area all the time and give us calls, but only on a rare occasion do we use promoters."

Where was I on May 6? Let me see. Slowly it all comes back through the distance of the summer and the general fog in the atmosphere. For one thing, I just barely made it home from Hanover, N.H., and the Grateful Dead concert, the night before, at 1:30 a.m. riding well below the big 'E' on the left – somewhere outside of Barre, VT.

I woke up in the morning with a lot of things on my mind. I was exuberant about the end of classes, a little tense about papers and finals, and hopeful that that night's Grateful Dead concert would provide relief.

The electricity in the air brought about by this concert was really amazing (at least to me). All sorts of people drifted into town, and especially the campus area that day. It was almost as if they floated in on the tide (wave), of school's end summer's start. It was easy to pick out the drifters – you could just tell they had been on the road for several days, and most of them had that eager-to-buy-a-ticket look in their eyes.

Indeed, this concert meant a lot to a lot of people. I remember the people who camped out all night, just to get good seats. Then, there were the ones, who, after they had good tickets – say second row, sat around and fondled their tickets. That afternoon being a Saturday, a lot of people were listening to the "Mars Hotel," a Saturday afternoon Dead Show on WRUV. All day long the excitement and energy levels kept rising.

Finally, it was time for the concert. Inside the gym was the type of mass hysteria you'd probably find in a small community hit by a cast of Ergot poisoning. The band opened with an unbelievably satisfying, long version of "Sugaree." The entire crowd was on its feet – arms waving wildly, and all pushing forward. Intense. Everybody just let go, especially Jerry Garcia.

I've heard it said that Jerry Garcia thrives on a certain level of creative tension, and I'm sure it's true. It wasn't the usual crescendo decrescendo, rise and fall continually rising to sustain itself at an all-persuading frenzied level.

Even long after Patrick Gym had emptied, there was still that electricity in the air. It sort of kept filtering through the air with the pot-smoke.

As the bumper sticker says, "There's nothing like a Grateful Dead Concert."

As the clouds snaked into the Killington Ski Area last month, paying their traditional visit to the Vermont Jazz Festival, Thad Jones, leader of the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Band, paused during his set and scrutinized the sky. In a desperate attempt to justify the presence of the ugly, gray mass hovering above, he said, "Rain is just nature's way of testing your moral fiber."

This was easy for him to say. Not only Jones, but all the musicians, roadies, promoters and other unclassifiable hangers-on were resting high and dry on stage under a huge blue and white tarpaulin. Touched by not a drop of the detestable precipitation, their moral fiber was never tested.

But more than 4,000 jazz enthusiasts from all over the Northeast, however, were left to their own wits on Saturday, the first day of the festival. While the methods used to fend off the copious amounts of rain were, to say the least, unusual — cardboard lean-to's and bodies mummified in plastic trash bags littered the slope — it was not at all surprising that the crowd went to such great extremes of ingenuity to stay through the rain. The music was, in short, superb.

It is always exciting to hear the old jazz artists play. Earl Hines, the 'fatha' of jazz piano, could easily have stolen the show all by himself with his famous stride style interspersed with his raspy but adept scat-singing. But with Wesley Brown on bass, Eric Snyder on drums and Eddie Graham on reeds, Hines' set was nothing short of phenomenal. All four were excellent soloists and, at times, seemed to border on the outer limits of improvisation. During one particularly wild solo, Hines tried to pull Graham back to earth. "Eddie," he said jokingly, "What page are you on? We didn't rehearse it like that." The most amazing display of individual prowess, however, came during Duke Ellington's tune "Caravan" when Snyder gave an awesome drum solo. The other musicians just left the stage while he produced strange sounds — some like claps of thunder and other like soft waves — that one would think only a synthesizer could produce.

Marva Josie, vocal gymnast extrodinaire, joined Hines toward the end of the set. Although she is an unusually beautiful woman, her incredible range and strong, clear voice was even more captivating than her looks. She even dedicated one song, "C. C. Rider," a slow, mournful tune about "wrong-doin' dudes" to all the ladies in the audience that had ever been dumped. Her lyrics and intonations were so real and emotional that only a quick tune right afterward managed to chase the blues away.

The other outstanding musician of the first day was Herbie Mann. With his unbelievable speed and dexterity on the flute and his habit of jumping around the stage incessantly, Mann seemed somewhat of a musical maniac. Backed by a fast-paced bass and percussion section, Mann, with fleeting runs, packed so much energy into his set that most of the audience was clapping and dancing, oblivious to the rain and mud.

The Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Band gave a rather relaxed performance. But where the ensemble's set lacked in energy, they made up for in variety. From esoteric, free jazz tunes such as "Ambiance" to swing to the basic twelve-bar blues, the Jones/Lewis Band ran the gamut of big band styles.

Ramsey Lewis and Lonnie Liston Smith also played on Saturday but the two keyboardists were as different as Duke Ellington and Herbie Hancock. Lewis' performance on acoustic piano was smooth but still an exciting display of artistry, and he is certainly one of the few musicians around who explores the potentialities of the synthesizer without inflicting pain on the audience. Smith, on the other hand, was backed by an overwhelmingly powerful band of seven, and hacked out too much synthesized funk, bordering on disco at times, and not enough jazz. His set was so piercing and cluttered that it left this reviewer hoping that the rain would slip in and short circuit a few amplifiers.

The sun came through on Sunday, the second day of the festival and, with only a few exceptions, the music was even more spectacular than the weather.

Ray Charles was, of course, the highlight of the day. "The sounds of the earth are like music — Yes, what a beautiful day," he sang, beginning his set with a soulful version of "Oh What a Beautiful Morning," and capturing the spirit of the event in just one brief song. His entire performance was so warm and emotional — just dripping with soul — that it seemed ridiculous that he had an enormous orchestra and a flashy vocal group — the Raellettes — backing him up.

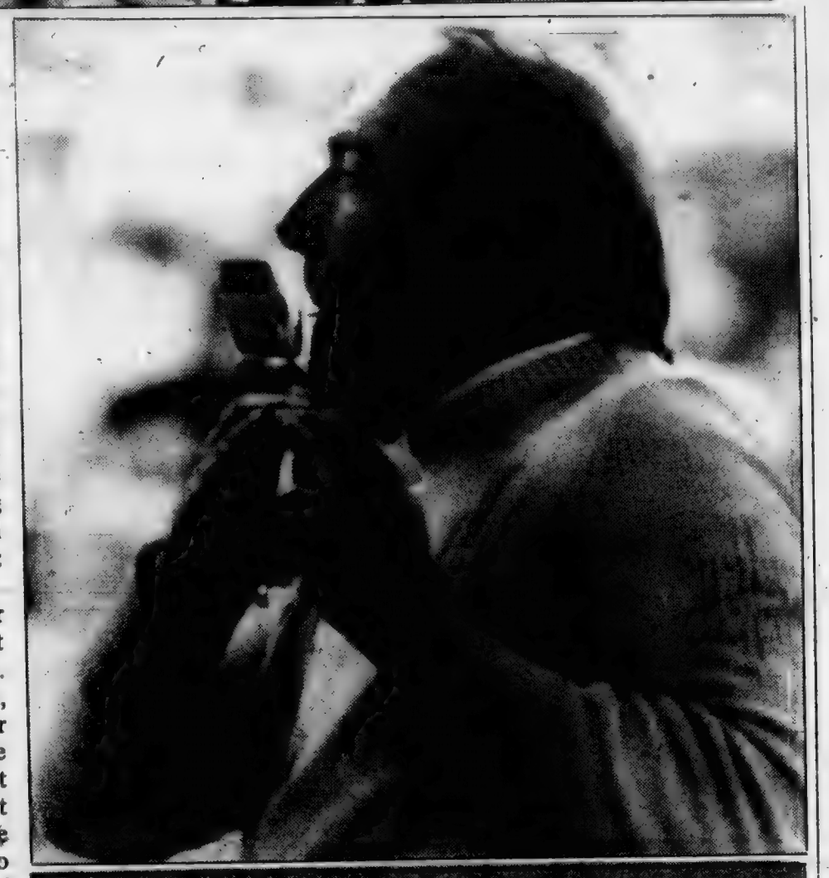
Where Charles' performance was the most inspiring of the day, Noel Pointer's set was certainly the most surprising. A relatively young and unknown electric violinist (compared to the likes of Jean-Luc Ponty), Pointer's style was remarkably distinct and accomplished — he just wailed until he couldn't play any longer. With his four-piece band, Pointer included so many musical influences — saloon style, classical, disco, etc. — that it was impossible to doubt the sincerity of his claim "We believe that playing music is sharing experiences and culture."

Gap Mangione (yes, Chuck's brother) bounced on stage, bursting with enthusiasm, and began with Larry Carlton's "Mellow Out." But like his entire set, it was not mellow at all. Rather, he played everything just a little too quickly to capture the full emotion, and consequently, he appeared superficial.

Nevertheless, the only downright distasteful performance of the festival was



Stanley Turrentine's twenty-minute marathon of electro-funk. After playing such a disappointingly short set, Turrentine left the stage without introducing either himself or his sidemen and left the enraged audience screaming for more. But there was no more – there was too much unplugging to do.

Betty Carter ended the festival, scatsinging to the setting sun and a rather tired but still enthusiastic audience. Although the cool, early evening air must have irritated her voice, she still came through with the same quick lyrics and fascinating intonations that have established her as one of the few real jazz singers left.

And plagued by power failures but not by lack of talent was the Paul Asbell quartet. Opening the festival both days, the quartet would no sooner evolve into full swing when the amplifiers would short out. But their performance was excellent despite these problems. They're progressive – not afraid to explore new realms of composition and improvisation. And, when someone yelled "Make it funky" during their last tune, "Stuft Turkey," they did.

Get Smart— Get the edge

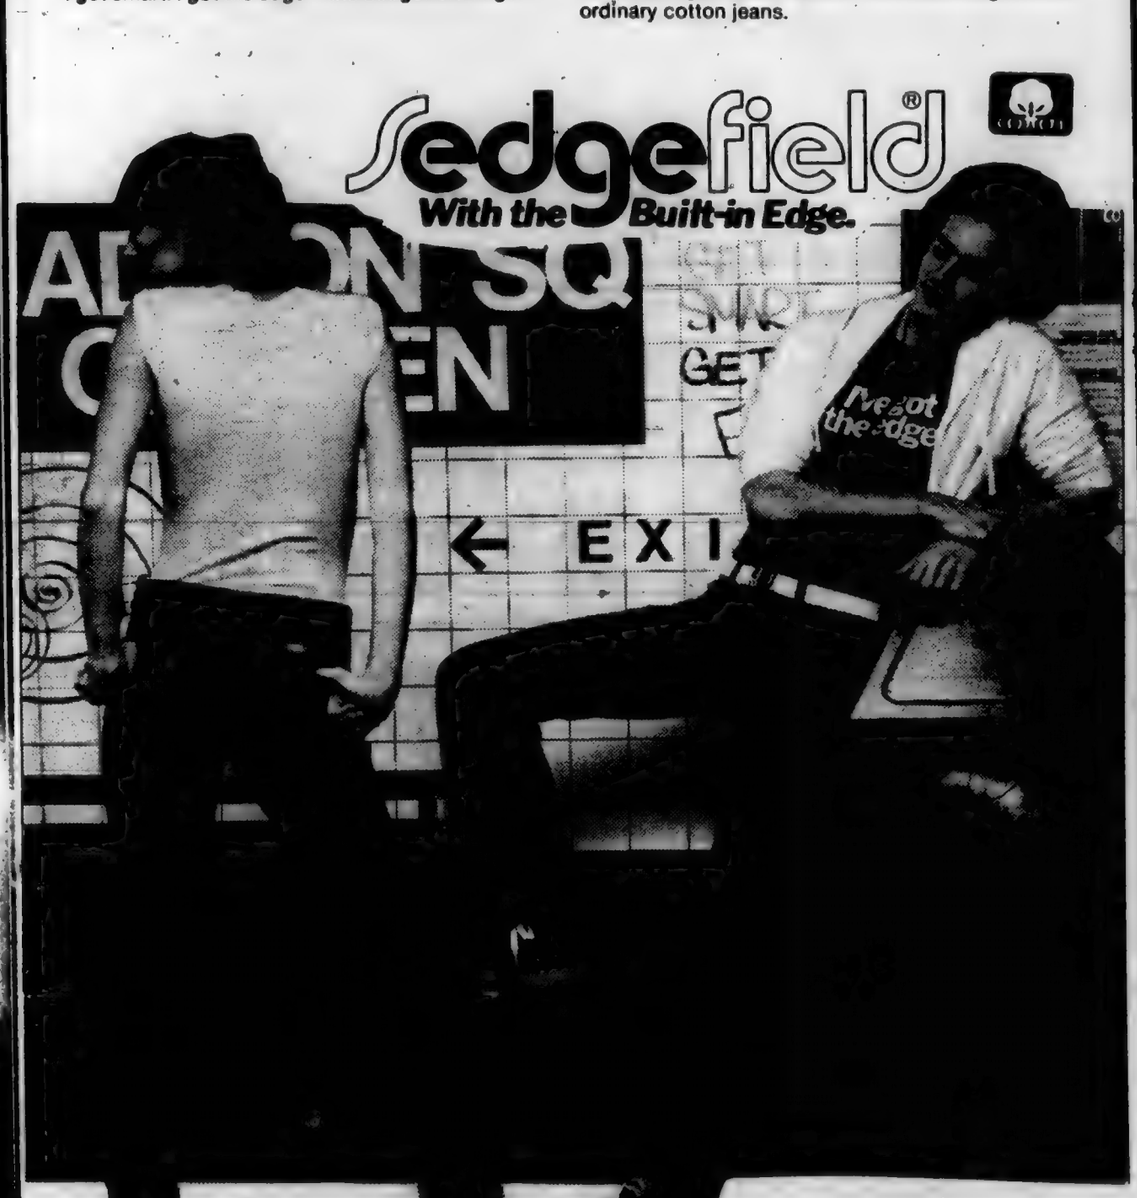
And, Sedgefield does it all without putting plastic (polyester) in their jeans like some of the biggies. After all, if it isn't all-cotton it isn't really blue denim.



The best surprise of all? You get all this without paying any more than the regular price of the so-called big names.

I got smart. I got the edge—the Sedgefield edge.

The edge in Sedgefield blue jeans, the first all-cotton jeans to behave the way jeans should. They fit perfectly wash after wash because there's no shrinking out of size.

They always look lean and clean because they resist wrinkling and puckering and ugh...those tacky twisted legs.

They also get softer faster and wear longer than ordinary cotton jeans.

A Women's Monthly Debuts in Burlington

Reports on news, culture, and issues from a woman's perspective, as well as articles and commentary concerning other state and national issues will be the focus of the newest member of Burlington's journalistic community, the Commonwoman.

The Commonwoman was born from the ideas of a group of women called the collective. Members felt the regular press treats women's issues with less import than they deserve. Too often, ideas and reports on the activities of women's movements are mired in the back pages, or in the social or living section, said collective member Ellen Temple. Collective member Nancy Edson said women have to read the paper "backwards" in order to find out what women are thinking or doing.

Further, said Temple and Edson, the collective believes women are separated from one another, and the communication of ideas between women is not as good as it should be. The Commonwoman will hopefully become a forum for ideas of women, and Temple hopes as many women will write and read the Commonwoman as possible. She said the women in the collective are going out and recruiting other women who might want to write and help put the Commonwoman together.

Temple said the newspaper will not be concerned with women's issues only. She said the paper will be concerned with issues of importance to everyone. For example, in the first Commonwoman issue, Virginia Page delivered a blistering attack on the Supreme Court and others, namely corporations, who are making it more and more difficult for newswriters to enjoy freedom of the press. The article was well thought out and very well written.

Temple said the paper is still in the formative stages and since many of the collective members have not worked with newspapers before, the collective does not have all the details of gathering news worked out. But, she said the collective is working on creating a network of reporters throughout the state.

Temple said the staff of Commonwoman is currently working without pay, most collective members have other jobs, and put in 20-25 a month at the Commonwoman. She said although the first issue of the paper was financially successful, she hopes through increased advertising, and sales via subscriptions and newsstands, collective members and others working on the Commonwoman will receive pay for their services. Temple said she hopes eventually to have 33 percent of the paper consist of ads.

In addition to collective members working on the Commonwoman, women from all walks of life help get the paper out. For example, at one layout committee meeting, ten women showed up who weren't of the collective. Temple said getting more women involved on the Commonwoman is one of the primary objectives of the paper.

The paper will appear for the next two months, with the September issue due Friday (September 8). After the October issue, the paper will be re-evaluated, a budget for the year will be drawn up, and Temple said the Commonwoman might be appearing bi-weekly. This, however, is still tentative.

In addition to Virginia Page's article, the first issue of Commonwoman featured an article on the Vermont delegation to the National Organization of Women Conference in Washington, D.C., an article on the difficulties facing a Burlington woman as she tried to enter the women's feminist movement because of her fears of the predominantly lesbian population of the Burlington feminist movement. The newspaper also featured an article on the Women's Health Center, and a women's poetry page.

The Number One Record in Column B

More Songs About Buildings and Food
Talking Heads
Sire 6058

I call this record Five Years. Instead of More Songs About Buildings and Trees. I call it Five Years instead of More Songs About Buildings and Trees because it is easier to say Five Years instead of More Songs... because in 1983 Talking Heads will be doing to the music world what the Bee Gee's are doing now.

"Artists Only" will be "Stayin' Alive" five years from now. Except that Talking Heads music is as close to disco as Burlington is to Tiero Del Fuego.

Holymen like Billy Preston say:

"Don't It Go Round In Circles?"

What the T-Heads say is well... well... well, it isn't that important. Really not important. Really it don't mean toilet paper to bears in the woods.

What they mean to say with their music is obvious. Since none of the songs contained on this album proclaim neither building nor food it seems to be said here in too many words. Al Green's "Take Me to the River" (the only non-Head song on the album) is a disclamation of the buildings and food (but only in the negatory sense).

David Byrne's songs are going to be weird to those who define weird as Patty Smith or Elvis Costello or Television or anything that sounds as rambunctious as Talking Heads.

But so what if I'm trying to write this and I can't remember more than a snatch of a song I've just heard. I can't even remember the name of it. And (the reader deserves a brreathe here) I'm going to tell you that these songs are hot. This record is so close to IT that I can't tell you how much IN THERE it is.

But in the Top 40 of life, Talking Heads will be remembered as The Greatest Number 41 in the history of the game.

My ears tell me that if Captain Beefheart joined the Airplane the new band would be called Talking Heads. But it is not.

Q? But why do they sound that way?

A! Eno produced it along with T-Heads.

And if you know Eno, then you know how off the cloud he is. So you take one-third dose of tone music (Eno), one equal dose of top flight (pre-Starship) rock (Airplane) and for the rest take jiving jazzy jismo (Beefheart) — and — you — have created the year's Number One record in Column B — Five Years (really More Songs About...) Remember that Column B means "Not For Everyone Category." The best record in Column A (For Everyone Category) this year is Springsteen's Darkness on the Edge of Town.

Five Years is full of mechanical music and meaningless rationale. It contains enough to knowledge. (In "The Good Thing" Byrne tells us innocently that "the good thing is... economized economy.") Utilizing the reediness — of — Byrne's voice ("Hear my voice, it is saying something else.") against the thinness of the production, Eno has captured the tinker toy static that the Talking Heads call their riffs. (They really call it anti-music.) "The Girls Want To Be With the Girls" is the only song I understand, while "Found a Job" is the only one that makes sense. If you think that I'm inventing situations then get off your vacation and get this record. If you feel weird enough.

WARNING: If you feel weird enough to wonder if you're weird enough, then you better get to the record store now!)

—Otis Norton

Let the Dogs Bite It

Managers were once players; editors were once lackeys; Rome wasn't built in one day; anybody who is 'anybody' started somewhere. "That's evolution" (Bill Lee)

Recorded as a soundtrack to a 1971 film You've Got Talk It Like You Walk It (or you'll lose that beat) is an early recording by current Steely Dan member Donald Fagan and Walter Becker, and ex-member Denny Diaz. Simply stated, the recording is a poor excuse for an album. In fact, on a technical level, it's unquestionably one of the worst albums I own. However, as looking at old pictures is amusing, the laughs this piece will produce are much more valuable than the mildew these tapes have probably mothered prior to the success of Aja.

For example, it is rather difficult to discern whether Donald Fagan sang the title track with a cork in his nose (acting as a mute) or whether he the schizoid nature of this band.

For a group that publicly announces their new album is going to be musically "excellent," they place little value on the value of performance. Tom Scholz moaned and groaned through the "Smokin'"'s keyboard solo, while singer Delp pranced on both ends of the stage shaking hands with the individuals sitting in the front row, in effect creating a rather lame diversion from the music being played on the stage. "Good show," in Boston accent, simply means "big bucks."

The songs from the new Don't Look Back were received with subdued enthusiasm. although "Feelin' Satisfied" brought the crowd off its feet. The album's single "Don't Look Back" sounded awkward in concert due to an over-emphasized studio moan on the record. (Delp sings "Oh, I can be strong — yes I can," and the lead guitar blares in. In concert, however, Delp doesn't play the guitar on this cut, and consequently, he appears somewhat weak.)

Following a respectable call for an encore, the band returned for "Don't Be Afraid to Love," a tailor made encore song. The audience simply let them go.

On the purely positive side, the one hour and fifteen minutes "flew by."

premiered the sex change operation in the early seventies, finally reaching his more familiar voice by the time of the Can't Buy a Thrill recording in 1972.

Like any comedy album, however, You've Got to Walk It... will certainly be invaluable during those occasional morbid moments when an old floor mate you wish had transferred drops by your apartment for pleasant conversation.

Just for the record (no pun intended) one cut, "Dog Bite Dog," is fairly decent. Otherwise, You've Got to Walk It... musically ranks with Psycho Purple, and comically to a bad Steve Martin joke. Had the opportunity arisen, Steely Dan should have paid the Blackmailist's demands. Leave this one for the dogs to bite.

ATTENTION ENGINEERING AND SCIENCE MAJORS!

The Air Force has openings for young men and women majoring in selected science and engineering fields. Like Aeronautical, Aerospace, General and Electrical Engineering, Mathematics, Physics and Computer Technology.

To help prepare for one of these, Air Force ROTC offers two and four-year programs of study which will defray some of your college costs.

After completion of the AFROTC requirement, and upon your graduation, you'll be commissioned an officer in the Air Force. Then comes responsibility, experience in your specialty with some of the best people and facilities in the world, and a mission with a purpose. You'll get excellent starting salary, medical and dental care, 30 days of paid vacation beginning your first year, and more.

Look into the Air Force ROTC program right away. See what's in it for you. See how you can serve your country in return. You'll be glad you put your major to work on a job that really counts.

Fodor, Bream Lead Fall Lane Series Schedule

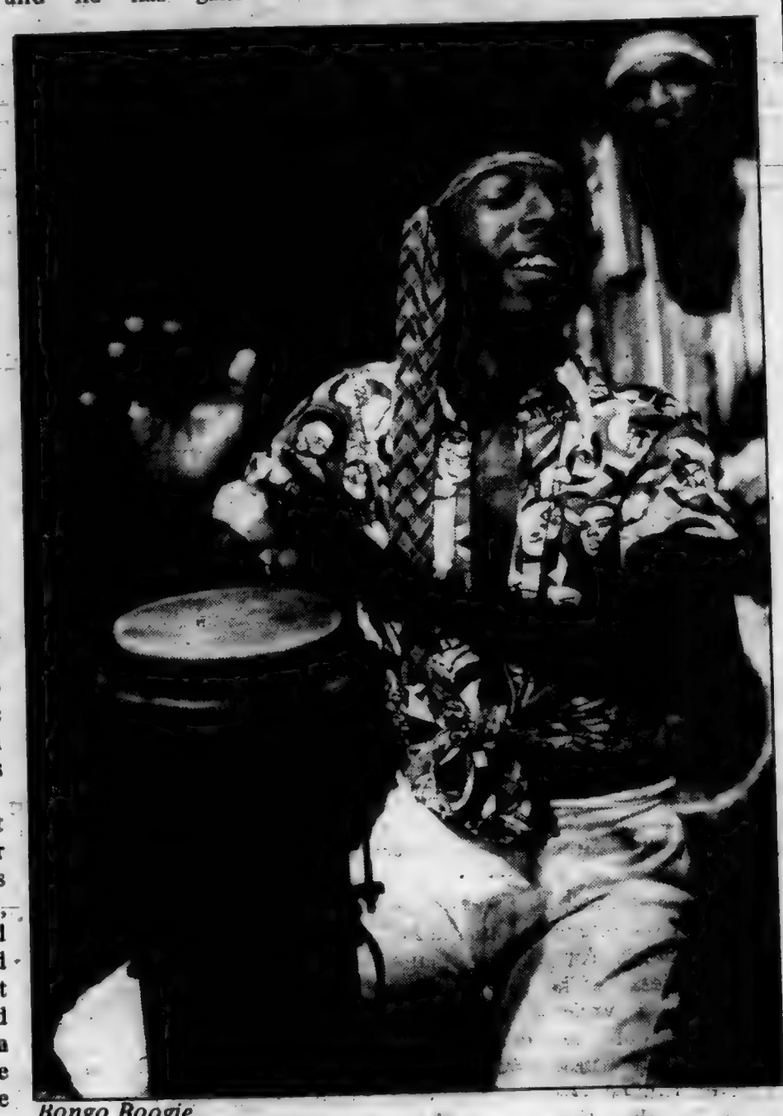
Sept. 30: Eugene Fodor, America's most exciting young violinist, began his study of the violin at age 7 and at age 9 he gave his first solo performance. Two years later he was soloing with the Denver symphony. Fodor went on to study at the Juilliard School with Ivan Galamian and later with the legendary virtuoso Jascha Heifetz. Winning became a regular event for him as he gathered top honors at the 1967 Merriweather Post Competition in Washington, D.C., the Paganini Competition in Genoa, Italy in 1972 and the much publicized 1974 Tchaikowsky Competition in Moscow, where he stirred the audience to its feet and made headlines by becoming the first American ever to earn this prize.

Fodor's 1977 Lane Series recital was greeted with standing ovations and a packed hall. In his appearance with the Vermont Symphony Fodor will play Nicolo Paganini's fiendishly difficult "Sixth Violin Concerto" which is guaranteed to please his audience. The orchestra will also play Johannes Brahms' "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn and Jean Sibelius' "Second Symphony."

Oct. 11, 12: To most people, the name Martha Graham means dance, for she is the founder of modern dance. Although Graham has been dancing for most of her 84 years (she's retired now) and her company was formed many years ago, it is still achieving new heights, performing this summer at the Metropolitan Opera House to capacity audiences. Public television viewers have seen broadcasts of the company's famed Wolf Trap appearances.



After an illness in 1971 that left her without interest in her company and her school, it was thought she might never recover, but today, both Ms. Graham and the company are stronger and more vital than ever. She is not dancing anymore, but has said she really became a choreographer because she wanted good roles to dance; she believes in purity of approach.

The Graham Company was last in Burlington during the 1967 season, playing to a sold-out hall, enthusiastic audience and a reviewer who said, "The first Lane Series audience of the season was treated to a spectacular performance by Martha Graham and Company... it was most gratifying to see the auditorium full of enthusiastic people." We can look forward to the same this year.

Nov. 2: One of the most distinctive and sought-after artists of our time, the English lutenist and guitarist Julian Bream has won a wide following around the world. For RCA Records alone, he has made some 25 LP's, many of these winning the Industry's greatest awards. Bream's special contribution to the literature is to extend the range of music interest backward through discovered music for the lute and forward through recent music written for the guitar. Sir Benjamin Britten, Hans Werner Henze, Sir William Wanton and Richard Rodney Bennett are amongst the many contemporary composers who have written especially for Julian Bream.

Julian Bream's involvement with the guitar began as a youngster in London with his father his first teacher. In 1945, Dr. Boris Perrot, President of the Philharmonic Society of Guitarists; heard him play and offered to continue his instruction. In 1947 Bream met Andre Segovia, whose friendship and example has affected Bream's subsequent career enormously. His debut performance at Wigmore Hall occurred in 1950, and since that time he has been occupied with international tours and recordings. He had won the National Academy of Arts and Sciences Award, two Grammy Awards, and two Edison Awards.

In addition to his guitar work, Julian Bream is lauded for his mastery of the lute. He is the foremost lutenist in the world, and he has gained a vast audience for his resurrections of the grand works of the Renaissance composed for this then popular instrument. The New York Times sums it up best, saying, "Mr. Bream scarcely needs more praise at this point for he has won all the encomiums in the book and still deserves them."

Bongo Boogie.

Nov. 11: Folk culture and folk music are as varied as the countries of the world, but among the most musical of peoples are the Trinidadians. The islands of the Caribbean have developed a distinct style of music and a flavor of warmth and wit that will arrive in Burlington at the beginning of our winter season, bringing the heat of those islands with them. The Trinidad Folk Festival will be a delight for the entire family. They have the distinction of being the only group from the Caribbean to have appeared at Royal Festival Hall in London for a season of 3 weeks (in the summer of 1972). Their overwhelming success there was repeated in Paris and in a sell-out tour of the United States and Canada in 1974.

The Trinidad Folk Festival was founded by its Artistic Director, Aubrey Adams in 1971, and its members are dancers, singers and folk musicians with years of experience in the field of Caribbean folk art and culture. In its performances, the Trinidad Folk Festival presents every facet of its country's culture, from the warmth of its folk music and steel band to the excitement of the folk drummers and dancers to the swing of calypso.

Nov. 17: The Concertus Musicus is noted for lively and vigorous renditions of both the Baroque Masters and the works of lesser known contemporaries of Bach, Handel and Scarlatti, while sacrificing none of their purity. Records and Recording says, "...As a result the orchestral sound is utterly different from any other group using old instruments that I ever heard. This attitude towards sound is what delights me most... Altogether most satisfying and often thrilling listening..." Don Concertus Musicus first gave public concerts in 1957 followed by concerts all over Europe and, since 1966, America. They record extensively for Telefunken and are now in the midst of one of the greatest projects in recording history: a complete, historically accurate performance of all of Johann Sebastian Bach's 200 and more church cantatas. Concertus Musicus will perform music by Bach, Handel, and Telemann during their Burlington concert.

Nov. 20: One of the pianistic giants of our time, Vladimir Ashkenazy, will return to Burlington with another giant in the world of music, the English Chamber Orchestra. A Russian who now lives in Iceland, Ashkenazy has been hailed by Time Magazine as "the finest all-around pianist in music today" and by music critic Harold Schonberg of the NY Times as a performer who combines "the Gilels objectivity and the Richter introspection into a very personal blend of poetry and charm."

In addition to his concert schedule, he maintains a heavy recording schedule, adding constantly to his list of recordings on the London label, all of which are best sellers. Among the most impressively acclaimed was the set of the complete Beethoven Piano Concerti, recorded with the Chicago Symphony and released during the fall of 1973.

The English Chamber Orchestra has been a major force in Britain's musical life since its inauguration in 1960, and now stands recognized as one of the world's leading chamber orchestras. Its personnel is a unique blend of well-established and chamber music players and the most promising of a younger generation of musicians, who often perform without a conductor, directed by their leader.

The orchestra frequently appears on television and radio, and records for all the major companies, with many discs winning a variety of coveted international awards. It was appropriate that during the Silver Jubilee year of 1977 that H.R.H. the Prince of Wales honored the English Chamber Orchestra Music Society by becoming its Patron in succession to the late Lord Britten. The program of the November 20, 1978 concert in Burlington will include piano and oboe concerti by Mozart, a string concerto by Stravinski, and Benjamin Britten's "Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge."

Dec. 2: There is nothing so enjoyable to Vermonters as listening to the music of 'homegrown' artists, especially when they're as good as Elizabeth Metcalfe. Mrs. Metcalfe is Canadian by birth, and holds her degrees from both the Royal Conservatory of Music and the University of Toronto. She won several national competitions and scholarships in Canada before coming to Vermont in 1963, and made a number of appearances as a soloist and with orchestras throughout eastern Canada before that time. She presently performs regularly in solo and chamber music recitals as both a harpsichordist and pianist, and is a member of the UVM Baroque Ensemble and Con Brio Chamber Ensemble. Mrs. Metcalfe will perform Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto with the Vermont Symphony under Efrain Guigui, conductor.

Along with Beethoven, the Vermont Symphony will perform Mahler's "First Symphony," never before performed by the orchestra. The complex demands of the score require that the orchestra enlarge by at least ten additional players. Maestro Guigui begins the performance with Mozart's Overture to "Cosifan tutte."

Dec. 3: Harry Blackstone is held to be the best traditional magician in the world today. Many have seen his numerous appearances on television. His appearance in Burlington will be accompanied by the largest retinue of assistants, animals, musicians and entertainers traveling the country today. Ladies cut in half and disappearing elephants are but a few of the spectacular tricks to be performed.

What could be a better Christmas-time treat than a stage-full of musicians, dancers, lions, and elephants giving the finest performances of some of magic's greatest feats. The Lane Series brings this treat for the entire family as our way of saying "Happy Holidays."

Jan. 27: The Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra was founded by the distinguished conductor of the Bolshoi Opera, Samuel Samosud, in 1951. Under his supervision, the Orchestra embarked on two special courses — the performance of new Soviet symphonic music and the concert performance of operas seldom heard in the Soviet Union.

Kiril Kondrashin, well-known to American audiences, made fast friends with the Orchestra in 1958 during the first International Tchaikovski Competition. The Competition brought deserved acclaim to Van Cliburn and became the symbol of American-Soviet cultural cooperation. In 1960 Kondrashin was appointed Director of the Philharmonic.

The Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra has made many recordings which have proven enormously popular both at home and abroad and have won such awards as France's Grand Prix du Disque. It is expected that the yet-to-be announced winner of the prestigious 1978 Tchaikovski Competitions in Moscow will appear with the Orchestra during its Burlington performance which will be conducted by Dmitri Kitaenko. Music to be performed will include Rinsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnole" and Tchaikovski's "Fourth Symphony."

Life in the Echo Chamber

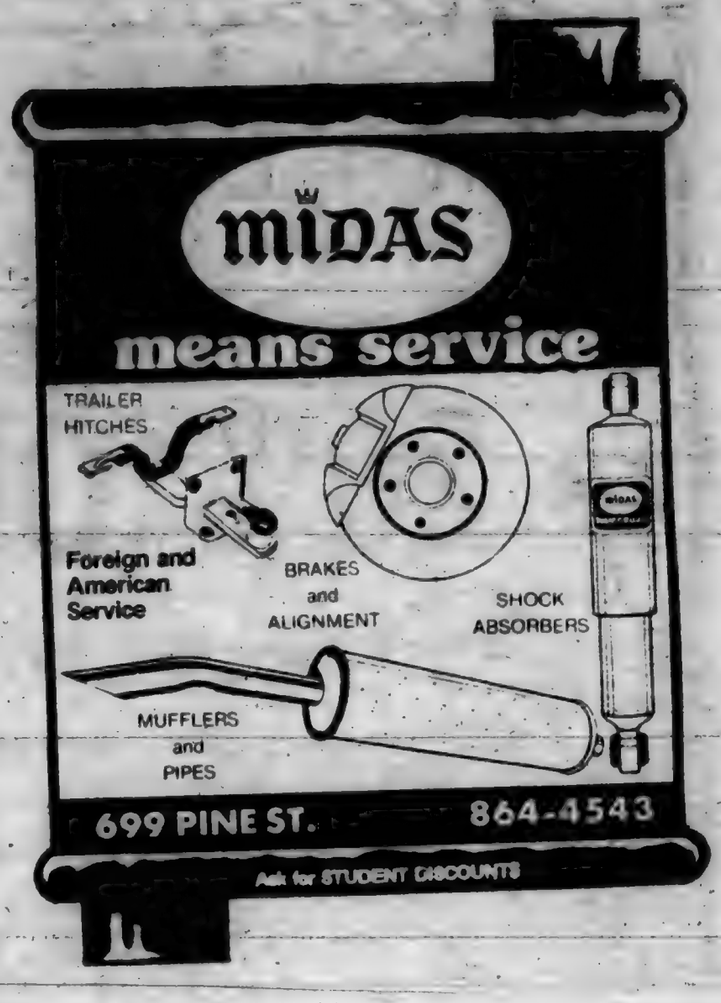
If there is any major theme of the efforts of the Lane Series during its 24th season, it is the effort to serve the community better. Whether it is sponsoring the Vermont Symphony or bringing back favorite artists or opening a central box office, the Lane Series is making all efforts to improve its service to the community.



Central to that effort is the crucial question of Memorial Auditorium. It is no secret that the Memorial Auditorium is absolutely inadequate, both backstage and forestage. It is also absolute that a new facility is more than a few years away, leaving all of us to suffer with Memorial Auditorium.

Recognizing this, the Lane Series has decided to make interim improvements to the hall. First goal is to purchase sufficient risers to elevate 60% of the audience in six inch increments. It is planned that once the risers are installed for a given concert, no more than three rows of the audience will sit on the same level. Efforts are also being made to purchase cushions to make the seats more comfortable. It is hoped that the risers will be in place this fall.

Accoustically, the hall is less than satisfactory. Discussions with acoustical engineers have indicated that temporary improvements can be made. The University and the Lane Series are exploring ways to make these improvements as quickly as possible.

The problem posed by the halls in Burlington is that not only are they inadequate and therefore expensive to use, but the halls make it difficult for audience growth. The Lane Series must use Memorial Auditorium until a new f... it's is built. While the Flynn Theater, often proposed as an alternative to Memorial, is more comfortable for the audience, its backstage facilities are unacceptable for virtually all professional productions. To make matters even worse, its seating capacity is half of Memorial Auditorium's.

It is hoped that the Lane audience will be patient with the hall until a new one is made available. In the meantime, the University of Vermont Lane Series will do its utmost to improve conditions in the halls we now are forced to use.

As part of an on-going effort to improve the service it offers its patrons, the Lane Series will open THE TICKET STORE on September 6, 1978. THE TICKET STORE will handle all Lane Series ticket business, taking phone orders, reservations, walk-in sales and season mail orders, as well as providing general information about Burlington's cultural schedule.

THE TICKET STORE will be located in the Park Centre Building at 131 Main Street, across from City Hall Park, in downtown Burlington. THE TICKET STORE will be open 6 days a week. The store will be open: Monday and Friday 10 a.m. — 8 p.m.; Tuesday thru Thursday 10 a.m. — 5:30 p.m.; Saturday 10 a.m. — 2 p.m. The telephone number will be 656-3418 or 656-3419.

It is planned that eventually THE TICKET STORE will make available tickets for a wide range of local cultural events along with providing assistance for purchasing tickets to events in other parts of Vermont as well as Boston, New York and Montreal. THE TICKET STORE is made possible by Barry Bloom of Heritage Properties of Burlington, who has made this space available to the Lane Series in the Park Centre Building.

Over 5,100 people purchase one or more Lane tickets each season. In 1955, the Lane Series attracted most of its audience from University faculty, staff, and students. Since 1968, however, over 65% of the audience has come from the greater Burlington community (and as far away as Montreal and Albany), and the rest from the students and faculties of all the area's institutions.

Obviously, community interest in, and support of, the Lane Series has become a tremendously significant factor in the programming and financial judgments which the Lane Series must make about each season.

Over the last 23 years, the Lane Series has presented an incredibly wide variety of events. The following is a statistical breakdown of the types of events offered: Ballet/Modern Dance — 15%; Soloists/Recitalists — 13%; Symphonies — 12%; Chamber Music — 12%; Theatre — 11%; Opera or Vocal Recitals — 10%; Jazz — 8%; Musical Comedy — 7%; Pop, Rock, Folk — 7%; Mime — 1%; Other 4%.

The range of events has been phenomenal. Since 1955 there have been few major American musicals that have not been to Burlington. Virtually all of the great pianists and violinists have performed for us. And there are few great dance companies that have not, at one time or another, been to Burlington as the guest of the Lane Series.

The great variety of Lane Series events has been a major key to its success.

A SHORT STORY

BORDER CROSSING

By Chris Mercer

A red-brown plain of dust sprawled flat out into the east. A narrow paved road climbed toward the horizon, its sides at last merging in perfect perspective. Though it was early March, the road appeared wet and oily, and heat rose from the surface in blurring veils. Everywhere, snowlike sprinklings of salt added to the foreboding barrenness, yet gave the air a tart, fresh smell.

The plain's smoothness was interrupted by a far-off semi-circle of jagged, angry mountains and a barely visible cluster of sun-baked mud domes. These crude dwellings were our destination: Afghanistan.

John and I gazed at this mirage with thirsty weariness. Quest into the unknown. Another country, never home. We had left that behind with our draft numbers, a secret we never revealed. We had been travelling since sun-up and were eager to leave Iran. Afghanistan would be cheap, and stretch our meager funds.

For reasons unknown, the bright blue mini-bus refused to ferry us over the no-man's-land to the Afghan side. We cursed the stubborn driver, and together with two mangy Canadians, we set out to cross the desert. It was 4:30 p.m. and the entrance to the Promised Land closed at 5. We calculated the distance to be four miles and reckoned we could make it at a brisk march. Sadly, our 45 pound packs soon deflated our defiant spirits. We abandoned the goal of getting beyond the border, but were confident that some dome-dweller would provide for us until tomorrow.

Too Much Hookah

After we had grunted, sweated, and trudged half the journey, the mini-bus zoomed to our rescue. The driver, being no fool, was not about to let four Westerners escape along the road over which his one man transportation company held sole rights. We asked his price, considered it fair, and climbed in. Scarcely had we sat down when the driver deftly swung the bus around and headed back to Iran! There was no arguing; we were his prisoners.

At the border, we were greeted with quiet derision by the Persian guards; this was not the first time Westerners had been outsmarted. To cool our tempers, we watched the stripping of a VW bus. The bus had been placed on four blocks, the wheels removed, and tires and hub caps strewn randomly. The three Dutch owners were now anxiously witnessing the disembowelment of the motor.

In Holland, hashish was more or less legal, and young Dutchmen rarely forewent their habit when abroad, especially if they could turn a profit from it. The guards were probably paid a bonus if they discovered drugs, and surely received some satisfaction in sending a group of long-haired invaders to three months in jail. Persian jails were squalid at best, and unless one had a friend to bring food, one nearly starved. Even so, the jailers frequently offered their hash smuggling prisoners a dream inducing smoke to ease the misery.

Despite a lack of mechanical expertise, the guards failed to find any reprehensible substances and gave up with an officious wave. The Dutchmen surveyed the carnage of chrome and steel, and, disheartened, began the hours-long task of mending the damage. Military justice.

Meanwhile, our bus had collected enough passengers for a crossing. Most outstanding was an Indian wrapped in a sheet-like turban, sagging grey trousers and shirt, and vainly sporting a U.S. Army coat, which spoiled the purity of his native appearance. When he learned our nationality (but not our 1A status), he became most friendly and chattered in a tongue we could not understand. Getting no response, he decided to pick an argument with a Persian. Little love exists between Hindu and Moslem, and the ensuing debate was as loud and rapid as it was offensive to the ear. Finally, the driver left his seat and threatened to eject the Indian. The bus swerved frantically, causing more shrill shouting, until the driver nonchalantly regained the wheel with an indignant grunt.

Disaster averted, John and I struck up a one-sided conversation with an elderly gentleman wearing a grey fez, dingy sportcoat, and shoes. He repeatedly pointed to himself and proudly stated, "Hadji." We replied with puzzled looks and begged explanation which arrived in the usual torrent of Babel. Our impasse was solved by one of the Canadians who spoke enough Afghan to communicate. Hadji, he related, was the man's name and signified that he had made the pilgrimage to Mecca. Hadji was now revered throughout Islam as a most holy man; he merely wanted our due respect. We smiled at Hadji and nodded as profusely and humbly as possible. This pleased him so much that he gave us his sir name, "Nehedgifah," which was all sound and fury.

Presently, the bus halted in the middle of nowhere at a red and white iron gate. On either side stood a pair of languid border guards dressed in the sleepy blue-grey of the Afghan army. They ordered everyone off the bus and commanded the baggage to be lowered. We wandered about apprehensively as our packs were untied and our worldly possessions rifled; I had a vision of my pack ending up like the Dutch VW.

As the investigation continued, a lizard chose an inopportune moment to traverse the road. One of the guards spied the poor creature and, with the malice that comes of boredom, he hurled a fist-sized rock at the unsuspecting reptile. Instantly, the lizard was blasted onto its back and emitted a few sharp hisses of its red tongue before giving up the ghost. The guards laughed at their victim and returned to the inspection. I gave a conscientious objector's shudder at their apparent lack of sympathy for life, and considered dying in this desolate, deserted dust bin so far from home a waste of my time!

The guards were human, I reasoned at last, and destroyed the lizard to avoid all risk. This impression of a common desire for survival grew in me as the guards completed their futile search. On reboarding the bus, I smiled at one guard who was quick to return a shining, childlike grin beneath his drooping black mustache. Too bad Americans did not get along as well with all Asians.

At last, our mechanical camel arrived at an assembly of block mud structures, one of which, much to our relief, was a hotel. It occurred to me that the bus driver had an agreement with the hotel proprietor whereby the driver would see to it that there was a group to fill the hotel every night; in return the proprietor paid a fixed commission per head. The soldiers were probably cut in too – the Afghan military-industrial complex.

I preferred to be the victim of collusion rather than strife, and wearily strayed inside. The incoming party was separated into Western and non-Western, in the best interests of our belongings. We were directed into a high-ceilinged room with six cots, bare frames on which to lay our bedrolls. The place seemed clean and safe, perfect for two desperadoes.

After claiming cots, John and I recalled we had not eaten since morning. Such conversation unfailingly contained a long list of sumptuous dishes we had left continents behind. From the commanding ring of "Hamburger" to the melifluous "Milk Shake" to a hearty "Steak 'n Brew" each morsel appeared before us, rested between tongue and palate, and then vanished, drawing out of our craving mouths groans and whines equal to those of dying men.

Our agony was interrupted by the appearance of a small boy named Amir. He had an eager-to-please, nut-brown face, and thickly calloused feet from carrying out orders: he was the ideal servant. Amir wasted no words (and even omitted a few), "You hungry? Come, I show you food."

John and I hesitated, exchanged raised eyebrows, and decided we would not be exploiting our would-be servant if we allowed him to lead us to a royal feast. We two Sahibs followed Amir to what can only be described as a hot dog stand, with the shape and color of a defunct school bus! Except for the swarthy, turbaned Afghan within, the stand could have been found at any American seaside resort.

The menu was a jumble of illegible squiggles, so our "waiter" held up his wares one by one: native rolls, Coke and Fanta Orange; proof that other Americans had been here before us and had the foresight and avarice to provide for thirsty homesick travelers. Although we often grumbled at any Western influence, we were grateful for the ubiquity of soft drinks. To drink the water, we would risk contracting hepititus, cholera, dysentery, and God knows what. Properly vaccinated as we were, the consequences merited every precaution. Beyond the possibility of dying (which compared to some of the alternatives seemed easiest to tolerate), to recover from hepititis, for example, requires six weeks flat on one's back and no alcohol for a year!

We downed four Cokes with fearless gusto and headed back to the hotel.

"Backsheesh, Mem Sahib," Amir cried as he danced around us with an upturned palm. "Backsheesh."

We generously tipped him to quiet him down, and for free he showed us to a wood-heated shower; he could tell it had been days since our last washing.

An hour later, we Westerners settled down to our first Afghan meal of rice, onions, and mutton, steaming in large wooden bowls. Utensils were unheard of; we learned to eat with the right hand only. The left was traditionally reserved for less sanitary functions.

After dinner, the Canadians informed John and me that our young guide would, for a price, introduce us to the pasttime that has made Afghanistan renowned. Temptation soon produced a sum of coins which was then traded for a dark brown cube a half inch thick.

A short brass pipe was found and the four of us made for the underbrush. Mindful of rumors that this fumatory delight was punishable by death, John and I sucked hastily on the mouthpiece. Air and smoke rushed through the elongated metal with a whistling sound which only increased our excitement. Between draws, we fought to hold the magic smoke in our lungs as greed mixed with fear brought us to the verge of coughing. Soon we were rewarded – stoned again. Only this time was different. Regardless of what happened during the remainder of our lives, we were now Hadjis, having made the pilgrimage to the hashish Mecca.

Aglow with a warm tingle, we revelled in our surroundings – the mud hotel, the dust underfoot, the cool night air, the quiet desolation of being eight thousand miles from home; this was freedom: primitive, perhaps never to be seen again.

Not wishing to attract attention, we silently wriggled into our sleeping bags with colorful visions swirling in our heads and an instinctive longing. One problem of Moslem countries was women: most of them were veiled like ghosts from head to toe. And to sleep with a woman without marrying her meant ten years in prison or death! Small wonder Afghan men preferred boys.

In the morning we awoke remarkably refreshed, though dreading the tedious formalities of baggage and passport inspections. Customs came first, a forty minute wait. Evidently our old driver friend had ferried across an early morning contingent. When our turn came, we found that the official in charge spoke English, at least a dialect we could understand. He asked for declarations; we shook our heads, and fearfully stood by as our packs were once again untied and methodically probed.

"What if Amir is in cahoots with the police and planted a few chunks of hash in our packs?" I trembled with post-high paranoia. The thoroughness of the inspection puzzled me, not only because our packs had been checked the day before, but also because I thought the object was to smuggle a certain good out of the country, not into it.

"Passaport," the official ordered, and leafed through to one of the few remaining empty pages.

"Occupation?"

"Stu-dent," John recited in the Arab pronunciation.

We weren't students any more though; we were dodgers: all Americans are: tax-dodgers, artful-dodgers, ball-dodgers, Los Angeles Dodgers, and draft dodgers.

Ka-thunk! Ka-thunk! We were stamped for a one month asylum. No induction ceremony, no basic training. We skipped outside to a large Mercedes bus, paid the driver, saw our packs strapped to the top, and climbed aboard.

"I wonder what's going on back home," John thought aloud to kill time.

"Don't bother," I said. "You know the whole town of Renton is talking about those two outstanding young men who didn't have the courage to defend their native land."

"It's funny isn't it that we who grew up next door to one another, went to the same schools, and all that, should have ended up with draft numbers under 10."

"I'm glad we left before we got the call; makes it look like we just went on vacation," I laughed ironically.

"Wonder if they'll ever let us back," John shook his head.

"Forget it," I said. "After you have been away for a while, you won't want to go back."

"When did you last hear from Jenny?" John persisted.

"Month ago, maybe more. Probably has a new man by now," I answered impatiently. "Look, let's not mention back home again. We've talked about it too much."

We had been waiting restlessly for half an hour when the two Canadians sank into the seats beside us. I asked the one who spoke Afghan when the bus would depart. With a sly grin, he explained, "There's an old Moslem saying: 'Gimella mish-mish,' 'Tomorrow when the apricots blossom;' the apricots haven't blossomed here in 3,000 years."

"That's probably when I'll return to America," I thought distractedly.

Just then the bus began to roll away from the outpost toward the sun-drenched wilderness. Another day of adventure. Where were we going? Where would we sleep tonight? Were we far enough away from the Grand Old USA, or were we taking the overland route to 'Nam?

Yugoslav Dissident Echoes Solzhenitsyn's Criticsm of U.S. Spritual Weakness

By Morris Earle, Jr.

Yugoslavian author and dissident Mihajlo Mihajlov echoed Alexander Solzhenitsyn's Harvard speech of last June, in a milder form, as he criticized America's materialism and spiritual weakness during a speech at Memorial Lounge last Tuesday.

Since publishing his book Moscow Summer, critical of Soviet repression, the 43 year old former assistant professor of philosophy and Russian literature at Zahgreb University has been in and out of Yugoslavian prisons for 13 years. His 40 minute speech, before a crowd of over 130 students and faculty, was read in broken English, and dealt with the events of his personal struggle against Yugoslavian president Tito's regime, and with his spiritual rebirth, which resulted from his suffering in prison.

Following his first imprisonment in 1965, Mihajlo lost his job, and tried to start, with friends, the nation's first independent newspaper. He followed the correct legal channels, but the authorities in his country, which he called "the most liberal communist country in the world," feared Russian objections, and arrested him and his friends for "attempting to found a subversive, underground organization." He was arrested again in 1974 for publishing four articles in the New York Times, which criticized Russian repression. He served a total of eight years in jail for his "crimes," including seven and one half months solitary confinement. He was released from prison last year, in the wake of the Helsinki Conference on human rights.

Commenting on the supposed freedom in Yugoslavia, he said that any dictatorship renders organizations meaningless, just as any number multiplied by zero equals zero. Criticism of his country is not permitted. For example, he said that any citizen who tries to bring in a Yugoslavian-American newspaper can receive three to five years in prison.

In the second part of his speech, professor Mihajlov centered on the religious issue. The true struggle in our time, he said, "was not political (i.e. Capitalism vs. Communism), but rather spiritual and ideological." "Nothing can conquer chaos," he said, "except spiritual, religious renaissance, suffered through one's experience."

He once carried out a hunger strike in prison which lasted 44 days and almost killed him.

Religion which means "link" in Latin, in Mihajlov's view, joins the inner world of a man to the destiny of his fellow men. Most Americans do not recognize the importance of the link, he said, but "those who had lived through and survived totalitarianism" recognize it. He stated that suffering was important to spiritual growth. When everything is taken from a person, he said, "free will, people close to him, walk which he enjoyed, private property," he finds himself "on the edge of an abyss; nevertheless, something exists..." The something, he stated, was what religions call God. "The human spirit," he declared, "has been too long polluted by false ideas (the ubiquity) of science and rationality."

Professor Mihajlov came to America to visit his mother, and to accept an award from the International League for Human Rights. He has been lecturing around the country, and plans to return to Yugoslavia next month. His speech at UVM, part of the Vermont Seminars series, was followed by a question and answer period, with the help of a Yugoslavian interpreter.

He was not hopeful about the immediate future of human rights in Russia. "For dictatorships," he said, "human rights is a far more dangerous weapon than bombs or missiles." He did predict, however, that when aging President Tito dies, Yugoslavia will move towards more freedom, not less.

Chittenden County Teachers Return To Classrooms

By Stacy Cushner

The longest teacher's strike in Vermont's history ended this week when Burlington High School teachers agreed to contract proposals made by the school board and returned to their classrooms on September 16.

The settlement agreed to by both parties after a two week strike and long negotiations calls for a one year contract that includes a five percent increase at the top two steps of the teacher salary scale, and a 3.99 percent increase in the starting pay. A starting teacher at Burlington High School can now expect to make $9,300, while a more experienced and educated teacher will see his or her pay rise in accordance with that experience or education.

Ralph Dodge, president of the Burlington Education Association, said the money used to increase teachers' salaries will enhance the quality of education. Burlington city attorney Joseph E. McNeil replied, "The board agreed to do what it did not want to do," and thought the money could be used elsewhere.

Since more than 100 of the 116 teachers at Burlington High School chose to strike, substitutes filled in while regular teachers picketed outside the school. Burlington High students expressed their thoughts during the strike when thirty students marched to City Hall demanding their regular teachers and coaches. Helen Quintal, BHS senior, captain of the cross country team and president of the student council, said that "it's the students who are getting the 'worst deal'."

The School Board's first proposal called for a two year contract that would add seven percent to salaries with a base pay of $8,943. In the second proposal, Dodge offered the following: (1) increases the base pay to $9,300, (2) five percent increases for the top two salary positions. McNeil said the district did not have the money "in hand" to allow for the salary hikes. A third BEA proposal was also turned down and on the eve of September 5, the BEA voted to strike and Burlington High School was subsequently shut down.

During the strike, Burlington School Superintendent Lansig J. Reinholz said, "plenty of substitutes were available, but students were not given the education they deserved." On the other hand, Dodge said the strike toughened the BEA.

********

Three other teacher strikes ended in Charlotte, Essex, and at the Champlain Valley Union High School in Hinesburg. Charlotte teachers voted to accept a one year contract which would increase base pay salaries from $7,400 to $7,850, allows emergency leave, and increases coach's salaries by $100. Essex town voted 3-6 to ratify a three year contract that increases base pay salaries by 9.4 percent by the third year. CVU high school teachers, the first to strike and the first to return to classes, accepted an offer made by the school board that they had previously rejected.

Vermont was not the only state plagued by teachers' strikes. Over 400,000 students in ten different strikes were affected by teacher strikes this fall.

Apples Anyone?

By Jim Oakes

Mobilizing local residents, migrant pickers and foreign labor, state apple growers this week began the frenzied four to five week picking season. Approximately 1200 people will be employed by growers statewide to bring in the apple crop, according to Ray Lovely, director of Vermont Job Service.

The apple industry is a million dollar agri-business in Vermont, and success depends on the cooperation of two sometimes unreliable allies – the weather and the pickers.

Vermont growers start early in the summer recruiting their temporary labor force, and often hire pickers continually throughout the season. Lean pay, long hours and hard work are responsible for a high drop-out rate among neophyte pickers, and finding enough hands willing to do the work is a perennial problem for Vermont growers.

To qualify, according to Lee Blodgett, supervisor of Employer Services at the Burlington office of Vermont Job Service, an applicant must be available six days a week, 8:00 to 5:00. Pickers must be able to provide their own transportation and be willing to work in all weather. Last year, the Burlington office provided 31 pickers to growers in the Chittenden county and Grand Isle areas.

The Vermont Job Service is an intermediary between apple growers and local unemployed Vermonters. Growers submit requests for pickers, and the Job Service provides potential workers. The growers judge which individuals are qualified and capable.

Many would-be apple harvesters have a romantic image of pickers plucking fruit from overladen branches, surrounded by a backdrop of autumn foliage. Even on a nice autumn day the morning dew soaks shoes and numbs fingers. The picking bucket always weighted with apples, chafes the shoulders like a full knapsack.

Ladders are long and narrow, and coupled with heavy swinging buckets, a picker's balance is precarious. Most of Vermont's orchards are planted on uneven ground. The picker, to reach all the apples, must often approach a tree from the downhill side. To find oneself suspended 25 feet in the air, knees braced against the sides of the ladder and both hands picking furiously, is not at all uncommon.

Unless one is blessed with hands that are exceptionally quick and long in the fingers, there are no fortunes to be made in picking apples. The standard wage is 40 cents a bushel (two full picking baskets). There is a bonus of up to 10 cents per bushel for pickers who last the entire season. Ray Allen, owner of Allenholm farms in South Hero, said "A top picker can earn between $700 and $800 during the four to five week season."

The pickers employed in Vermont are from diverse backgrounds. The picking elite, with names like 'Lightning Joe' are migrant black workers who pick fruit and vegetables up and down the eastern seaboard year round. However, the majority of Vermont apples are picked by Vermonters. A national court order issued in 1973 specified pickers must be first recruited locally, then nationally, and finally internationally. On average, Lovely says, 500-650 pickers are domestic, while 150-300 are foreign.

So far the weather has been ideal, say Vermont growers. Near perfect temperatures have produced a particularly red apple this year, a crucial factor in the saleability of the product.

Unless the apple is skillfully picked with the stem intact, and handled gently, the fruit is bruised. In the past, local pickers have proven less skillful than the migrant laborers brought into the state. Asked about the expected quality of local labor this year, grower Ray Allen was philosophic: "Pickers are like anything else... doctors or newspapermen. You get good ones and bad ones."

With a waiting harvest of 60,000 bushels spread over 150 acres, Ray Allen, in true Vermont fashion, seemed calmly optimistic about his pickers, the weather, and the success of this year's crop.

Communist Youth Organization Works To Promote Change

By John Letteri

In an effort to provide another perspective on the capitalist system under which this country operates, the Communist Youth Organization (CYO) runs educational programs on the merits of socialism, takes part in worker's rights demonstrations, and promotes socialist ideals such as the success of China's governmental policies.

Founded in Burlington in the spring of 1976, the CYO is part of a well-organized national CYO. The organization operates on the premise that youth is one of the most potentially powerful political forces in this country, and that they need only be given impetus and direction before their beliefs will initiate significant social change.

Recently, through the efforts of the CYO and other organizations, work-study students were granted a raise to minimum wage, where previously they had worked for less. Further, the CYO planned and carried out the demonstration against General Westmoreland, and offered sessions explaining who he was and what he stood for. The CYO also concerns itself with the lack of housing in the Burlington area, equal rights for women, and UVM's investments in South Africa.

A spokesperson for the CYO, who preferred anonymity, said that if there is a struggle going on, in their view, people are being oppressed or denied rights in any way, CYO will be there and will be available to help fight the alleged injustices. She said that CYO believes the capitalist system is not fair to all participants, being in the hands of a "small, rich ruling class." She said socialism offers a much more equitable government, where the wealth and power of a country are spread out to include workers and all people.

SLS Offers Effective Advice

By Mary Dixon

Students with troubling legal problems in need of effective counsel now have a viable option at the Student Legal Service.

Only two years old, the SLS is just getting on its feet. Last year it was operational, but most of the activity was organizational. Randy Freedman, the student director, spent time this summer finalizing the details for the full implementation of the SLS. He wrote the handbook that completely describes the service. They are available at the Billings front desk.

The service functions on a daily basis as a referral and informational center for legal questions. A student going to SLS with a legal problem is advised of his/her rights and given enough information to be able to make a rational decision for his/her next move. The main emphasis is to save the student money. If there is a way a student can avoid going through an attorney, it is discussed. The areas SLS specializes in are: criminal, consumer, traffic, utilities and landlord/tenant.

The SLS is S.A. funded, thus the cost is pre-paid by the $12 activity fee on students' bills. The money that SLS received is used for the attorney retaining fee, an answering service, legal research, machine, supplies and the phone. Because student dollars fund it, student use of SLS is free, if their bill is paid.

In the hierarchy of personnel involved in the SLS, all except the volunteers receive academic credit for their work. Two freshmen apprentice interns (1 credit), four student interns (3 credits), one intern supervisor (2 credits) and the student director (3 credits) make up the SLS staff. A professional licensed attorney is also employed by the service. He conducts hourly seminars for the training of the interns and has a 24 hour open line to SLS should they need him. He is responsible for meeting with the SLS personnel weekly to go over problems and answer questions.

Interns not only are responsible for the daily handling of cases, but are also required to do an independent research project. The projects will be practical, such as: a lawyer referral list, avenues of rent control, rights of the criminally convicted getting student loans, and copyrights for students. One project, already completed by Randy Freedman, is an apartment rating through surveys. A possibility of working with the Church Street Center and other community groups in coordination with some projects is likely. The most outstanding projects will be published for student use.

SLS arose out of the belief that students were sorely in need of a place where they could seek free legal advice. Since its inception, SLS has had about 100 people come in with legal questions. Of those 100 people, 24 cases were serious enough to have a file on them. Of those 24, there were five DWI cases, four of which were dropped, eleven landlord/tenant cases, eight of which went in the students' favor. Each person who has received help from the SLS has filled out evaluations of the service. According to the director, they are positive, saying that the service was helpful in a direct way.

The SLS office is on the second floor of Billings in the northwest corner of the building. Office hours will be posted once they are established.

Burlington's $22 Million Lakefront Development Receives City Approval

By John Letteri

The first phase of a planned $22 million dollar development project on Burlington's lakefront has received preliminary approval from the city's Planning Commission, Waterfront Review Board, and Design Review Board.

The first phase of the development will include the construction of 120 condominiums, 25,000 square feet of commercial and retail space, a health club, marina, and parking. It will be built on approximately four acres of land and cost between $8 and $8.5 million. In addition, the city of Burlington has received a $3 million grant from the federal government which will enable the city to install adequate water and sewage lines and utility hook-ups for the development area.

The condominiums will cost between $45,000 and $80,000. Earlier estimates ranged from $30-50 thousand, but the additional cost of driving pilings into the soft earth on the lakefront to support the buildings has added to the cost, said Lawlor Waken, one of the two principal partners in Triad Corp., a Montreal based firm that will do the work.

The proposed development will also include the construction of a boardwalk approximately thirty feet in width, and a small municipal park on the south end of the development. Burlington Planning Commissioner Randall Kamerbeek said this will hopefully draw people back to the lakefront, and make it a public place, as well as a private residential area.

Kamerbeek said the landscaping and lighting along the boardwalk will change as the boardwalk approaches the residential area. For example, low lights, and smaller shrubs will be used to create a more quiet atmosphere in front of the condominiums.

The overall plan calls for the construction of 420 condominiums on approximately ten acres of land. The land is owned by Central Vermont Railroad, who have leased it to Triad Corp. Phase I will be built on four acres of land, and Phase II will be constructed on the remaining six acres. Oil tanks presently occupy the land for Phase II, but their lease expires in 1980, at which time they will be removed and Phase II construction will begin.

Phase I construction, will begin in late October, and the first condominiums should be ready for occupancy by August of 1979, according to Burlington city officials. Although Triad has received preliminary approval for their construction plans from the city, they must still obtain Act 250 permits and other state permits, as well as appear before the city boards for final approval before beginning work.

The main reason the development must go through so many commission appearances is that Burlington wants to be guaranteed the city will not be aesthetically hurt by the development. For example, Triad is building the condominiums at three, four, and five stories. The differing heights will correspond to the slope of Battery Street; as a result, the view of the lake from uptown will not be blocked by the condominiums.

Vermont Yankee Cracks Costing Consumers

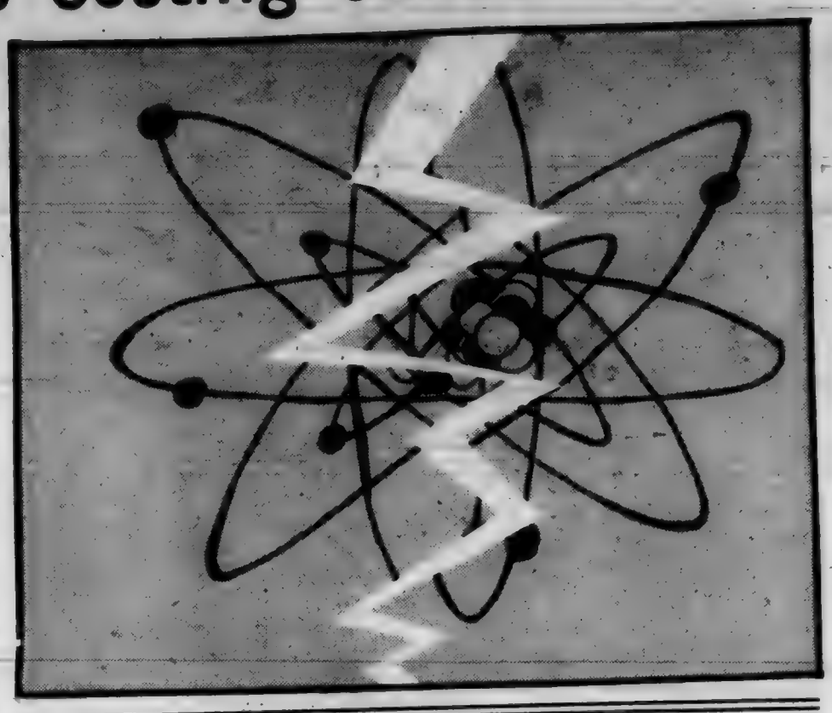
By Brooke Laffan



Cracks that developed in one of Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant's principle safety systems resulted in a forty-five day shutdown of the plant and the incurrence of a $5.6 million loss. The cracks have since been repaired, but the question of who will pay for the loss remains unanswered.

Burlington Electric Department (BED) said Tuesday their rate payers will have an extra $1.20 on their monthly bills for the next six months to compensate for the loss BED incurred while Yankee was shut down. BED had to buy more expensive power from the New England Power Pool during the shutdown. BED is the only state utility able to increase their rates without going before the Public Service Board.

Less fortunate state utilities are considering lawsuits against either Vermont Yankee or General Electric, the company that was welding the safety system when the cracks developed. General Electric feels Vermont Yankee is to blame for the damage and resulting shutdown because they ordered the work done while the power plant was in operation. General Electric was attempting to weld additional supports to the plant's torus when the cracks occurred. The torus suppresses dangerous increases in pressure near the reactor and is Vt. Yankee's "last line of defense." GE claims the temperature differentials in the torus while the plant was operating caused welding difficulties and the subsequent cracks.

To add to the turmoil, Vermont Yankee finds fault with GE's work, and may consider a lawsuit against them. Vermont Yankee also expresses the belief that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is partly responsible because they instituted harsher safety standards, necessitating the additional supports to be put in place. The NRC maintains it never gave orders for design modifications of the torus, and is puzzled as to why the work was done without their prior knowledge.

The recent torus problems were identified as far back as 1972 by Dr. Steven Hanauer, a high-ranking Atomic Energy Commission member. Dr. Hanauer raised questions about the safety of the pressure suppression system. The existence of a memo disclosing this was not known until a recent investigation uncovered it.

In 1976, Yankee shut down temporarily to deal with the torus safety problem. A General Electric Task Force discovered if there was a loss of too much collant for the reactor, the torus would jerk to such an extent as to jar itself loose. Although GE was successful in tying the torus down temporarily, Yankee still operated below the minimum safety margins set by the NRC.

Thus, a long-term program was instituted by the NRC to find a permanent solution to the problem. In the meantime, Yankee and other nuclear plants operating with similar pressure suppression devices were granted the largest safety waiver in history, and continued to operate. As of September 16, Yankee shut down and will remain so until October 13 for refueling and maintenance purposes.

Saga Dining Changes Hard To Digest

Inside L/L's new dining hall

By Sarah Bailey

In an effort to ease the pressure on some cafeterias and to provide students with more dining options, Saga Food Service has reduced its unlimited seconds policy in some dining halls, and expanded the a la carte system to include both the Living/Learning Center and Wright Hall.

The 1977-78 Residential Life survey "gave a strong indication that it would be advantageous for another area of campus to be similar to Wright," explained Ron Beaulieu, director of the Saga Food Service at UVM. "There was also a definite trend away from paying for unlimited seconds all the time," Beaulieu continued.

The factors in the decision included the problem of one or two cafeterias being overcrowded during the lunch hour and an effort to satisfy the wants of the majority of the students.

"The best facilities are not being used during lunch," stated Beaulieu, "and as a result, Billings and Given are overcrowded and inefficient." By placing the a la carte program, which has a fixed menu, at Living/Learning, the hope is that it will draw some of the students back towards the residential cafeterias for lunch. The location of Living/Learning near the center of campus may encourage this, he said.

Saga is making an effort to satisfy the diverse wants and needs of the student body. "There are three basic needs on campus — male, female, and vegetarian," said Beaulieu. "What we're trying to do is provide something for each."

The old program of unlimited seconds remains the solution to the group that eats a great deal. "It's mostly the male athletes," according to Beaulieu, "but many of the lighter eaters — mostly the women — don't always want to pay $2.80 for dinner or $2.00 for lunch if they're not going to eat that much. For them, the a la carte program works because they pay only for what they eat."

The design of both the a la carte program and the snack bars is to provide a standard menu that is always available including three or four different choices, as well as a salad and soup bar. No fee is set for a meal, rather, one pays for only the items he chooses.

The a la carte program is also being used as an attempt to fulfill the vegetarian needs on campus. This is where the soup and salad bar comes in," stated Beaulieu, "along with always having, for instance, a meatless sauce for the spaghetti."

The menu for Waterman has also been somewhat revised to facilitate vegetarian needs.

The meals at the a la carte program are those that were favorites last year. Beaulieu explained that by placing well known favorites on an unvarying menu, students could take better advantage of the system. "If, for example, a person read the menu at Harris-Millis and didn't like anything on it, he would know that he could always get, say, lasagna at Living/Learning. If the menu varied at all, then it wouldn't be as useful." There is, however, a varying "daily special."

Beaulieu emphasized that most of the changes are trying to meet the student needs. "Each year we get a different mix of the student population — no two semesters are even alike. As people indicate trends and preferences, we try to fill them."

Early indications show a mixed success to the program. People appear to like the idea of a la carte, as attendance has almost doubled, from 200-250 people per meal to almost 500 at Living/Learning. This however, does not seem to be easing the congestion at Billings. "It's early in the year," said Beaulieu, "we have to see what happens."

Hamilton Cooperative Working Well

By Rich Hyland

Initiated under the auspices of the Student Association and the Department of Residential Life last semester, the alternative living situation, or cooperative, in Hamilton dorm is off to a good start.

In return for a $130 reduction in their room fees, for two out of every ten days, its residents are required to participate in a rotating schedule of housekeeping chores which range from re-filling the paper towel dispenser to scrubbing the bathroom toilets.

"I love it," said Michael Deatsch, sophomore. "Hamilton is the best dorm on campus!" Although he admitted that Hamilton was not his first choice, Deutsch stated that he "would not be surprised to see the co-op plan spread to other dorms."

Hamilton was not a popular choice at room-choosing last semester, reflected in the hall's large number of freshmen. However, Tom Niemi, who with his wife Lynn are the Hall Advisors to Hamilton, said "freshmen add "vitality and energy" to a residence hall and that this has proven to be an asset in initiating a cooperative program. A waiting list for Hamilton exists now, and the students on it are predominately freshmen currently assigned to McAuley and the shoeboxes.

Could Hamilton have been chosen more for its Redstone location than as an alternative dorm situation? Niemi acknowledges this possibility. "Initially, someone may rather be elsewhere," he said. "But after a while a sense of community, our true aim, may settle in." Niemi admitted that one resident has already made plans to leave Hamilton, but added that "no one is screaming to be let out."

"We hated it at first," said one freshman placed temporarily in the second floor lounge, "and we didn't feel like doing the work. But now everyone is pitching in to help." Other

POLITICAL ACTIVISM OF THE 1960'S

JERRY RUBIN discusses: What happened in the 1960's? • How did America's campuses become so politically turbulent? • What did it feel like to be inside a political movement that changed the world? • How did the students of the 1960's stop a war and topple two presidents? • What role did marijuana sexual liberation and rock music play in the yippie movement? • What turned the activism of the 1960's into the apathy of the 1970's? • What is the relationship between the women's movement, the self-awareness decade of the 1970's and political activism? • What is the political responsibility of today's college students?

"Jerry Rubin was fantastic - A joy to work with and a terrific crowd pleaser!

Senatorial Elections October 3-5

Money, Money, Money

The S.A. now has a new treasurer, Jon Myers, who will be assisted by Sue Clickner, the assistant treasurer, in handling S.A. Club budgets and daily financial problems. Sue Clickner has written a revised S.A. Club Treasurers Manual and devised a quiz which all S.A. Club treasurers will be required to take before procuring any funds from their respective budgets.

With the new position of assistant treasurer this year, it is hoped that the treasurer will be able to concentrate more on managing the total $175,000 budget while still dealing with major club problems and policies. The assistant treasurer will be responsible for handling all day-to-day operations, i.e. purchase orders, ledger balances, checks, etc.

If you have any questions concerning your club or organization's financial status, either Sue or John will be available in the S.A. office the following hours: Monday 11–4; Tuesday 1:40–4; Wednesday 11–4; Thursday 1–4; Friday 11–4.

S.A. Club News

The S.A. Concert Bureau will be presenting the band Little Feat in concert September 29th at 9 p.m. in the UVM Patrick Gymnasium. All seats are reserved and some are still available. Tickets are $6.00 and can be reserved by phoning 656-3418 or purchased at the Lane Series Box Office in Grossemount.

Speakers Bureau

The S.A. Speakers Bureau will be presenting 60's anti-war activist and yippie Jerry Rubin sometime in the near future. No specific date has yet been indicated.

Faculty-Student Committees

If you would like to become more involved in the academic and social affairs at UVM, students are needed to become active participants on the following committees:

–University Hearing Panel – in charge of all Academic Honesty Trials

–Faculty-Senate Academics committees

–The Vermont Council – a committee of 150 concerned citizens advising the Board of Trustees on the future of UVM.

–Presidential Advisory Council – a committee which has direct contact with Lattie Coor on current student issues.

If you're interested in becoming a member of any of these committees, please drop by the S.A. office in Billings and tell us about your interests.

Student Legal Service

The Student Legal Service, under the direction of Randy Freedman and Wendy Wolff, is now in full operation. The co-directors have a staff of four interns and two apprentices who will assist them in the legal research required to help UVM students in need of legal advice. The SLS has also published an informational booklet concerning its functions and available resources which can be obtained at any dorm front desk or at the Billings Center Front Desk. If you have any legal problems in the following areas – Landlord/Tenant, Contractual Law, Small Claims, Traffic, Misdemeanor/Criminal – the SLS can be of service to you. Give them a call (they have a 24 hour answering service) at 656-4379.

UVM Students on the Board of Trustees

Applications to become one of the two students who are voting members on the Board of Trustees are available now in the S.A. office. Students wishing to become a trustee must be either freshmen or sophomores, since this position requires the student to be a member of the Board for a two-year term. If you believe you can provide the student body with a strong and responsive voice on the major decision-making body of the university, then this leadership position is for you. Only with forceful and demanding student input will the financial and academic problems of UVM be solved.

S.A. Elections

The UVM Student Association will be holding S.A. Senate elections for the 78-79 academic year on October 3-5th. Thirty-seven students will be elected to Senate, eighteen of which will be on-campus students, fourteen off-campus students, and five from the Greek houses. Students interested in the S.A. and its ability to help UVM become more responsive to student and community needs are encouraged to run for Senate. All candidates must pick up their nomination signature papers at the S.A. office in Billings and return them complete with signatures to Sally Keith, the S.A. office secretary, by September 29th.

students remarked that sharing housekeeping duties is leading to better, all-around cooperation between residents. "People are being more considerate of each other," said one. "No one is cranking their stereo at six in the morning and people are taking responsibility for any mess they make."

Asked if "cooperation" helped curb hall rowdiness, Niemi answered that the "co-op doesn't limit physical activity such as wall sports." Rather, it distinguishes between destructive and creative activity, he said.

An inspection of Hamilton's halls contradicts previously expressed fears of student irresponsibility. Students remarked that even after fourth floor's successful Toga party last week many people volunteered to help with clean up. Actions like this, the residents believe, is evidence that a true, close-knit community is developing in Hamilton.

"The hall is getting close and the coop program is uniting them," stated H. A. Niemi.

"However, I don't feel that we are proven yet. Next year at room choosing will be the true sign of whether we were successful or not."

Summit Results

After 13 days of intensive meetings at Camp David, President Carter, Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin appeared in front of the press on Sunday night.

The results of the meetings was a long sought after "framework" for a Mideast peace plan The framework calls for an eventual total Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai desert and partial withdrawal from the West Bank.

On Sunday night the three leaders signed the two part plan. The first section deals with the West Bank. It sets up a five-year period of negotiation between Israel, Jordan and the Palestinians residing in the West Bank and Gaza region.

During these negotiations, a plan for self-government by the residents to replace Israeli military government will be determined. Israel will also withdraw some of its military personnel from that area.

The second document ends a state of war between Egypt and Israel and sets up formal relations between the two countries. Israel has promised to withdraw all of its troops from the Sinai following the signing of a peace treaty with Egypt. The Israelis have occupied the Sinai since 1967. Both Sadat and Begin must return home and offer the framework to their respective governments. There is still substantial obstacles to overcome, but the results were seen by U.S. officials as "a significant step forward in seeking a final resolution to the Mideast dispute."

Earthquakes Batter Iran

An earthquake measuring seven on the Richter scale, devastated Tabas, Iran last Saturday. There are feared to be 15,000 people dead and many more homeless.

Shah Mohammed Rexa Pahlevi ordered 56 tons of grains, sugar and tea flown in by Air Force planes to the remote mountain area.

Although rescue operations were underway in the small town near the Afghanistan border, supplies and help fell short of need. Soldiers and civilians, wearing white masks to avoid the stench of death, pulled thousands from the wreckage of Tabas.

Hundreds of injured of all ages lay in makeshift field hospitals on the outskirts of town awaiting medical treatment. It was unlikely they would receive adequate care due to the lack of medicine and manpower.

Terrorist Gives Self Away

A recently arrested leader of the Red Brigade terrorists, Corrado Alunni, gave himself away with a slip of the tongue last week.

Alunni was arrested after police conducted surveillance on his apartment.

At first police questioning, Alunni identified himself as an architect named Massimo Turicchia. When he was asked who should be notified of his arrest, he said "My mother, Liberata Alunni."

Police caught his error and subsequently subjected him to intensive interrogation. Alunni, upon realizing his error, admitted his true identity and called himself a "fighting communist."

Alunni is believed to be the master mind behind the Aldo Moro kidnapping and subsequent murder.

Carter's Popularity

Jimmy Carter's apparent success in the recent negotiations with Israel Prime Minister Menachem Begin and Egyptian President Anwar Sadat should be a turning point in his image problem.

His popularity after plunging from 67 percent to 39 percent in the polls should see a favorable upsurge in the near future.

Receiving acclaim from both home and abroad, Carter has proved he can be a successful leader in foreign affairs.

One of his major criticisms has been that he was too inexperienced to be an adequate world leader. But after bipartisan praise for him from Capitol Hill, Speaker of the House Tim O'Neil said he wouldn't be surprised to see Carter's popularity jump 20-25 points in the public opinion polls.

Although the Camp David summit doesn't promise peace, it appears to offer the best chance for it since the inception of Israel in 1948.

Carter's Vacation Expenses

President Carter's August trip to Idaho and Georgia has been estimated to cost taxpayers at least $114,000.

The Associated Press accumulated easily obtainable expenses such as hotel, transportation and local security fees. It was unable to obtain every expense, so that the figure is considered conservative.

The money to come out of the President's own pocket for the trip was reported to be at least $2232.

Carter paid $1800 to certain outfitters who took his family down the Salmon River and $336 for lodging in Grand Teton National Park.

Approximately $36,000 was spent on lodging White House aides and staff. Another $37,777 was used for the First Family's transportation.

Although no figures of previous presidents' vacations were available, a Congressional committee estimated that in 1974 the government spent 17 million on three houses used by former President Richard Nixon.

Nicaraguan Troops Regain Leon

After seven days of street to street fighting, the Nicaraguan national guard of President Anastasio Somoza Debagles retook control of the northern city of Leon from communist rebels. Much of the city of Leon lay in ruin after the battle.

The government troops were also attacking the last guerilla strongholds in the towns of Esteli and Penas Blancas.

The rebels are led by guerillas of the Sandinista National Liberation Front who staged a general uprising 12 days ago to overthrow Somoza's right-wing government.

The civil war threatens to involve neighboring nations of Costa Rica and Venezuela which have been reported by the Somoza government as the rebels.

The Naked Truth

The police investigated a woman's complaint last week in Milwaukee and were somewhat shocked at the full story.

The woman said that a man in a car started following her when she left a shopping center and after being unable to shake him, rode to the police station. The man waited in his car while she complained to police. When two officers approached the man, they found him clad only in shoes and socks.

The man explained that he was following the girl because he thought it was his girlfriend, who drives a car of similar make and color.

He said that after meeting his girlfriend they quarreled and she drove off in her car with his clothes inside. He told a district attorney that he was trying to get his clothes back because his wife would get suspicious if he came home nude.

The district attorney told the man to seek counseling.

Zip to be Enlarged

The U.S. Postal Service announced last week that it plans to increase the zip code from five digits to nine.

Four more digits will be added on over the next two and one-half years.

The purpose of the addition is to increase automation and hold down postal rates. The new numbers will be used mainly by bulk mailers such as newspapers with home delivery or department store catalogues.

Since labor costs make up approximately 85 percent of the Postal Service budget, it is hoped the new system will cut the cost in half.

Ford Indicted on Criminal Charges

The Ford Motor Company was indicted on criminal charges last week by an Indiana grand jury. The indictments stem from a Pinto auto crash where three teenager girls were burned to death. The jury said that Ford knew the fuel tanks were unsafe, but did nothing about it.

The panel believed the tanks were faultily designed so as to burst into flames upon rear end impact.

The grand jury passed down indictments of three counts of reckless homicide and one count of criminal negligence.

A corporate indictment was decided on by the grand jury but Elkhart County prosecutor Michael Constentino said that individuals could have been indicted.

A corporate indictment carries no jail term. Spokesmen for Ford said they would study the case and act accordingly.

Ford is in the process of recalling 1.5 million 1971-76 Pintos and 30,000 Mercury Bobcats. This recall could cost Ford at least 40 million dollars.

Andrus Blasts Critics

In a speech delivered Friday, Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus violently criticized those opponents of the administration's plan to preserve vast tracts of Alaskan wildlands.

Andrus cited certain critics by name and accused them of trying to "rewrite history" by intentionally distorting his proposals. He also said that assertions that the proposals would hinder development of the 49th state were "pure baloney."

As Congress nears adjournment, it appears reluctant to pass the bill that would create thousands of new acres of national parks and forests.

Busing in Los Angeles

The first busing of school children in the Los Angeles area began peacefully last week. Although there were pickets at some schools and many buses carried fewer students than planned, city and school officials generally expressed satisfaction.

Los Angeles is the largest city in the nation to undertake school desegregation.

The largest absenteeism came from the predominately white areas of the San Fernando Valley who were traveling into minority areas on the city's east side.

The plan that went into effect September 12 affects a maximum of 86,600 students, most of them in the fourth through eighth grade. Of this number, 32,200 were scheduled to be bused.

EPA Bans MMT

Last week the Environmental Protection Agency banned refinery use of gasoline additive methylcyclopentadienyl maganese tricarbonal or MMT. The additive is used in unleaded gasoline to boost octane ratings and was banned because it contributes to air pollution. The EPA move will probably result in a price hike for unleaded gasoline.

Yankee Fever... Fenway Freeze?

By Jesse Gadson

The Yankees were a team plagued for the most part of the season with a controversial manager, injuries and low batting averages. Who could believe that a team that was 14½ games out of first place would own the top spot Sept. 17 by 2½ games? For all you Yankee fans who gave up on the '78 Yanks, shame on you. There's one thing in August and September you can always expect: the Yankees to play like champions and the Red Sox to play like the Bad News Bears!

The Yanks and the Red Sox have played the last two seasons like most Ali fights from '73–'77. The Yankees played dead the first seven rounds and came alive for the big ones. Instead of rope-a-dope, it's fizzle-then-sizzle. Once again the Yankees are playing superb baseball at the season's critical stage. Boston has been playing in this particular fashion since 1972. It was stated in the Boston Globe that since 1972, if the seasons were 125 games long, the Sox would have won the division in '72, '73, '74, '77 and '78. For the Red Sox, it's sizzle then fizzle. The Yankees in the past two seasons have shown the baseball world what a champion team should play like. Well, the Red Sox seem to spend too many seasons with their hands on their necks to play championship caliber ball when the going gets tough.

I have spent four years in Red Sox Country and none has been more gratifying than this one. This was going to be the year the Sox won everything. Why not? They added two starting pitchers and two fine infield gloves. This writer surely thought the Red Sox were the team to beat.

But the Yanks were aware of this and soon rallied to the cause. They went into Fenway trailing by four with as many games to play. They not only beat Boston, they hammered them to death. As one New York writer put it: "The Yankees murdered the Red Sox in their cozy living room where no one is supposed to have the audacity even to look at them cross-eyed." Prior to the Yanks' massacre at Fenway, the Sox lost only 18 home games. The Yanks were obviously unaware of these impressive statistics, as they exploded for 42 runs on 67 hits in a clean four-game sweep. Boston could only muster nine runs and 21 hits. In one category, Boston clearly took the lead however, errors; they had 12.

It was a good feeling Monday morning after the four-game-romp that the Bronx Bombers were tied for first place. Yankee fans could hold their heads high. It is the Yankee fans now who can laugh and relax.

But the Yanks knew they shouldn't become overconfident but rather concentrate on their next series. They obviously kept their cool well and strolled into their next series with Boston by a slim but comfortable 1½ game lead.

The Bronx Bombers returned to New York ready to mow down any opponent. Boston crawled into the stadium after losing seven of eight. The stage was set for this series; Boston had to sweep or weep. Need I tell the reader of the tissue in Boston this past Monday. After the series was over, the Yanks having won two were relaxed and smiling and the BoSox were sad and dejected. It looks like we're going to see Carleton Fisk making chewing tobacco commercials during the season. Lynn and Yaz already have box seats next to Yankee owner George Steinbrenner for the world series in New York.

I often wonder what causes a team with the great potential of Boston to choke every year. It appears that Boston doesn't know how to play like a first place team when the pressure's on. They reminisce too much. The Yankees' bats and arms were making a lot of noise, and Boston started listening, and played timid baseball. Bunting when they should have been hitting, taking singles [illegible] should have been doubles. But let's give [illegible]re credit is due. The Bronx Bombers have been playing outstanding baseball. They played the last two months like every game was a world series. People say they are the best team money can buy. Who cares? Steinbrenner only did what others could have done. He built a monster of a team that could weather anything – even Billy Martin. No matter what happens after this season ends, the Yankees belong in a class by themselves.

Sox 7, Yanks 3

By Henry Chamberlain

That was the headline which greeted loyal Beantown fans last Monday. The Sox were back. For the first time in their last seven meetings, the Sox had been true to form and beaten the Bronx Bombers. The hero was the Boomer, George Scott, who had previously gone 0-for-36. Where did the Sox go for almost 3 weeks when they were 5 for 20 and allowed the Yankees to play catch-up?

You really have to go position by position. For the last 3 weeks our first baseman, Carl Yastrzemski, has been playing like the old man of the League that he is. His average has been falling, he has no extra base hits, and he has been making errors in the field. After more than five hundred doubles, three hundred and seventy home runs, and numerous Golden Gloves, Yaz has temporarily gone dry.

At second base we have the usually exciting Jerry Remy. The double play combination of Remy and Burleson is easily one of the best in baseball. However, an interesting Remy statistic is that he has stolen but twenty-three bases as of now. He hasn't been playing as aggressively as he should – like many of his teammates.

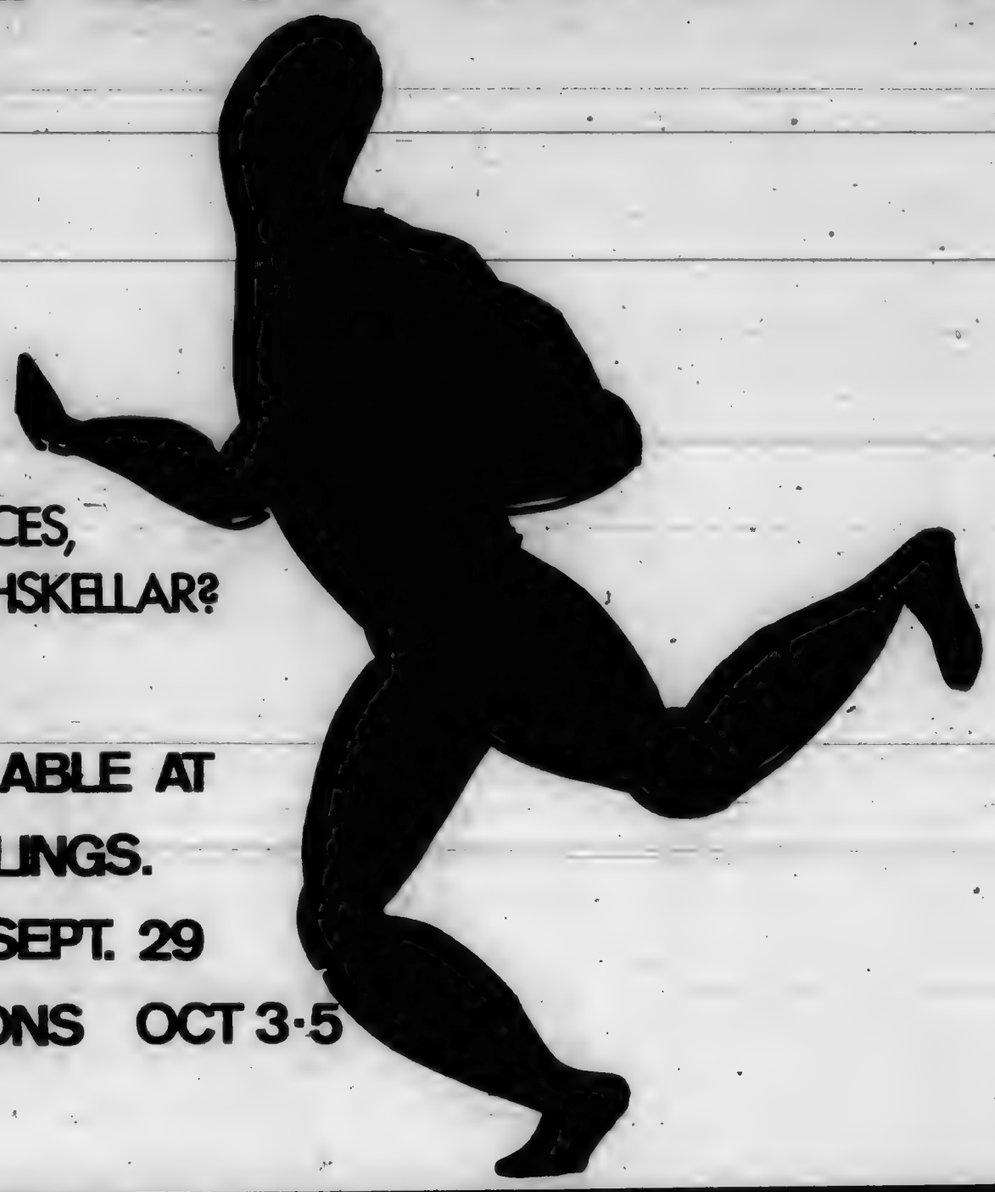
Rooster, or Rick Burleson for outsiders, has been playing a steady while not outstanding shortstop. If anyone on the BoSox squad acts as a barometer of the team's success, it is Burleson. That aggressive, we-can't-be-beaten pride which propelled the squad over the .700 mark is not there. Baseball is a game of breaks, once a team becomes tentative, even indecisive about what to do, the breaks inevitably start going the other way.

Third base is the position which bothers me more than anywhere else. Butch Hobson was an awesome batter and fielder last season. His statistics were among the most impressive to be found anywhere in the American League. Not this season. The difference is bone chips in the elbow. With this affliction, which in hindsight should have been corrected with surgery in May, Hobson has been ineffective. He hasn't hit a home run in more than 3 months. He has made many errors throwing to first base as his elbow locks up on him, making him somewhat ineffective in the field.

Jim Rice plays left field, need I say more. While many of the rest of the Sox tried to sleep September off, Jim Rice did not. He is going to get two hundred hits, forty plus home runs, one hundred and thirty plus runs batted in, bat somewhere in the .320's, and win the League's Most Valuable Player Award without much trouble. Rice is awesome just to see standing at the plate.

Fred Lynn plays center field. As the other half of the dynamic duo, along with Jim Rice, Fred has been playing a steady position. No other center fielder in the League is as good as Lynn, his range and arm keep numerous runs from ever crossing the plate. His bat has been a little less lively, but Fred is solid.

Playing right field is a man with doubtless the best arm in the American League, Dwight Evans. As with many players, Dwight is a streak hitter. During June, July, and into August, Dwight was hitting the long ball, in September he hasn't been. And so it goes, and so it goes.



Not to overlook the heart of the team, indeed, Carlton Fisk is doing the catching duties this year. He has been doing his usual excellent job behind the plate. Of all the backstops in baseball, Carlton gets hit the most – a hazard of being the best at his position. With the bat, Carlton has cooled off as have many of the Bosox. But with 10 games left in the season, it would seem time for the Giant Killers to tame the American League East and the Los Angeles Dodgers.

A key to the momentary September lapse is George Scott. If base hits could be purchased, Scott would have spent quite a bit by now. Going 0-for-24 early in September, and now just over a 0-for-36 stretch, the Boomer has been on vacation. However, last Sunday the Boomer showed the Yankees he still had something to say.

For pitching, it has been Louis Tiant in September. The master showman has been it besides the always reliable arm of Bob Stanley. Mr. Eckersley has been hot and cold, cold when it counts. Bill Lee hasn't pitched well since July. Wright has been totally unpredictable, and Mr. Torrez will win only if you score 5 runs for him. Oh, Bill Campbell hasn't been heard from, maybe next year.

Well, that about does it. The Sox are still in striking position. The Yankees are a team of little more than average talents, the Sox a team of great potential. Red Sox fever has cooled off a bit, but nail 5 in a row and the Sox are back. Beantown is not going to give up without a fight, it just took a slight breather.

A Facelift And Analysis

To Go, Please

by Randy McMullen

The walls are glossy and smell of new paint. They are not marred by a single piece of writing that would indicate an LSD experience, a philosophical revelation, or a friend that has had too much to drink.

The floors are newly carpeted, and the material is relatively free of party stains and cigarette burns.

The rooms are carpeted also, and are equipped with the kind of dimmer lights that one might find in a suburban living room. The students there are split evenly: some think that it looks like a pleasant hotel; others compare it to a hospital.,.

If someone had told me two years ago the above passage referred to Coolidge Hall, I would have laughed. Coolidge was not the place for fancy lights, for many of them were eventually shattered during the course of a year. As for the walls, any new paint job was quickly lost behind the onslaught of graffiti that grew annually like a fungus, much of it incoherent or illegible. The floors were always wet from the last water-fight, and there was to them a murky aroma that had the maids grumbling every morning.

But what sounds like uninhabitable conditions at Coolidge were happily ignored by its students. The building relished its reputation as "the place to party," and many were proud that the dorm was feared or despised by a good deal of the UVM community.

But that was before this summer, when a $600,000 facelift occurred that has made Coolidge all but unrecognizable to its former residents. It is now a respectable building, and is lived in by what the UVM administration hopes will be responsible people. Both Keith Miser, the dean of students, and Stephen Petersen, the director of Residential Life, are hoping that Coolidge's "community spirit" will remain intact with none of the destructive tendencies noted in the past.

A STORY OF TWO DIMENSIONS

One is of a legal necessity, the other of a social phenomenon that left its mark. First is the saga of a 33-year-old building that had gone for too long without upkeeping. Building codes had been revised during that time, and Coolidge no longer matched them. Ray Levigne, director of Administrative Support Services, said that much of the planning and financing went toward items such as fire doors, an emergency sprinkler system, new plumbing and electrical supplies, new water services, and the installation of a monitoring system so that the dorm could be watched in case of fire. "Also," said Levigne, "it is evident that students' needs have changed since the 1940's."

Coolidge wasn't the only building to be neglected, and through the next few years, other dorms are slated for renovation. Robinson will be done this summer, reports Stephen Petersen, the shoeboxes (Chittenden, Buckham, and Wills) on the following summer, and Slade Hall the summer after that. Petersen concedes that the shoeboxes need it most, but he adds that their renovation "is going to be extremely costly, and, as a consequence, we have to collect money this year and save a little bit for next year."

All of these renovations, as well as a number of smaller maintenance projects, are being lumped together under what Petersen calls his "ten-year plan." The plan, formulated by Petersen when he took his position here in 1975, was an attempt to end the sort of mad-cap approach toward campus upkeep that had been used previously. The old system was comparable to the boy and the dyke story, where one hole plugged only led to the discovery of another one opening.

The main reason for the disorganized efforts of the past, explained Petersen, was that the skyrocketing enrollment notices in the 1960's (a by-product of the baby boom), had caused the need for more on-campus housing. "Between 1961 and 1973," said Petersen, "the university put up a residence hall or a residence hall complex on the average of every three years."

And with all of this money and time going into construction, the existing facilities were pretty much left to hang. The Living/Learning complex was the final blow in 1973, its assemblage taking almost all of the available revenue. "And the end result," continued Petersen, "was that we had to close both Converse and Redstones Halls because they weren't safe to live in."

Converse and Redstone were renovated in time to be opened for the fall of 1974. But when Petersen arrived the next year, he noticed that Simpson Dining Hall badly needed restructuring; and with the money spent on Converse and Redstone, Simpson's project once again exhausted the available revenue. What UVM had been consistently doing, explained Petersen, was spending their yearly budget on one project; and when that happens, the neglected problems become even more demanding.

"It was what I call the fireman's approach to planning," said Petersen. "You put out the biggest fire, but the little ones continue to burn, and they become bigger fires." Petersen added that it was evident to him that this kind of scheduling would force UVM to continually dig themselves out of a hole. "So we set out to develop a long-range plan that over the course of ten years would get us back on a good schedule."

The ten year plan accounts for an average of one major project per year; "major" means that the job will cost in excess of $60,000. Other projects include the renovation of Robinson, Slade, and the shoeboxes, as well as a complete revamping of the East and Redstone campuses' heating systems. Referred to as the "south campus heating project," it has been estimated as a $4.1 million job that will include every UVM structure south of Main Street. The funding for this project will, of course, be a challenge, but part of Petersen's plan also includes establishing a borrowing system to get them the money in time.

The Lattie F. Coor Short Story Contest

Once again, the Cynic leaps from the pages of immortality to wrestle with a social crisis, and when the muck settles, bring our loyal readers another short story contest. Having made a shambles of the bicentennial, and a hero out of Sun Myung Moon, we knew that we would have to search relentlessly this year to arrive at an issue that will preserve our strong tradition.

Of course, the options were many, the applications staggering.

Fidel Castro wrote to us, asking the Cynic to "...help the American people understand that Cuba does not mean to threaten your country with our involvement in Africa." "Instead," said Castro, "we are actually planning a sneak attack on the Soviet Union. But we need your help. Please, before I have to bump off another of your high-ranking officials."

Richard Nixon also wrote to us, stating that "I've been screwed. Unfairly prosecuted. Help me get my second chance."

Even Anita Bryant got into the act. "We have to preserve our children if we are going to preserve our national social fabric. Help me keep our children safe." (Since we had no idea what she was talking about, we rejected her application almost immediately.)

But we decided that this year, we should keep our efforts more local. After all, there is a crisis brewing right here in our "backwoods" town. The crisis is that our illustrious young university president has so far failed to prove to us his literary talents. We Cynics were trying recently to remember the last time President Coor had submitted a short story to us, and we came to the rather morbid conclusion that he has never come to us with a short story at all. Not one! And he calls himself a president.

And so, readers, we must shame him into it. Let guilt be the force that draws him from his mindless bureaucratic existence into the wonderful world of literary gibberish. When he sees that students are making the effort, he will just have to come across with a work of his own. Then, and only then, can he truthfully refer to himself as an all-around guy. Let your stories be the spark that ignites the administrative revolution that this university has been begging for.

RULES

1) The stories must be original ones (please don't test us folks, we're smarter than we look.)
2) There is no length requirement, but the story will have to be complete and fulfilling.
3) All entries must be typed or very neatly printed. Please refrain from sending 20 slabs of bathroom paper dotted with prose resembling more a fault zone than a work of art.
4) Please try not to involve Lattie Coor with any of your entries. After all, what else has he got to write about?
5) The stories are due on the last day of classes before Thanksgiving Vacation. There will be a $25 first prize, and a $15 second prize.

Hold On, I Think You Missed Him

–On the Josh McDowell lecture series

By Randy McMullen

The ballyhoo hit campus by surprise as the students arrived unsuspecting from summer vacation. Messages reading HOLD ON, JOSH IS COMING appeared on blackboards in most every classroom. Mummies and bears walked through campus and downtown passing out flyers promising that Josh would give the word on the ultimate in sex and the hoax of the resurrection.

And when Josh McDowell, Christian activist with Campus Crusade for Christ, International, arrived at UVM on Sunday for a three-day speaking engagement, his name had been passed around like the flu. "Who is Josh?" was the going question at Billings and FADC. The majority of the Burlington community knew that he was coming, but hardly anybody knew why.

This may have been exactly what Josh wanted. His seemed to be an advertising campaign based on ambition and ambiguity. Perhaps he was afraid of being pre-labeled as just another "Jesus freak," or he might have figured that a college student is more endowed with a curiosity than a quest for controversy.

In either case, Campus Crusade for Christ may be congratulated for their successful efforts to saturate Burlington with the name of their benefactor, who has spoken to more than 500 universities in 53 countries during the past decade, to more than 5 million students. It wasn't a terribly popular campaign, and some students referred to it as "sleazy," "sensationalistic," and plain "obnoxious."

"At first I thought the whole thing was a joke," offered someone, "but when I found out what he was all about, I was kind of turned off."

Josh commended the UVM students with Campus Crusade for Christ for a job well done, at an organizational meeting on Sunday afternoon, and offered them the following advice: "Talk it up! No one knows what to expect at a Josh McDowell lecture, and that's great! That's what gets them here!" He warned them that they would "get flak from others," but told them that if they were smiling, outgoing and warm they would do all right.

Josh called for creativity (his favorite slogan was "when Josh talks, E.F. Hutton listens") and clever persistence. "Stand up in class and ask your teacher if you can announce the Josh McDowell lecture at Patrick Gymnasium," he said, "and if he says no, say 'thank you' and sit down."

Josh's organizational meeting demonstrated that he knows what it takes to motivate young people, and more subtly it showed his understanding and love for college students in general. "I like students," he said, "and I respect them. They have the ability to analyze things and give opinions equal weight."

Josh feels, however, that a majority of students feel the pains of an identity crisis, and are always asking themselves questions like "Who Am I?" "Why am I here?" and "Where am I going?" This, he feels, underscores his goal, which is to introduce people to Christ. "Students need to feel love," he said, "and most of all, forgiveness. A one-to-one relationship with Christ can help all that come about."

What is impressive with his efforts – whether you agree with his beliefs or not – is the sincere concern he has for others. It's difficult to say if his efforts are as altruistic as his appearance suggests, but most of those who listened to him felt that his messages were offered rationally, and without force. One student put it rather ironically, "He spoke very well and I don't think that he was pushing anything on us, not like the Campus Crusade, which seems to me very forceful."

But whatever force UVM's chapter of Campus Crusade for Christ has generated in the past probably doesn't compare with their efforts the last week to introduce Josh to the people of Burlington, and vice-versa. The planning actually began last April, when it was learned that the Christian activist would be coming. Dave Aune, a student here who co-ordinated the affair, explained that the program was broken into four different areas: publicity, physical arrangements, prayer, and follow-up. The last of these entails evaluating Josh's impact through the comment cards that were handed out at each lecture, and contacting those who have indicated an interest in communicating further with Josh or the Campus Crusade. "It's incredible," said Dave of the follow-up procedures, "we got a computer to print us up a list of correspondents who will be reached individually. So, if it works, there won't be a single person showing interest in us that won't get at least a phone call."

Aune said that one of the major disappointments was the lack of UVM professors willing to let Josh speak in their class. "Some of them were really close-minded about allowing a Christian activist in their lecture," he said. Aune added that a religion class, and a human sexuality class both denied Josh a class period, which is somewhat ironic since Josh's first visit to this school seven years ago was limited to a few classroom speeches.

Now, Josh can draw 1,000 people to Patrick Gymnasium, but his popularity makes some professors reluctant to extend an invitation. Aune attributes Josh's rising fame to "a revival in people getting into the way of Christ. Josh is something for people to get excited about," he added, "he is someone who can help us find fulfillment."

But whether they came for fulfillment or entertainment, close to 3,000 UVM students and Burlington residents came to hear Josh during the course of his three talks.

The first of his lectures, entitled the "Resurrection Hoax," was the stiffest test, for it didn't receive the publicity blitz of the other talks. It was also held in Ira Allen Chapel (appropriately), whereas the other two were given in Patrick.

Still, the first talk attracted nearly 500 people who heard perhaps Josh's most controversial statements. Calling the resurrection theory either a "vicious hoax" or "the most fantastic event in history," he stated that its validity depended upon the tomb where reportedly Christ was buried, and from where the body is said to have disappeared. The circumstances, explained Josh, are puzzling: the rock covering the tomb's opening weighed around two tons, and was sealed to the tomb's outside walls with a steel chord. The tomb was also guarded by 16 Roman soldiers, making escape or theft a virtual impossibility. However Josh said that nobody should just accept his words without investigating the matter themselves.

His second lecture, "The Future Prophets," was similarly inconclusive, and probably the least enjoyed of the three. "He jumped around quite a bit, and he threw out a lot of facts that I had trouble keeping hold of," said a member of the audience afterwards. This lecture was attended by approximately 1,000 people.

Josh's third lecture was the most publicized from the start. Posters announcing it were widespread and eye-catching, showing a picture of Josh proposing to a young woman (his wife in reality) in the midst of a junk pile. This photo was coupled with a caption reading "Ultimate Sex... That's Josh."

Josh's talk on ultimate sex proved to be along the zany and uninhibited patterns as its promotional poster. He constantly brought humorous stories of his own groping, adolescent days that had the audience frequently in hysterics.

Josh seemed as intent in drawing laughter from the crowd as he did on expressing that sex, when practiced on physical impulse only, would be subject to the "law of diminishing returns" (meaning that it would gradually lose its novelty). Josh maintained that controlling one's sex life was as important as controlling any other aspect of life. "And if you let someone push you around about that," he challenged in a cracking voice that betrayed his emotional involvement in the issue, "then they're going to be pushing you around for the rest of your life."

There was, of course, a unifying theme to all of his talks, which was the establishment of a personal relationship with Jesus. "I'm not trying to sell you a church or a religion," he stated during an outdoor rally held last Tuesday, "but if you want to find out where you're going, you'll have to find yourself first. And you can do that through Christ."

Josh explained that his ultimate goal of introducing people to Jesus is based on his desire to see others as happy and satisfied as himself. "The greatest thing that ever happened to me was when someone introduced me to Jesus Christ," he said, "and I know that is the greatest thing I can do for somebody else."

Although that goal may seem idealistic, one can hardly object to its intentions. And if he can't get people to follow his lifestyle, he might take comfort in knowing that he can at least make them listen for awhile.

organized planning for UVM, it also marked the end of what Keith Miser called a "downward slide" for the residence hall. The slide had reached its peak in the late 60's and early 70's, according to Miser, and was associated with something called the Experimental Program.

Perhaps UVM's answer to the counter-culture movement, the Experiment Program was set up in the late '60s in Coolidge through the school of Arts and Sciences. It was where teacher and student met under one roof, where there were no grades and no supervision.

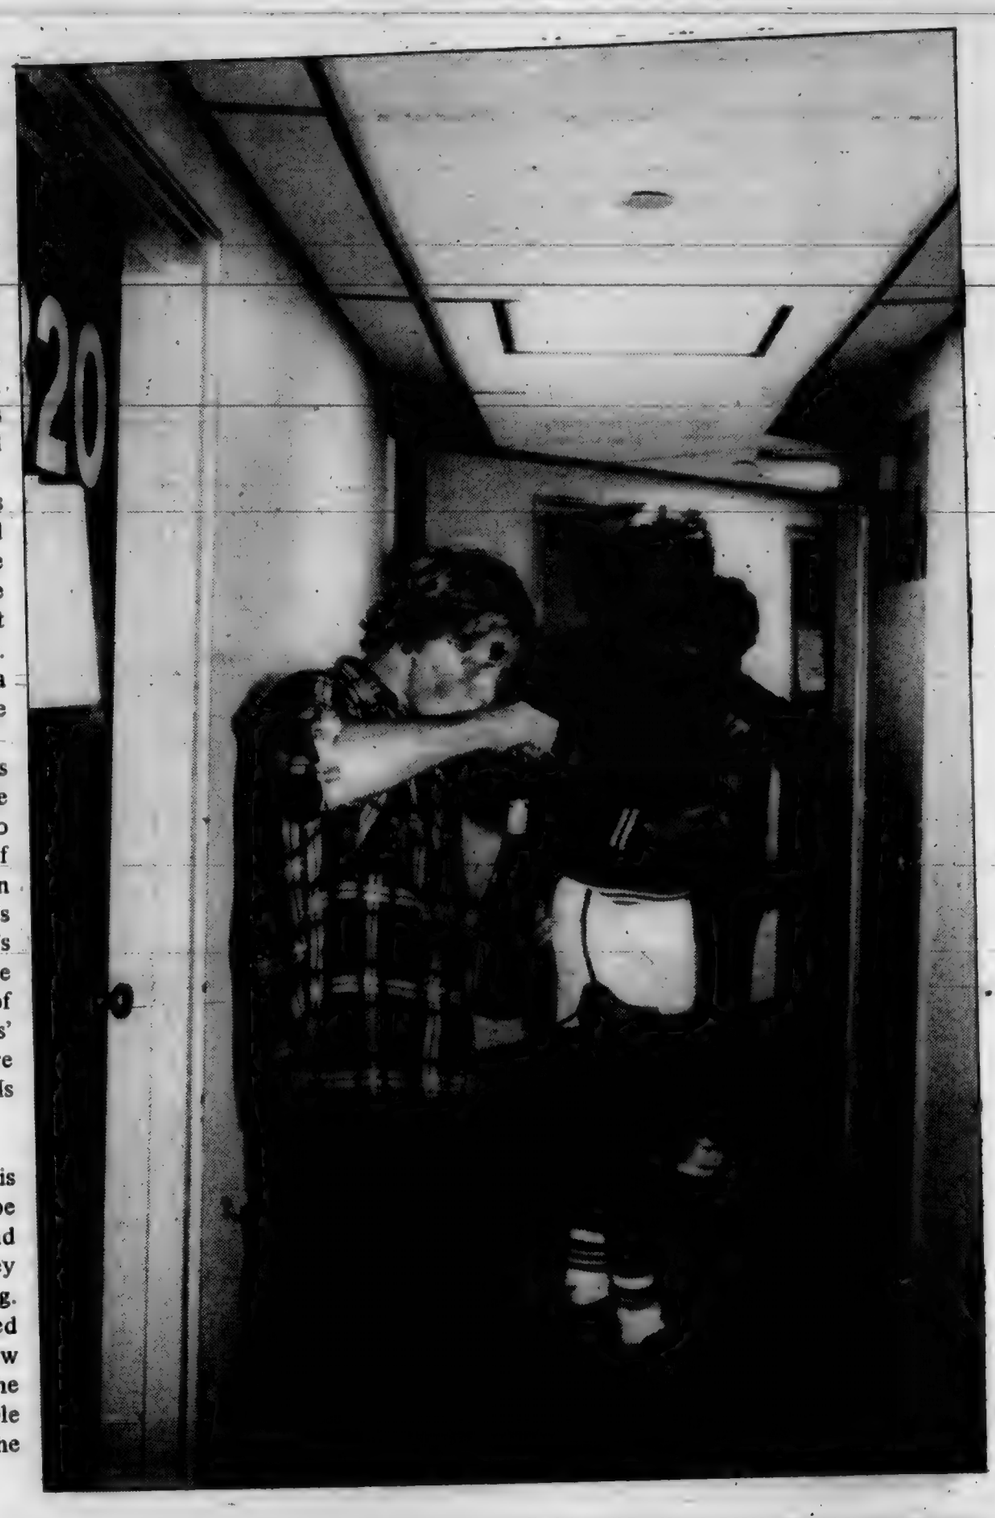
"It was really an experiment in terms of the curriculum, the classes, and the things that happened there," said Miser. "It was also experimental in terms of it being a residence hall without a residential hall staff and almost no rules." The students who went there were labeled "freaks" and Coolidge soon became the place where you could do it all.

Yet there were a number of ways in which the Experimental Program benefitted UVM. It was a testing ground for the Living/Learning concept, and it was the first hall at UVM to be co-ed and to have 24-hour visitation privileges and to allow drinking.

Although the Experimental Program began to lose interest in the 70's – because of what Miser called "a different kind of student" coming to UVM – its reputation lived on. Said Miser, "Coolidge developed the reputation as the place where, if you wanted to break something or write on the walls, you could do it because there was little supervision."

When Residential Life re-acquired Coolidge in 1974, it was, according to Stephen Petersen, "a disaster." "There were places in the basement where you could go into a room through the wall instead of the door," he said.

It cannot, however, be suggested that the Experimental Program was the entire reason for the renovation to be necessary. "The renovation was a natural consequence of time," said Peterson, "and the additional hastening of its deterioration by the Experimental Program."



But now that the renovation is completed, both Stephen Petersen and Keith Miser are hoping that the destruction stops without losing the strong spirit of the dorm. "The spirit there is a real positive thing," said Miser. "We do everything we can to develop a feeling of community in the residence halls."

Both Miser and Petersen feel that it is likely the destruction will stop, because the students there will have incentive to keep their "new home" looking new. "If you give students a building that's in decent condition," said Petersen, "it's easier to ask them to respect it; and it's also easier to deal with irresponsible behavior in that environment... instead of saying 'you shouldn't have damaged this' to someone in a place where there are rooms with holes in the walls downstairs."

WHERE'S MY WARDROBE?

But if the UVM administration is hopeful that destructive actions will be thwarted by the student's fond impressions of their renovated dorm, they may be in for a rude awakening. Although most Coolidge residents seemed genuinely pleased with the dorm's new appearance, many are annoyed at the things that are missing. The most notable of these are the desks and wardrobes, the absence of which has irritated almost everyone in Coolidge. Although the reasons for them being late have been given to the students, they are hardly adequate consolation. "I just don't think it should have happened," said one student. "I get the feeling that they (the administration) are not trying to help." "We're getting the run-around," said another student.

Other complaints from Coolidge residents include the absence of shower curtains, the absence of mirrors ("and the ones they do have are for midgets," said one girl), the absence of sinks in the bathrooms, the washing machines, and the fact that the bathrooms are always flooding because the shower drains are too small to catch the water fast enough. There's also the noise in the basement from the continued construction there, to which one student says, "They start drilling at seven in the morning, and by two in the afternoon it's quiet. What the hell kind of schedule is that?" What is encouraging about all this, however, is that the points of difference should be resolved within the end of this month.

Many Coolidge students feel that the UVM administration – besides physically improving their dorm – are trying to prevent destruction with increased discipline. Some have speculated that the freshmen were hand-picked to provide a more mellow atmosphere, that the residence advisors were sought out to maintain control. These may or may not be viable claims, but there has been so far one disciplinary action noted that seems quite new to Coolidge. A congregation of marijuana-bonging students were recently told to leave the hall and smoke in their rooms. When the students at first refused to leave, the hall advisor called a security officer who broke up the party.

During a recent interview with former Coolidge Hall residents, I mentioned the bonging incident to them, and they reacted with surprise and disbelief. "It never would have happened two or three years ago," said one alumni. Another added, "I can remember having 60 or so people on the second-floor ledge. We were bonging and drinking and handing bongs down to people below us... it was crazy. And no one even dreamed of stopping us."

It was at that moment in the interview that an ironic thing happened. One of the former residents tossed a football lightly across the room, and it bounded oddly off a chiar, flew into the kitchen and smashed a window. The sound of the breaking glass somewhat jolted our minds back to some of our wildest moments at Coolidge, and everyone laughed because the sound of shattering glass was quite common there.

But it's doubtful that it ever will be again. Although Stephen Petersen maintains that the Coolidge dorm is under the same rules as everybody else, it is these rules themselves that are new to the hall. This must have been considered by the UVM administration, for there was a time last year when it was suggested that Coolidge become an all-freshman dorm. When its residents caught wind of the idea, however, they organized a small committee that met with an Inter-Residential Administration (IRA) committee and Stephen Petersen to plead their case. It was decided finally that Coolidge residents could return, but there was a catch in the form of an addendum to the housing contract that everyone in Coolidge had to sign, stating basically that students there were responsible for any damage or theft.

But despite a $600,000 check hanging over their heads, and despite the inconvenience of a building not fully renovated, and despite the new and swkward social responsibility of remaining spirited yet acting responsible, it seems pretty certain that Coolidge Hall will still be a happy place to live. A smiling face there is still very much in the majority.

Carter's summit talks gained important ground to the surprise of many

By Henry Chamberlain

Despite the apathy with which U.S. citizens have reacted to the conclusion of the Summit talks, they are a monumental development. As President Carter most aptly put it Monday night before the joint session of the Congress, "there hasn't been peace in the Middle East for two thousand years. More recently, since for formation of the State of Israel in 1948, there have been four major wars, numerous terrorist and reprisal actions, with more than forty thousand deaths. If peace is indeed in sight, this will be one of the bright spots in human ethnic cooperation of all time."

With a sagging popularity rating, economic instability, and political uncertainty, the Summit talks were taken with some surprise. How could an ineffective President Carter bring two opposing ideologies in the forms of Menachem Begin and Anwar L. Sadat together to create peace? Apparently, the combination of the President's personality and the relaxed elegance of Camp David combined to lay the foundation for future peaceful co-existence in the Middle East.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

It was only in 1948 after a bitter war with their Arab neighbors that the state of Israel became a reality. Thousands of Palestinian refugees fled Israel for fear of danger in the war zone. At the war's conclusion the Palestinians were not allowed to return to their homeland. Thus, the beginning of the Palestinian refugee problem.

In 1956, war again broke out as Israel, England, and France fought with Egypt. Under pressure from the rest of the world, especially under the direction of the U.N., the war was soon terminated. But political instability still reigned between the Israelis and their neighboring Arab countries who refused to recognize the existence of Israel.

1967 brought the six day war. This engagement clearly pointed out the vast military superiority which Israel enjoyed over the combined strengths of Syria, Jordan, and Egypt. From Syria, Israel took the Golan Heights, from Jordan the West Bank, and from Egypt the Sinai Peninsula. More refugees fled the area to be concentrated in deplorable refugee camps. Neither Israel nor the Arabs would take responsibility for the camps.

World sentiment at that time was notably anti-Israeli and showed itself in United Nations' resolution 242, voted on November 22, 1967. The resolution called for the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict," and "for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem." The Israelis ignored the resolution, and confidently so, as the United States guaranteed their right to exist.

The Palestinians were frustrated and angry. They began retaliating on Israel through terrorist activity. The Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) under the leadership of Yasir Arafat conducted repeated raids on Israeli border settlements, jet liners, buses, and airline terminals. These attacks prompted immediate and forceful response from Israel, further incensing an already desperate situation.

1973 brought a surprise attack by Syria and Egypt during the observance of the Jewish holiday of Yom Kippur. While the two made initial gains, Israel quickly turned the tide and drove the invaders back. Things were getting worse, not better, in Middle Eastern relations. The "shuttle diplomacy" of Henry Kissinger and Richard Nixon, while well intentioned, failed to make a lasting peace.

From an Egyptian point of view, Israel held all the cards. The Israelis held military superiority, had the backing of a strong Jewish lobby in the U.S., and were expanding with new settlements in occupied

A Madcap Recap

This year's Vermont primaries yielded something old, something new, a big surprise, and the same rhetoric

By Chris Mercer

"All is vanity and a striving after wind."

Ecclesiastes

As the political hot air of the summer gives way to refreshing autumn breezes, candidates and losers can take a short breather before the October homestretch to November 7. Voters too can relax from ads touting smiling faces and stock phrases "he'll do a better job," "a woman you can trust," or "experience counts." Not as many people sport gaudy buttons like bumper stickers; and campaign leaflets are swept into the fires of literary Hell. The words of struggle, race, attack, fight, charge, etc. are momentarily set aside so that the winners can breathe deep and resume the quest for glory next week.

Winning a primary is like being promoted on a job with the possibility of further advancement or firing in two months. The nerves become tighter, each day takes on inflated importance, but the emphasis remains: sell, convince, and keep moving.

T e candidate best typifying primary success is 32 year old Republican newcomer Peter Smith who upset incumbent Lieutenant Governor T. Garry Buckley by 5,000 votes. Smith, the former president of the Community College of Vermont, had been given only a slight chance of beating Buckley, a veteran of 25 years in politics. Smith ran a high-energy, quick-jabbing campaign which centered on Buckley's unpredictable, maverick style and Buckley's numerous differences with Governor Richard Snelling. Since June, Smith worked at a feverish pace – as much as 12 hours a day – and logged 18,000 miles criss-crossing the state. Smith will greatly benefit from running alongside a popular incumbent Governor, and unless voters split the ticket, Smith could be swept into the state's number two spot.

Newcomer Peter Smith may be swept into the number two spot in Vermont

THE BUCKLEY STOPS HERE

Buckley didn't take Smith seriously and broke the cardinal rule of politics: "Never Take an Election for Granted." Buckley didn't campaign much and his political epitaph bears his own words: "We Blew It." Buckley's flamboyance and off the cuff remarks created a large following. But the generation gap caught up with his old fashioned back-room political dealing: Smith's youth and outspokenness captured the voter's imagination in spite of his gaffe of referring to women as "broads." However, the contest noticeably lacked distinct issues; it was a personality contest all the way. And voter turnout was light.

Ironically, Madeleine Kunin, the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor, is so far a stronger candidate than Democratic Gubernatorial hopeful Edwin Granai. Mrs. Kunin, a Burlington writer and mother of four, has spent three terms in the Legislature and for two years served impressively as the chairman of the powerful House Appropriations Committee. Unopposed in the primary, Mrs. Kunin will emphasize her experience and proven competence in government. The Smith-Kunin match-up will be the most exciting race this fall. Both are hard workers, have od voter appeal, and ve their secret hopes set on higher offices.

GRANAI, SH. IN DUBIOUS BATTLE

Remember those two gentlemen who graced the cover of the Back-to-School Cynic? The one of the left, Ed Granai, won the dubious honor of facing Governor Snelling in November and is hoping for a David vs. Goliath victory. Granai easily defeated fellow Democrat Bernard "Bun" O'Shea in perhaps the most lackluster primary contest.

A campaign is made up of three elements: 1) name recognition; 2) personality; and 3) stands on the issues. O'Shea, a thrice unsuccessful Congressional hopeful, had a name recognition advantage, but his personality and loser image were well-known too. O'Shea kept the race respectable by offering numerous programs, especially for Vermont's beleaguered farm sector. But he sealed his fate with a last minute anti-abortion stand. Granai, a Burlington business consultant, is running on the theme "Keep Vermont From Becoming Just Anywhere, USA." Granai's low-key personable style and environmental concern are in sharp contrast to Snelling's heavy-handed, pro-business character. Snelling is rated an overwhelming favorite, but Granai could put Snelling on the spot and gain enough support to help Madeleine Kunin.

Ever popular Congressman James Jeffords had no primary contest and doesn't need to worry about the general election either. The Democrats failed to field a prominent sacrificial lamb and instead a Woodstock housewife, Marie Dietz won on one issue: Right to life. Dietz's opponent, St. Michael's ofessor Elwynn Kernstock, was bitter in defeat and called on Vermont Democrats to boycott the Dietz effort. Vermont's third party, Liberty Union, re-surfaced in perennial candidate Peter Diamondstone who likened a fetus to a tapeworm. Later, Diamondstone apologized for his statement saying that at the time he was "tired and...uh...stoned."

Other races, statewide and local, produced few surprises or headlines. Rising Democratic star, Attorney General Jerome Diamond, appears headed for re-election and a base for a try at a higher office in 1980. Locally, UVM professor Robert V. Daniels won nomination for his fourth term in the state Senate. Rep. J. Daniel Mahoney won re-election to represent part of UVM. The other two seats representing UVM, are being sought by Thomas Daniels and David Mitiguy, Democrats, and Torrey Carpenter and Theodore Riehle III, Republicans.

territory. Egyptian and Palestinian hopes lay in the oil cartel of the Middle Eastern countries with the strong Third World lobby.

Pressure from the oil cartel began to tell on the United States' position. In exchange for Saudi effort to keep the price of oil down, the United States agreed to work on a settlement. Thus, we arrive at the Summit Conference at Camp David.

The two leaders, Menachem Begin of Israel and Anwar L. Sadat of Egypt, have some differences. Prime Minister Begin was involved in anti-Palestinian operations before the establishment of Israel. He led a group which was responsible for the Deir Yasir Massacre on April 9, 1948. This event brought cries of brutality against the Jewish people in Palestine. Once prime minister, Mr. Begin began talking of the rights of Israel to their homeland through their connections to biblical Samaria, Judea, and Gaza. Mr. Begin appeared to be an inflexible expansionist leader of the Jewish state.

New settlements were built as the Israelis spread out into the occupied territories of the West Bank, Gaza, and the Sinai Peninsula. Following President Sadat's sacred mission to Jerusalem, when no agreement could be reached, Mr. Sadat sniped at Begin for his inflexibility. Mr. Begin responded by stating, "We have existed, my dear Egyptian friends, without your recognition for 3,700 years. We never asked your President or government to recognize our right to exist." The two leaders were not fast friends.

President Sadat has been termed a man of great vision. He sees Egypt taking its place among the great nations of the world. But his obstinance can also make negotiations difficult. Neither leader is adept at give and take diplomacy.

With that background, we find that after thirteen days of negotiations at Camp David, between the Israelis, the Egyptians, and President Carter, that two frameworks for peace have been created. The first, called the "Framework for Peace in the Middle East," deals with the West Bank of the Jordan and the Gaza Strip. The article calls for a five year transitional period in the West Bank to be replaced by a self-governing group to be created by the Palestinians. Further, Israel and Jordan are to negotiate a peace treaty. Secretary of State Vance has been meeting with King Hussein to help lay the foundation for such a treaty this week.

The Israeli acceptance to give up the West Bank is very significant. A major reason for Israeli refusal in the past to allow Palestinian control of the West Bank was fear of control of the area by the PLO. That group has repeatedly vowed to continue fighting Israel for their land. Why Prime Minister Begin changed his mind is as yet unclear.

To compliment the first document is a second entitled a "Framework for the Conclusion of a Peace Treaty." This effort deals with Egypt regaining sovereignty over the Sinai Peninsula. It also calls for the establishment of formal diplomatic relations, something which has never before existed.

Several areas have not been touched at all by the "frameworks" which were created at Camp David. The Holy City, Jerusalem, was not dealt with at all. President Sadat wanted the Israelis to withdraw from East Jerusalem, Prime Minister Begin wouldn't consider it. He felt that the city should remain in Israeli hands and open to all faiths.

President Sadat has been termed a man of great visions. He sees Egypt taking its place among the great nations of the world.

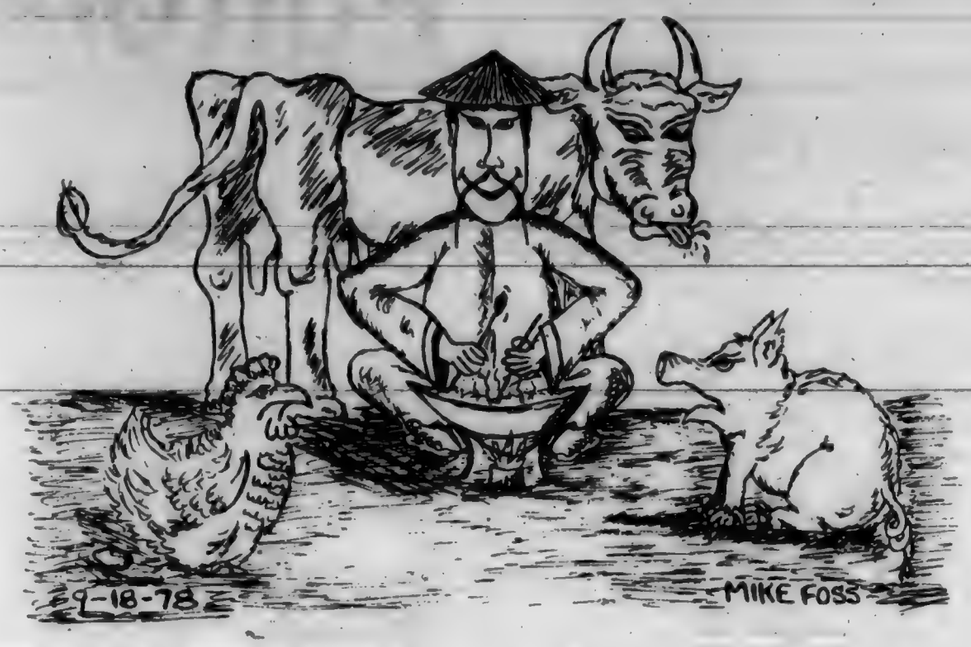
The Golan Heights were also not mentioned at all. That area was left to be negotiated separately by Syria and Israel. This is easier said than done as the two nations are at odds over the situation in neighboring Lebanon.

Whatever else can be said, President Carter has proved to be an astute diplomat. He took two rigid, opposing positions on a situation and began the process of bringing them together. Prime Minister Begin has pledged to give up land he said he never would. Diplomats around the world were predicting failure because of the obstinance of Begin.

Added to that, Mr. Begin and Mr. Sadat had been exchanging barbs openly to the press. The two men are too different to be great friends, a normal cornerstone to successful diplomacy. President Carter has done something no one has been able to do, he has broken the ice in the quest for eventual Arab and Israeli co-existence. For that the world owes him a debt of gratitude.



What remains now is to consummate a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. Probably a U.N. peace-keeping force will be placed in the area in the future to insure stability.

The only obstacle which might exist is if President Carter contemplated using American troops, a thought which has been tossed out. This country would not allow us to get militarily involved. But that is only a possibility, not a reality.

To Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat, good luck with the rest of the negotiations. To President Carter, welcome back to the respect of the American people.

What Is This Stuff Called 'Tofu?'

By Barry Gustin

Although it sounds like something John Belushi would yell in Animal House, or something that would be belched out by an oriental Kung-fu specialist, "tofu" is nothing but a simple food substance, neither exotic nor expensive.

For over 2,000 years, the people indigenous to East Asia have consumed soybeans and their derivatives. Tofu is one of the derivatives. It is made from soybean curds just as cheese is made from milk curds. It is typically shaped into eight-ounce blocks and sold at Chinese and Natural food stores and some super markets.

The outstanding features of tofu is its taste and consistency. Its flavor is uniquely delicate, and tofu can be eaten alone, as a side dish, or as a creative topping for a luscious salad. Furthermore, its characteristic taste disappears in combination with other food substances, and so it can be used to create any number of dishes. It can easily replace eggs, cheese, and meat: imagine waking up to a breakfast of scrambled tofu and orange juice, or finishing off dinner with a tofu cheesecake – minus the cheese.

Tofu's versatility and low cost (an eight-ounce block costs between 25 and 35 cents) are not as remarkable as its nutritional composition. When looking for alternative sources of protein (and when considering that the benefits of a meatless diet are many), people ask: "What will we use to replace the meat?" Some people experiment with eggs and dairy products, or with beans and grains, but few ever discover tofu.

The value of any food as a protein source depends on two factors: the quantity of protein in the food, and the quality of that protein. Quantity is expressed either in grams or as a percentage of the total weight.

Contrary to popular conceptions, the highest percentages of protein are found in plant rather than animal foods. For example, soybeans and their products have a range of 35% to 53% protein by weight. Eggs are 13% protein by weight, beef – 20%, fish – 22%, and cheese – 30%.

Protein quality refers to the percentage of useable protein in a food. It is most often expressed in terms of net protein utilization (NPU), which depends largely on the foods' digestibility, and on the degree to which the configuration of the eight essential amino acids (protein building blocks) matches the pattern required by the body. This determines how much protein is absorbed into the body. A higher NPU for any food indicates a greater amount of useable protein.

Another common misconception about animal proteins is that they are intrinsically different from vegetable proteins. This is not the case. From the body's point of view, the protein in a plant is identical to the protein in an animal. Although animal proteins have the highest NPU ratings, a number of plant foods – including tofu – rank quite high. Eggs are the accepted standard with an NPU of 94%, cheese has an NPU of 70%, and beef is rated 67%. On the other hand, brown rice is 70%, wheat germ 67%, and tofu 65%.

"From the body's point of view, the protein in a plant is identical to the protein in an animal."

To calculate the amount of useable protein in an eight-ounce block of tofu, one must combine both the quantity and quality data. A block of tofu will contain 11.5 grams of usable protein, which is the same amount supplied by six ounces of hamburger and more than the useable protein contained in a glass of milk. In combination with nuts or grains, the amount is considerably higher.

And tofu is not fattening. Whole animal foods, by nature, derive a large percentage of their calories from fat – in some cases up to 50% – but tofu is only four percent fat and delivers only 147 calories per eight-ounce block. To get the same amount of useable protein from hamburger, you would be ingesting more than three times the calories. In light of the fact that approximately 40% of America is clinically obese, it would be advisable to derive more of our protein from non-animal sources such as tofu.

Tofu is a food high in vitamins and essential minerals. The most outstanding among these is calcium, which is needed for strong bones and teeth, and for proper functioning of the central nervous system and blood clotting apparatus. Tofu contains 23% more calcium by weight than dairy products. It is also an excellent source of iron, essential fatty acids, lecithin, potassium, chlorine, some B-vitamins, and vitamin E.

Last but not least is the fact that – unlike other high-protein, high-calcium foods – tofu is relatively free of chemical toxins. It is well-established that heavy metals, herbicides, and pesticides tend to concentrate in the fatty tissues of animals at the apex of food chains. Meat contains about 20 times more pesticide residue (per gram) than soybeans. Dairy foods contain between four and five times more. For many of these toxins, which are newly created chemicals, there is no naturally inherited degradation or metabolic pathway by which they may be neutralized or de-toxified. Thus, they tend to build up in our own bodies. The long-term consequences of this build-up are unknown, but cellular damage with the induction of cancer becomes a logical possibility.

If you want to try tofu, it can be bought at the Organum Natural Foods store or at the Onion River Co-op. And to get a real taste of tofu's versatility, try this for your first recipe:

Tofu Manicotti

–4 cakes tofu pressed between paper towels and crumbled
–2 tbsp. vegetable oil
–2 cloves garlic minced
–1 medium onion, minced
–2 tsp. parsley
–1½ qts. tomato sauce
–14 large whole wheat pasta shells
–2 qts. boiling water

1) Preheat oven to 350 degrees.
2) Saute garlic and onion in oil.
3) Combine garlic and onion with parsley and tofu.
4) Cook shells in water for five minutes Don't overcook.)
5) Drain shell and stuff with tofu filling.
6) Pour 3 cups tomato sauce into a 9-by-13 inch baking dish, layer with stuffed shells and pour remaining sauce over top.
7) Bake for 40 minutes.

Yields six servings.

Coolidge Reclaimed

During the past summer the university spent $600,000 renovating the Coolidge residence hall, turning a dirty, dilapidated, nearly uninhabitable dorm, into once again a clean and respectable place to live. Veterans of Coolidge can hardly recognize their old quarters that once reeked with the stench of garbage but now smell of fresh paint and new furniture.

What caused Coolidge to get into such deplorable condition? Studies show that the building, constructed in 1945, has been desperately in need of modernization for several years back but was neglected due to lack of funds. However, this was only part of the problem. Another was student vandalism which exacerbated the already bad situation.

It used to be that upon entering Coolidge one was shocked with the garbage piled in the halls, the number of broken windows and light fixtures, and even more distressingly, how its inhabitants showed a sense of bizarre pride at living in such filth. Coolidge had the reputation of being the foremost party dorm on campus where almost no kind of behavior was deemed unacceptable.

A student's personal lifestyle is a matter open to the individual, and if one desires to live in filth and squalor, the choice is his. But when these habits result in property deterioration and vandalism which cost the university thousands of dollars per annum, it is no longer a private matter. In Coolidge the situation clearly got out of hand.

Students "having a good time" often forget that damage they inflict must eventually be repaired with money out of their own pockets. We hope now that Coolidge is once again a nice place to live, students will show it the same respect that they would their own home.

Maximum Sex

No thanks, we've tried it already, and it only gave us gas.

But if it's gas you're after, there's been plenty of it around UVM lately, exemplified in the hot air balloon promotion of evangelist John McDowell.

Now that the waters have parted and he has left us, can we now expect to see announcements of "Josh is Leaving" replacing the "Josh is Coming" slogans scribbled across countless UVM blackboards? Hopefully the obscene flourescent tape sidewalk messages and posters promising erotica plethora and other divine gifts will soon disappear as well.

As many students learned during last year's S.A. presidential elections, one of the intrinsic beauties of posters and blackboard messages is that they can be ripped down, erased or otherwise discarded with relative ease. It is unfortunate that the cerebral fungus of evangelism cannot be disposed of as readily.

Pass the word — Josh is leaving — and good riddance!

Remembering Chile:

Bitter Lessons, Tough Questions

By Eric Kilburn

Five years ago last week, a freely-elected government was ousted in a bloody coup partly engineered and outrightly assisted by the government and industry of the United States. Two years ago today, the former Chilean Ambassador to the United States and a co-worker were killed when a bomb devastated their car. The two events mark a singularly sordid chapter in American foreign policy. Yet, far from merely evoking anger at the past, the story of Chile raises important questions on U.S. policies and priorities in the future.

Salvador Allende was elected president of Chile in September, 1970 in history's first example of a socialist government being brought into power by peaceful means. As head of a coalition of left-of-center political parties, Allende symbolized the hopes and frustrations of Chile's millions of poor industrial workers and landless peasants. For centuries Chile had been a model servant of foreign domination. First at the hands of Spanish colonial rulers, and later with the fountain pens of multinational corporations, Chile's large mineral reserves were mined with cheap labor and exported, along with most of the profits. Between 1965 and 1969, the profits remitted abroad (money leaving the country) from the copper mining operations of transnational corporations totalled over $600 million. It is no surprise that the fruits of Chile's industrial development bypassed most of the country's people, just as the election of Allende signified the desire for change.

The new government gradually began to institute long-awaited reforms aimed at ultimately achieving economic sovereignty. Large mines, banks, and estates were nationalized peacefully and under the guidelines of already-existing laws. Previously weak labor unions, in part because of government encouragement, were more successful in securing equitable contracts. During the first year of the new government, real wages rose twenty percent, indicating a significant gain in a country where the per capita income was $520 in 1969

The euphoria, however, was short-lived. The election of a socialist candidate sent ripples of paranoia through the Chilean upper class as well as the American government and business community. Within eighteen months of Allende's inauguration, it had become apparent that everything internally — and externally possible, short of immediate military intervention, was being done to undermine the new government. Factory owners closed their shops, slowing productivity. The wealthy hoarded commodities and sent millions of dollars out of the country, a move that helped to stagnate the economy. Large agricultural producers refused to plant and slaughtered animals prematurely, reducing output. Doctors and dentists refused to staff public clinics (although private clinics for the wealthy remained open) and transportation strikes paralyzed the country. High inflation, shortages of goods, and a

Letters to the Editor

Are You Apathetic?

To the Editor:

When looking at college age individuals growing up in this decade in comparison with our outspoken and rebellious counterparts of the 60's, society is quick to define and label today's young adults as "disinterested" and "apathetic."

Knowing that one is already type-cast as uncaring and indifferent, it is quite easy to settle into this undemanding role. How easy it is not to form one's own opinions and, even worse, to speak out for what one feels. When an individual decides to visibly support his ideals and beliefs, he risks public attention, criticism, and possibly ridicule. I think it is this fear of being labelled as different that forces many people to appear apathetic.

Most people prefer to blend into the mainstream of society and be accepted as "normal," rather than accentuate their differences and exhibit themselves as something unique. It is true that once one's values and differing positions are expressed, there is a chance that a barrier may be created, blocking a unification that might otherwise have developed, if the two parties had remained ignorant of their opposition.

How long will we continue to hide our feelings and pretend to be like everyone else? Will it take another war for everyone to finally express their discontent and stand up for what they believe in? It took years for gay people to be able to openly admit their differences and it is so much better that they can now express their uniqueness, no longer compelled to hide it within themselves. In a society, like ours, where there is a strong emphasis placed on self-expression and an understanding of the need for personal growth, it is time that we stop compromising our own values and support what we truly believe in. If everyone is willing to take the chance of becoming an individual, different, but unique, the curtain of apathy which we hide behind would be lifted and no longer would someone stand out from everyone else for simply voicing an opinion in what he believes.

Figi Was Fun

To the Editor:

I'd like to make a few comments about the Fiji All Campus Party last Saturday night. The fraternity was right when it advertised that it was going to be 'something different.' I think that the colored spotlights, hut bar, and decorations were a pretty impressive set-up. Everyone in the crowd seemed to have a good time as the beer lines moved fast. I never had to wait long at all for a drink. Despite the annoying 'Animal House' antics of one of its neighbors, and various comments about the larger cups at another fraternity the Fiji brothers showed a good time. I'm looking forward to their next one.

Thanks,
Robin Perker

Riding High Once Again

By David C. Greeff

Jimmy Carter may well be staging one of the greatest political comebacks in history. In June, with an approval rating of only 38% of the American people, the lowest of any recent president, Carter was a dejected and unrespected leader. And now, just three months later, his rating is back up to 51% and rising daily. Why? The answer lies in the positive reaction to his efforts in leading the highly successful Arab-Israel summit conference, held over the last two weeks at Camp David.

Amidst fears that if the summit failed, war would ensue, all three leaders took monumental risks in convening such a conference. Indeed, it was a gamble that paid well, but deservedly so considering the astronomical odds against victory.

For Carter it turned out to be the blessing that saved his presidency. Before the conference most Americans viewed Carter as idealistic, inept, incompetent, unpresidential. As one observer put it, "The ex-governor of Georgia is just a little fish in a big pond." He campaigned on an anti-Washington campaign, and Congress lashed back by either rejecting or stripping down his major legislative proposals — most notably his energy bill which he claimed was national priority number one. He was being judged an ineffective leader and many thought that he might not even be able to win the Democratic Party nomination in 1980.

But now the President is once again riding high on a new wave of triumph and glory. At the summit's conclusion Monday night, Carter, flanked by Israeli Prime Minister Begin on his left and Egyptian President Sadat on his right, announced proudly that a "framework for peace" had been agreed on, and that an actual peace settlement might actually be signed within the next three months. He was a man enveloped by lassitude, exhausted but smiling, like a victorious warrior just returning from battle. He received momentous applause after announcing that one of the longest and most complex conflicts in world history may be approaching resolution.

The impression here is that even if Arab reaction is unsupportive, great progress has been made and Carter deserves much of the credit. Surely, only cautious optimism is appropriate now, for as all three summit leaders made painfully clear, there are still several disagreements — the most notable being Israeli settlements in the Sinai. But the ball has started rolling and if they can keep the momentum going, current optimism will hopefully be justified.

"Amidst fears that if the summit failed, war would ensue, all three leaders took monumental risks in convening such a conference."

A c[illegible] either the appro[illegible] by the Knesset, or Israel, next two weeks will be approval is expected on the gen[illegible]mmit proposals harder to call is Sadat's condition that the [illegible]pt settlements in the Sinai be evacuated before [illegible] negotiations begin. Camp David agreements return the Sinai, captured in the 1967 war, to Egyptian sovereignty. They leave however, the status of settlements on the West Bank and the Jordan river open to future negotiation.

Ultimately however, true peace can only be achieved with a broad consensus among the neighboring Arab states of Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. Here is where the greatest problem lies. So far reaction has been mixed. Jordan immediately responded to Camp David by saying that we "are not obligated morally or materially by the agreement at Camp David.", Jordan did, however, agree to receive Secretary of State Vance, who left Tuesday on a trip trying to promote the agreements. Saudi-Arabia, whose stance is highly influential due to their oil dominance, has not either outrightly criticized or supported the summit's proposals. The Palestinians have denounced the agreements as traitorous, denegrated Sadat for "giving up sacred territories," and pledged continued war against Israel.

Clearly, continued disagreement on the issue of a Palestinian homeland and the placement of refugees currently residing in the West Bank of Jordan and Lebanon will be an obstacle to peace. But it seems that if Egypt and Israel can offer concessions, the Palestinians might also offer some compromises in order to get to the negotiating table. The continuation of blind and merciless terrorism will only lead to more bloodshed and continued instability.

In the broad view, even if an actual settlement is still not here, the situation is indeed better than it [illegible]et has been. After all, who would have thought a show that not only would an Arab and Israeli be be mediated if [illegible] face negotiations, but would Jimmy Carter obviously [illegible] peace." It goes to time. In 13 days of secluded priv[illegible] conference accomplished more in real terms [illegible] can of Kissinger's flaming rhetoric and shuttle diplomacy.

Even if the final result is failure, Carter's summit at Camp David will go down in history as one of the great diplomatic efforts of our time. While not forgetting his past failures, let us praise a man who has contributed significantly to world peace.

Chile

flourishing black market were further symptoms of a country in the midst of economic chaos.

Despite outward appearances, the collapse of the Chilean economy was in no way a spontaneous reaction to the policies of a new government, but rather a planned and carefully executed sabotage. Former CIA and state department employees working for International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT) compiled an eighteen point program designed to produce a coup d'etat. Although initially rejected by the American government and corporate community (it was believed the plan would not work), all steps were eventually carried out. Millions of dollars worth of Export Import Bank credits were cut off, and multilateral aid institutions such as the World Bank and Inter-American Development Bank were pressured into disapproving further loans to Chile. Private banks were also encouraged to suspend or reduce credit, and short term loans dropped from $220 million to $35 million in the first year of the Allende government. Multinational corporations organized boycots of Chilean copper and refused to sell spare parts. Not coincidentally, the only assistance that increased during the Allende years was military aid, which rose from $800,000 in 1970 to $12 million by 1972 (it was the military that overthrew the government).

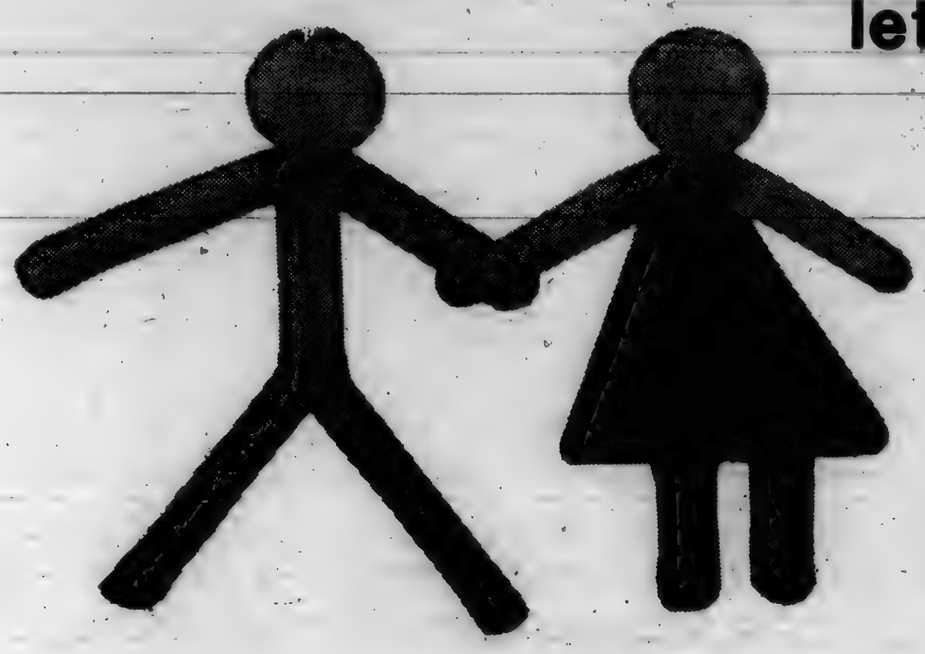
The CIA, which had previously spent $20 million to prevent Allende's election in 1964 (according to the former U.S. Ambassador to Chile), intensified its operations as well. The American embassy in Santiago began to resemble the roster of a CIA all-star subversion team, with players left over from the Guatemala, Dominican Republic, Columbia, Brazil and Bay of Pigs insurrections. Instances of unexplained violence, factory sabotage, and the assassination of pro-Allende government officials between 1971 and 1973 provided ample and indisputable testimony of the CIA's effectiveness in planning and sometimes participating in anti-government violence.

The CIA's actions were not the blind labors of a zealous group of anti-communists, a misconception that often characterizes the Bay of Pigs affair. Rather, high officials in business and government, including CIA director William Colby and Secretary of State Kissinger, knew and evidently approved of what was going on. The American self-image as a benevolent bestower of tranquility takes a sharp beating here, and it is perhaps history's most malevolent irony that Henry Kissinger endorsed policies which helped overthrow an elected government, and oppress a free people in the same year as he received the Nobel Prize for peace.

In Chile, the end came quickly. A military junta headed by General Pinochet took over the government on September 11, 1973, and Allende died fighting in the Presidential palace. Any semblance of democracy soon disappeared as martial law was declared and strict press censorship imposed. The Congress was dissolved, unions became illegal, and most of the expropriated mines, banks and estates were returned to their pre-Allende owners. Hunger and malnutrition, virtually wiped out during the Allende years, also returned to the rural areas.

The Pinochet government, perhaps adhering to the belief that one way to end an idea is to dispose of all who have it, imprisoned, exiled, tortured or killed thousands of Chileans. Despite an occasional light-fisted condemnation or two, foreign governments and industries didn't seem to mind much, as all forms of direct aid and loans (except military) returned to or exceeded pre-1970 levels.

One of those exiled from Chile was Orlando Letelier, the former Chilean Ambassador to the U.S. under Allende. In the months and years following the coup, Letelier became an outspoken critic of the junta, exposing atrocities and generally awakening the American public to what had happened. Letelier's efforts were largely responsible for the cut-off in military appropriations to Chile by Congress in 1974, and the junta must have had some regrets about ever letting him leave the country.



In Washington, D.C. on September 21, 1976, Letelier and his co-workers Ronee and Michael Moffit heard a strange buzzing sound in their car as it passed the Chilean embassy. Moments later, an explosion ripped through the vehicle, and Letelier and Ronee Moffit were killed. After nearly two years of investigation, the FBI has implicated the Chilean secret police and close associates of General Pinochet in the murder. The investigation is still incomplete, and it would come as no surprise to many if further scrutiny reveals a covert U.S. intelligence role in the assassinations.

For the sake of brevity, some degree of simplification has been necessary in the preceding accounts. The essential themes remain correct however, and raise crucial issues and questions concerning future U.S. policies. What role will the United States play in the development of poorer nations? Historically, development has meant the economic rise of a small core of people within a society, while the majority remain poor or worse off than before "development." How then, does one define "development?" In what ways does the American way of life, for all its material excesses and advantages, necessitate the continuation of policies like those brought against Chile?

Since the U.S. is dependent on the less-developed countries for a significant portion of the resources consumed by Americans (Chilean copper, Brazilian coffee and South African gold are just a few examples) what compromises are we willing to accept to insure a stable supply of these raw materials? The fact that the U.S. is currently the world's largest arms merchant (selling more weapons abroad than all other countries combined) and bankrolls more dictatorships than any other country suggests that we are willing to forego our Jeffersonian ideals quite readily. No one doubts that dictatorships are much easier to deal with politically and economically than democracies, since there are no congresses or other representative bodies to complicate matters. The problem is, how far are we willing to go?

For example, it might be argued that the U.S. government-business response to Chile under Allende was a rational defense against the expropriation of property. In other words, when someone attacks, you fight back. Similarly, it might be debated — albeit less convincingly — that Letelier's assassination was one government's way of shielding itself against further criticism. However, in the case of Chile, as in many Third World countries, when the economic interests of corporations and governments (if they are still distinguishable) serve as grounds for the continued sublimation of the needs of a country's people, it would seem that a serious re-examination of human morals versus profit motives is in order.

In many ways, the Chilean struggle for self-determination between 1970 and 1973 exemplifies the hopes of the rising Third World, just as the now five-year old coup illustrates how easily these hopes can be snuffed out. In the United States, where five percent of the global population gluttonizes one-third of the resources, the Chilean saga remains largely shrouded in media whitewash and corporate drivel; a kind of convenient amnesia. But for the Third World's two billion illiterate and oppressed souls who go to bed hungry every night, the bitter lessons of Chile have not been forgotten.

Tunbridge: World's Foremost Fair

By Tom Daniels

Vermont isn't often listed in the Guiness Book of World Records, but every September, the Green Mountain State plays host to the world's oldest and some say most colorful world's fair – the Tunbridge World's Fair. Since 1861, the Tunbridge Fair has celebrated a slower, simpler era when farmers took a break from the harvest and drank, danced and sang – pursuits not often associated with the typically dour Vermont farmer.

Called "a little world's fair" by a Vermont governor of 1870, the title stuck to Tunbridge and no one since has questioned the name. Fairs are a vanishing trademark of rural America; you won't find any double-knit leisure suits, Gucci loafers, or evening gowns here. The Tunbridge Fair is straightforward unlicensed good fun. The atmosphere is friendly and more than a little crazy. People need escapes from the everyday humdrum of the routine and Tunbridge is as far away as you can get.

Nestled amid the hill farms of Orange County, Tunbridge is a quiet, white clapboard town which explodes into a fun-filled living museum every September. Unlike other world's fairs, there are no elaborate corporate exhibits, displays from around the globe, or bizarre inventions of the future. True, there are foreign visitors, but they come from far-off New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. The foreigners are easy to pick out – they say "VER-mont." The natives, straight out of the pages of Vermont Life, pronounce it "Va-MONT," and add 'Ayup" and "Nope."

Tunbridge has remained an agricultural fair more so than any other fair in Vermont. Consequently, Tunbridge is educational as well as entertaining. And the 1978 World's Fair, the 107th Fair, attracted 40,000 hedonists from last Thursday through Sunday.

The Fairgrounds have a quaint permanence. Not only have the buildings remained unchanged in 50 years, but many fairgoers are themselves antiques. There is plenty going on and a bored expression is hard to find. A hubbab persists with the crowd of teens, tots, prowlers looking for "the other man's wife," and thrill seekers.

At one end of the grounds, a chain saw carver slices an entire tree into tables, chairs and do-dads. At the other, the Floral Hall displays quilts, crafts, and produce – including the largest pumpkin (154 lbs) grown in Orange County. A collection of old log houses are like time machines transporting visitors back to the 19th century. Inside, an old lady meticulously dips tallow candles, while another spins wool, another needlepoints, and an old gent pounds at the blacksmith's forge. On the walls hang curiosities of the past: a Civil War uniform, cloth from the 1780 Indian raid, and a variety of rusty implements. In front, contra-dancers trip the light fantastic in clothes rescued from the attic – long print dresses, frock coats and vest, and beaver skin top hats. Ancient farm machinery lies beside the latest gigantic tractors and hay wagons: hand crafted versus mass produced. The old draws more attention.

Across from the grandstand, a throng surrounds the horse pulling circle. Stubby farmers with caps advertising John Deere, Ford, and other coveted machinery, gape, spit, and gamble over the pairs of work horses straining to haul 7,000 pounds a mere six feet.

In front of the grandstand, horses in harness trot as fast as their mud-choked hooves can carry their mud-spattered drivers. Later, a parade of long-horned oxen, sleek Black Angus, and assorted cows march past the judge's stand.

Some fairs are intent on attracting big name talent for grandstand shows. Tunbridge shows are predictably hokey – a juggling act, a dog show, and a lone country-western singer. The real stage is outside the grandstand where a cast of absolute characters – stereotypes and originals – act out their idiosyncracies. The total effect is kaleidoscopic: the dull green farmer's work suit, blue-jeaned farmer's daughters, black-laced old widows, and checkered young bucks.

Along the mid-way, the more modern spend-as-fast-as-you-can games are encamped, waiting for the care-free to try their luck at Bingo, ring tossing, and shooting. Barkers coax their gambling instincts, and macho men test their strength, hitting the sledge hammer to send the weight up to bell on top of the pole. When the bell rings, they look around proudly, surveying the crowd to see who is watching. Further on are the rides – the Ferris Wheel, the Merry-Go-Round, and the gravity defying Paratrooper.

The greatest attraction,

Used Bookstores: Collectives Vs. Collectables

By Diana Greene

Buying books at a used bookstore is something we should all consider nowadays when the prices of books, even paperbacks, are reaching record highs. The monetary value of used books is no doubt a determining factor for one's purchasing an already read, possibly yellowed book as opposed to a brand new, pristine one; but there is something besides money to be saved – there is a great deal of fun to be had. Let's face it, when you discover a hardback copy of Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms for $1.00, or a French/English, English/French dictionary for $1.50, or a text on Sexology written in 1904, that is fun.

Burlington is fortunate enough to have not just one but two used bookstores. The Frayed Page and Bygone Books located on 118 Pine Street and 91 College Street respectively, are about as similar as Ella Fitzgerald is to the late Janis Joplin. The only common denominator is their being used book stores; the history, atmosphere, employees, character, and philosophy behind these two stores is clearly a perfect dichotomy.

The Frayed Page, the third oldest bookstore in Burlington, was opened two years ago by six men and women in their twenties. It is a collective operation where each member of the collective holds another full-time job. Consequently, the Frayed Page is geared more towards pleasure and politics than toward profits. The Frayed Page, aside from their main aim, to make books more affordable and thus more available, also acts as a meetinghouse to inform the public on community issues.

Some of the Frayed Page's latest issues have been the Kristina Berster's case, the Anti-Nuke demonstrations, and, less recently, the HR1869 Criminal Code Reform.

Subsistence wages are paid to all members and each is expected to work one and a half days a week. Financially, a good day for the Frayed Page is a meager $40.00, and the average is $20.00. As Greg Guma, a member of the collective and writer for The Vanguard, said, "We like working together – the community issues – and that makes up for the lack of profit."

The spacious, sky-lit store is filled with the sounds of Dan Fogleberg and roughly 10,000 books, most of which are paperbacks. There are also a few stacks of records (in very used condition) ranging from the Jaw's soundtrack to Joni Mitchell. Back issues of magazines like Look, National Geographic, New Times, and The Organic Gardener can be found in piles at various spots on the floor, and there is even a decent collection of comic books from the good ole Captain Marvels right up to the contemporary Star Wars series.

The scope offered at the Frayed Page is wide. There are roughly thirty categories extending from education, philosophy, American politics, to car repair, consumerism, mysteries, and pets. The Religion section has a particularly good amount of reading in the Occult and Eastern Thought sectors (whenever you find six copies of Chariots of the Gods, that's a sure sign.) There is an impressive collection of Kurt Vonnugut's novels, a heafty supply of diet and exercise books, not to mention the well-stocked and fastest selling section of science fiction novels.

All paperbacks sell for one-half the original price, records go for as little as 25 cents up to $2.00, magazines approximately $1.00 (depending on which magazine), and the hardbacks according to condition. The Frayed Page buys all their books right in the store. People wanting to sell their unwanted books to make a little cash should come in on Wednesdays and Saturdays. All books are bought for one-fourth original price. Just a note on what the Frayed Page will not buy: romance novels are out, encyclopedias don't sell, and pornography is not allowed. The Frayed Page is open Monday through Saturday, 10–6.

Bygone Books is interested in the collectables rather than the collectives. The store was just opened last June by five middle-aged women who decided Burlington could use another used bookstore. The books they carry are purchased from auctions, estate sales, library sales, and from people who bring them into the store. They are bought and priced

Harry Chapin

On the Road to Change

By Vaune Davis

Harry Chapin claims that he has been somewhat controversial in the New York and Los Angeles rock scenes. "I don't fit into some of the categories they have there," he said cynically during his benefit concert for Congressman James Jeffords, held at St. Michael's Tuesday night.

No wonder.

Any musician who mixes warm, personal ballads with bawdy stories, while at the same time promoting political activism is no ordinary rock star.

"Hey, is anyone out there still saving it for marriage?" Chapin said. Everyone laughed, but no one stood up. "Come on, this is a Catholic school, isn't it?"

His humor was perhaps a little risque for the good fathers and the Jeffords staff, but it did add a sense of comaraderie between performer and audience. So when Chapin sang the three endings to "Bananas," the whole audience enthusiastically shouted, "Harry, it sucks!"

Chapin is, both in his musical and personal life, a staunch individualist. Alone on stage for two and a half hours, he played nothing but his own material, interrupting the music whenever he felt like it to tell a story, espouse his opinions, or joke raucously with the crowd. He is one of the few solo balladeers still active in addition to being an intimate and expressive performer.

On guitar, Chapin was nothing flashy. He seemed to caress the instrument, playing softly and tenderly, forcing out no high-speed riffs. But his voice was dynamic. Hoarse and raspy, it was so intriguing that one didn't even care that he had trouble reaching the high pitches in "WOLD." The amplifiers were overbearing to him at times. So he stepped away from the microphone and sang into the crowd unaided.

Some of his newer songs, many of which he wrote during his recent tour through Europe, are humorous. "There's No Need to Wait" is a tune about an attempted seduction. Laughing at the same time, he sang, "Life is made up of moments; let's not miss this one."

Others, though, reflected Chapin's more personal concerns. "Flowers Are Red," a song about the regimentation of education, received wild applause from the primarily student audience. It was Chapin at his best, mourning over the tragedy of conformity and the loss of intellectual freedom.

One of the most amazing aspects of Chapin's style, however, was the way he involved the people in his music. Oblivious to the agonized looks flashed at him by concert security, he said, "This is really going to be a living room to me so feel free to move up front here." Stampede. Calling the audience the "Jeffords Memorial Choir," he had them singing choruses during his familiar old hits including "Mr. Tanner," "Cat's Cradle," and "Taxi."

Chapin was introduced by Congressman Jeffords who, despite the opportunity, gave no indication that he was hot on the campaign trail. Whether this was just good taste or because the incumbent didn't need the publicity is unknown, but Jeffords did praise Chapin for his work towards relieving world hunger. In addition to doing a large number of benefit concerts, Chapin has worked with both Jeffords, senator Patrick Leahy, as well as being instrumental in establishing a Presidential Commission on World Hunger.

Despite his political involvement, Chapin sings no "songs of social change." His themes are surprisingly apolitical. At the end of the concert, however, he told us why. While playing the guitar softly in the background, Chapin made a short speech calling for "active participation in the democratic process." Singing and talking, Chapin feels, are not going to solve any problems. "We're in trouble," he said. "We have a lot more to do than just vote."

Nevertheless, Chapin's encore was still a joyous musical experience. The entire audience joined in while he played "The Circle Song." "And I still feel pretty good," he said, "even though I've been talking about pretty depressing things." Bravo.

DRACULA

"Animal House" Lauds Losers

By Vaune Davis

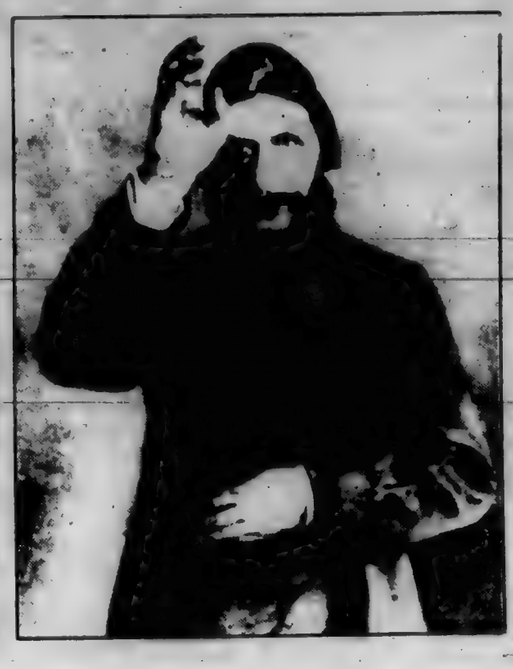
In attempting to capitalize on people's fantasies, the movie industry is becoming more unbearable every year. The slender, the rich, the super-intelligent and successful are glorified to the point where it becomes oppressive, if not downright frustrating to the public. After viewing many of the recent releases, one wonders if it is possible to be happy and fulfilled with ten extra pounds, no outstanding talent, and a desperate abhorrence of jogging.

But at last, a group of renegade film-makers under the auspices of none other than the National Lampoon has given the abused public what it deserves — a movie belauding the life of the loser. Animal House, the National Lampoon's first cinematic effort, is a masterpiece of raucous satire telling us the real truth about society — that the rejects have more fun.

Faber College in the early 60's is a typically lofty institution where staunch academic and social traditions rule. Great profundities such as "Knowledge is Good" are inscribed on its marble statues, but underlying this ivy facade is a hotbed of misplaced values. The selfish, vindictive Dean Wormer conspires with the Omega fraternity, the "best frat on campus," and a sado-masochistic ROTC captain to get the rowdy Delta fraternity kicked off campus. Faber's "clean" public image must be saved. The plot then follows a pattern of abusive tricks by the Omega's, and counter-abuse by the Delta's, interspersed with a great deal of wild pranks and partying.

While being the "best" fraternity, the Omega house is also the most obnoxiously exclusive. The Omegas are the campus greats — the football captain, the newspaper editor, and the ROTC leader. They slyly usher out all undesirables such as blacks, Indians, blind students and other "rejects." Along with their devoted following of beautiful but nasty blond cheerleaders, they scheme and plot against the Delta house.

The Delta's, on the other hand, could care less about their reputation, much less rules or grades. There is a certain honest joy about their debauchery as they throw wild beer blasts, seduce women at every opportunity and cheat frantically. Unlike the Omegas, they grab hold of life and enjoy it, oblivious to stuffy social restrictions. The Omega initiation ceremony, for example, is a cruel and humiliating tradition while the Delta's initiation just degenerates into another rowdy party.



With the exception of John Belushi, the actors were all relatively inexperienced when Animal House was made. This, however, seemed to have no adverse effect because their characterizations are all excellent.

Our images of "typical" college personalities are expanded into inane spoofs. Larry, "the wimp," is the naive freshman who loses it to the major's promiscuous thirteen-year-old daughter and fears that smoking pot will make him schizophrenic. When he finally gets high, he practically blows his mind thinking that a whole other universe could be in his fingernail. Dr. Jennings is the progressive young English professor who finds co-habitation with undergraduates much more interesting than Milton's "Paradise Lost," and Belushi is a classic as a degenerate slob who chugs straight Jack Daniels, smashes windows, and gracefully flattens beer cans against his forehead for laughs.

But the most entertaining and well-acted character is Otter, Delta House's most accomplished womanizer. Otter is such a slick master of scoring that he even seduces the dean's wife. Approaching her in the produce section of the local supermarket, he picks up a cucumber, looks at her calmly, and says "Mine's bigger."

Animal House is certainly one of the most refreshing films made in a long time. Finally, someone has had the courage to speak up and tell us what we need to hear — that there is nothing wrong with being young, horny, drunk and lazy, as long as it's done with style.

The Hills Are Alive...

...With Mountain Greenery

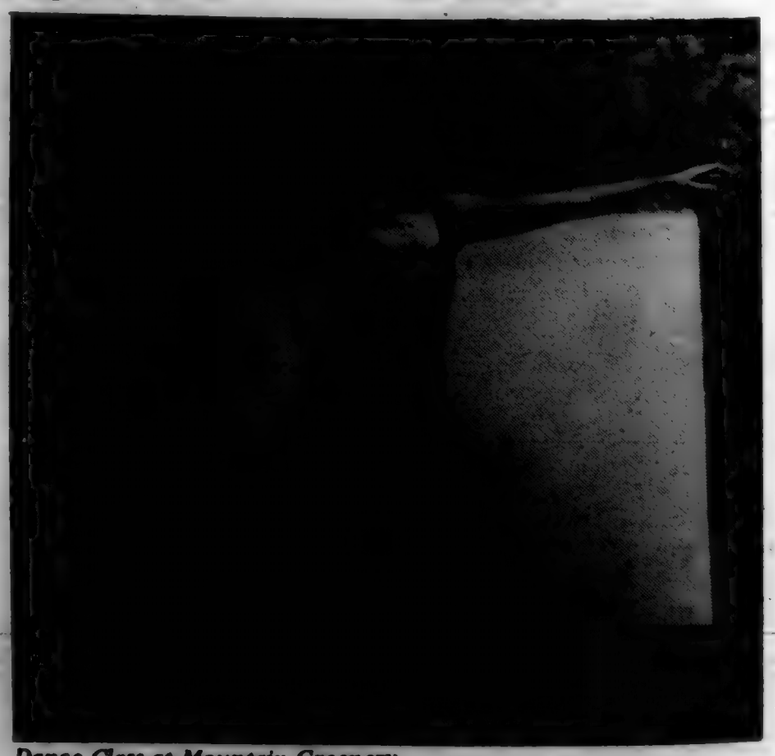
By Peter Rélick

The hills are alive with the sound of music, dancing, and laughter. Thanks to Mountain Greenery, Burlington has a new performance hall which can be utilized by entertainers as well as community workshops.

Located on lower College Street, the Mountain Greenery hall will be opening with a performance by Joe Val and the NE Blue Boys, this Saturday. Bob Durand, owner of the building which will also house the offices of the Vermont Symphony Orchestra, a recording studio, and a few offices and shops, hopes that the hall will become "a place for small performances to happen."

The hall itself has a wooden floor, large rustic beams and fieldstone walls. More importantly, Ben Bergstein, acting director of Mtn. Greenery, feels that its acoustic properties are excellent.

The idea for this performance center originally arose out of the need to get performers out of the bar situation, where many people go to meet friends and drink rather than sit and listen to the entertainment being provided.



Besides the various singers and instrumentalists who will make their way to Mountain Greenery, community organizations such as the Church Street Center and the Burlington Center for Creative Movement will be using the space for classes.

Country dances are also held the first and third Sunday of each month, and there may be a possibility of afternoon children's workshops.

At this point Mountain Greenery is focusing all of its energy into the opening of the building and workmen are filling the hall with noise and sawdust. Once things have settled down and the hall is running smoothly, Ben Bergstein hopes that Mountain Greenery will once again produce shows such as those staged by Winnie Winston and Ken Bloom, and Patrick Skeg last year. In an effort to measure the amount of community interest in their projects Mountain Greenery is now beginning a membership drive. The more community support which the organization receives, the more it can accomplish.

Upcoming events include an evening of Indian Music with Roop Verma, master sitar player, also Alistair Anderson, an Englishman accomplished on concerting and Northumbrian bag pipes, and Robin Williamson and his merry band.

The thirteenth through the fifteenth of October will be the Grand opening of the hall. And besides a mini-festival, Utah Phillips and Mike Seeger among others will be performing. For more information about membership and performances, call 862-3057.

Downtown's Gustatory Revival

By Vaune Davis and Diana Greene

Walter May, creator of the successful Potting Shed on Shelburne Road, has ventured into the epicurean jungle of downtown Burlington and opened, yes, another restaurant. But Gatsby's, located on 115 College Street, is not just another feeding ground. With a slow, relaxed atmosphere and fine cuisine, Gatsby's is a place where food is not to be devoured and forgotten, but experienced and savored.

The atmosphere is subtle and the twenties' theme is wisely not overplayed. The low, beamed ceilings, brick walls, tiffany lamps and white tablecloths give the restaurant, at first glance, a somewhat ordinary appearance. Simplicity, however, is the essence of their style. And style is what Gatsby's is all about.

The menu might at first seem limited. However, when combined with the three daily specials of fish, fowl and meat, the choice is manageable. In addition to the specials, the entrees include New York Strip Steak (7.95), Teriyaki ($7.95), Scallops ($7.50), Baked Stuffed Shrimp ($8.25), and Prime Rib ($9.25). We ordered the scallops and Teriyaki. The scallops, big and soft and tender, were like biting into a pillow, only more flavorful. The steak was, well, huge and had rivers of juice running out of it. Both dishes were cooked perfectly and the portions gave us, in the manner of Victorian etiquette, a gentile sufficiency.

Included in each meal is a varied and colorful salad, with radishes, mushrooms, shreaded carrots, red onion, green peppers, and cherry tomatoes, loaded over a bed of lettuce. All dressings are homemade. The blue cheese on our salad was thick and creamy with a mild and delicate flavor. Along with the salad came a cutting board of breads and whipped butter. Every night there is a yeast bread and a fruit bread; ours were cranberry nut and cinnamon yeast – a much welcomed change from standard fare of breadsticks and rolls. The homemade breads were just another one of the personal touches that make Gatsby's a pleasant and comfortable place to spend an evening.

There is a wide selection of appetizers – everything from tomato juice (50 cents) to Coquilles St. Jacques (3.50). The Onion Soup Gratiner we had was a more than generous serving for $1.50. It had a thick blanket of cheese over it, broiled crisp on the top and rich and gooey underneath. And the soup itself was tangy, dosed generously with wine.

...And a brief word about the drinks, particularly the Pina Coladas. They're well fortified and potent. At $2.00 they may seem expensive, but their size is only surpassed by the taste. The Pina Coladas are so frothy and light, with three pieces of fruit perched on the side of the glass, you could skip the rich desserts after such a heavy meal and imbibe some tropical nector.

The service is, in short, excellent. The waiters are friendly but professional. And when they talk about the restaurant, they say we – a good sign of a happy and conscientious staff. We were impressed by the timing of the entire meal. While it seemed long and drawn out – we never felt rushed – at the same time we never felt like we were waiting. It is smooth and elegant service at its best.

Gatsby's is also open for lunch. They serve a wide variety of salads, ranging in price from $1.75 to $4.75, sandwiches and homemade soups. For a light but satisfying meal, they serve a bowl of soup, a tossed salad, and half a loaf of fruit bread for $3.00. Lunch is served from 11 to 2:30 and dinner from 5:00 to 9:00.

The Tunbridge World's Fair

particularly on Saturday, the rowdiest day, is the Casa del Rio – the exotic tent containing the bump and grind of the girlie shows. It's humans at their animal best when beer blasted farmers flock to drool at females flaunting their much sought after favors. The hooting and hollering, in fact, puts all other barn yard animals to shame.

Of the four fair days, Thursday and Friday were the sanest days; the crowds were small and the accent was on agriculture. Saturdays used to be notorious as "the biggest collection of country drunks ever assembled." Fair rules stated that anyone found sober after 3 p.m. would be escorted off the grounds and fined. Saturdays are still pretty wild, said one visitor, "I've never seen so many happy drunk people in my life!" Everyone is easy, friendly, and harmless, though rowdy, rowdy, rowdy. Sunday is strictly for those who survived Saturday; the ambience is predictably quiet and hung-over. Still, the Sabbath day has its share of food inhaling gluttons, lechers, and adventurers.

Everyone at the fair is friendly, garrulous, and out for a good time. Visitors wolf down a smorgasboard of junk food – fried dough, hot dogs, cotton candy, all kinds of liquor, and Mexican imports. Once a year is enough for this diet. Other than the memories of Tunbridge, it is only fitting to have a tangible memento of the fair. T-shirts are uniquely Vermont: "Farms Keep Vermont Beautiful." A wrinkled, bearded old coot proudly quips "At least I ain't no Gol Darn Flatlander!" or simply a horse and buggy with "The World's Fair, Tunbridge, Vt."

Burlington is another world compared to the hinterlands of Tunbridge, where people work the land, tend the general store, aspire to be farm wives, or else lapse into spinsterhood. The styles are behind the times and no one tries to be "hip." This is the real Vermont – colorful and homegrown.

If you missed this year's World's Fair, don't forget to make the next. For many, Tunbridge has become an annual pilgrimage to the rollicking good times of a true country fair.

DO YOU WANT TO FLY?

Contact St. Michael's/UVM Air Force ROTC, 655-2000, ext. 2551.

Face it . . . you've always wanted to fly! Many of us have had the feeling . . . and for some it has never gone away.

If you have that feeling, then you're in luck. Air Force ROTC Flight Instruction Program (FIP) is available to you. It's designed to teach you the basics of flight through flying lessons in small aircraft at a civilian operated flying school.

The program is an EXTRA for cadets who can qualify to become Air Force pilots through Air Force ROTC. Taken during the senior year in college, FIP is the first step for the cadet who is going on to Air Force jet pilot training after graduation.

This is all reserved for the cadet who wants to get his life off the ground . . . with Air Force silver pilot wings. Check it out today.

Pat Metheny Recognized At Last

By Tom Nuccio

Pat Metheny was always an excellent guitarist but never achieved recognition on the New York City jazz scene. His previous albums on ECM, Watercolors and Bright Life Size sold poorly. But now the City jazz audience can no longer ignore him.

Modern jazz-fusion guitarists usually fall into one of two categories: (1) a mellow, laid back style (eg. George Benson & Eric Gale) and (2) a heavy electric storm of high speed riffs (eg. Al Dimeola, Steve Khan, Larry Coryell). Pat Metheny, falling somewhere between these two boundaries, appears as a pleasant exception to this rule. His music develops an exciting brand of fusion, complete with textures and shadings not found anywhere else in the world of jazz. His new LP on the ECM label titled The Pat Metheny Group possesses some of his finest work to date.

"San Lorenzo" is a balladic tune structured around a frequently recurring melodic phrase. Creative textures and overtones of this song are produced by a mixture of Metheny's acoustic and electric guitars and Lyle Mays' piano, synthesizer and autoharp.

"Phase Dance" contrasts and compliments the former song perfectly. It is an exciting vamp on a thematic chord structure which allows Metheny to open up and solo fluently. Mark Egan's acoustic bass, sounding remarkably akin to Jaco Pastorius' Fender Electric, constantly weaves through the melody adding the rhythmic anchor to the group performance. The key to Phase Dance's success appears in the form of a musical term — dynamics. At one instance the group is wailing away in a jam type setting, then suddenly the action subsides to a musical whisper. Just as the ear adapts to this hush, an exciting clash of drums and vamping rhythm unexpectedly erupts, bringing the song to a climatic ending.

In my opinion, the Pat Metheny Group possesses more dynamic ability than any band on the contemporary scene. The Pat Metheny Group, one of the hottest sellers presently on the jazz market, has focused attention on the Pat Metheny Group. For the first time this quartet of talented and creative musicians is getting the recognition it rightfully deserves.

Lynyrd Skynyrd

After completing a concert in Jacksonville, Florida last fall, a charter plane containing the group Lynyrd Skynyrd crashed. Ronnie Van Zant, the fiery and emotional lead singer, was killed. Steve Gaines, the talented lead guitarist, also perished. This occurred just ten days after their excellent album Street Survivors had been issued. At the time we were told that there would be no more Lynyrd Skynyrd. However, recently a collection of old and new, previously unreleased Skynyrd songs were released.

The first thing any Skynyrd fan notices with this album is that the personnel is different. Steve Gaines with his powerful and expressive guitar does not appear on this album. Artimus Pyle, the group's normal drummer, has been replaced by Rickey Medlocke. Finally, Billy Powell, whose keyboards were an integral part of the Skynyrd sound, appears on only one song.

To begin with, the album is composed of two styles — one is the Van Zant we are used to, while the other is the more sedate style of Rickey Medlocke. "Down South Jukin'" gets the album off the ground. Here, the classic duo of Allen Collins and Gary Rossington let their guitars go. Ronnie Van Zant projects his voice out to the audience, while Leon Wilkeson sets the tempo with his driving bass. The heart of Skynyrd is beating strong.

Rickey Medlocke has taken over the drumming duties on this record. He replaced the Skynyrd fixture Artimus Pyle. The change is quite noticeable as you follow the songs. Artimus was a drummer who worked with the drums, while Rickey dominates his. The result is a rougher sounding drum which is also quite effective.

The song this album is centered around is "Comin' Home." Here, Billy Powell joins the band to play keyboards. With Billy Powell the band's depth is enlarged. "Comin' Home" brings a nice touch to this album.

"Things Goin' On" is a nice finish to a type of music. The album's concluding song is an appropriate final tribute. With the excellent photos and album lay-out, this album will surely find a spot in the collection of Skynyrd fans. For the remaining players, it is off to something else, for Lynyrd Skynyrd, it's a wrap.

Mountaineering #1.

FUNDAMENTALS OF MOUNTAINEERING

What is mountaineering all about? Funny you should ask. Because we just happen to have an answer. (Ah-h, life's little coincidences.) Mountaineering is a skill, a science and an art. Yet anyone with a thirst for excellence and normally developed motor skills can master it. Simply study these fundamentals and follow them faithfully.

1. Step one, appropriately enough, starts by selecting the correct site. To do so, pick up a bottle of Busch. This is commonly called heading for the mountains.

2. Okay, here's where the fun begins. Hold the mountain firmly in your left hand, grasp the mountain top with your right hand and twist the little fella off. There you go.

3. Now for the tricky part. Neophytes, listen up: the proper pour is straight down the center of the glass. Only in this way will the cold, invigorating taste of the mountain come to a head.

4. Once poured, pacing becomes paramount. As any seasoned mountaineer will tell you, the only way to down a mountain is slowly, smoothly and steadily – savoring every swallow of the brew that is Busch. If you're a bit awkward at first, don't be discouraged. Perfection takes practice. Soon enough, having emptied your glass and filled your soul, you too will be a mountaineer.

Christoff Amtmann's Provocative Piano

By Scott Hamner

Burlington area residents were treated to an arousing recital of piano works last Sunday afternoon at St. Paul's Cathedral, performed by the German-born pianist Mr. Christoff Amtmann. The program, which featured works from the late baroque era to the early twentieth century, was the first in a series of free public concerts to be presented by the St. Paul's Cathedral Ministry of the Arts in the coming weeks this fall.

Mr. Amtmann, who has won many prestigious honors in his native Europe, commenced his performance with a piano rendition of three preludes and fugues from J.S. Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier (Book I). The first, in C-sharp major, featured a typically capricious Johann Sebastian executed with an almost flawless grace. The second, in C-sharp minor, was as much the antithesis of the first in sentiment as it was in modality. Mr. Amtmann also capitalized well on the very untypical fugue, with its slow, pondering subject and elegiae qualities. The third, in G-major, was a virtuoso delight, with a short, sprightly prelude and a longer, sparkling fugue to complement it. With the exception of the slight loss of contrapuntal clarity the piano seemed to affect, all three works were very pleasing and convincing.

The next piece, Carl Maria von Weber's Sonata in C-major, op. 24, gave Mr. Amtmann further opportunity to display his well-rounded technique, effortlessly dashing off the work's many dazzling chromatic figurations. The opening Allegro and subsequent Adagio shone with all the joy and let-loose emotion one comes to expect from von Weber's works. The concluding Menuetto and Rondo, however, presented the listener with some shocking and eloquent passages, very Lisztian in effect. The sonata on the whole was pure enjoyment, and Mr. Amtmann conveyed this element with confidence and flair.

After a short intermission, Mr. Amtmann continued with two works by the Russian-American composer Igor Stravinsky: A Sonata (1924), with a good deal less atonality than his more famous orchestral works of a decade earlier (in fact, the Sonata ended on a surprisingly tonal major chord!); and Four Etudes, op. 7, which featured interesting rhythmic intricacies. Mr. Amtmann performed these scintillating pieces again with a capable and controlled technique.

Maurice Ravel's Une Barque sur l'Ocean (from Miroirs) followed, presenting the listener with undoubtedly the most beautiful music of the program. Ravel's combination of twentieth century harmony and pure Gallic melody conveyed perfectly a sensation of ocean breezes and undulation, and Mr. Amtmann's sensibility to the piece produced a most pleasurable effect indeed.

The last piece on the program, Chapin's Ballade in G-minor, op. 23, summed up very well Mr. Amtmann's abilities in taste and technique. The familiar motif and all its Chopinesque transformations, from flowing whispers to a thundering finish, were all under the artist's masterful control from beginning to end. This piece grandly and officially ended the afternoon's recital, but the audience's persistent applause did not go unrewarded. Brahm's Rhapsodie served beautifully as an encore, combining virtuosity and classical melody in an exciting melange which only that romantic composer himself could conceive.

St. Paul's next Ministry of the Arts presentation will feature Ithaca College music history lecturer George Dampf at the Cathedral's gorgeous Wilhelm organ, performing works by Muffat, Corrette, Rorem, Brahms, and Mendelssohn on October 13 at 8:00 p.m. Again the recital is free and open to the public, and a program with the complete St. Paul's Arts schedule can be picked up at the performance, or at the cathedral anytime.

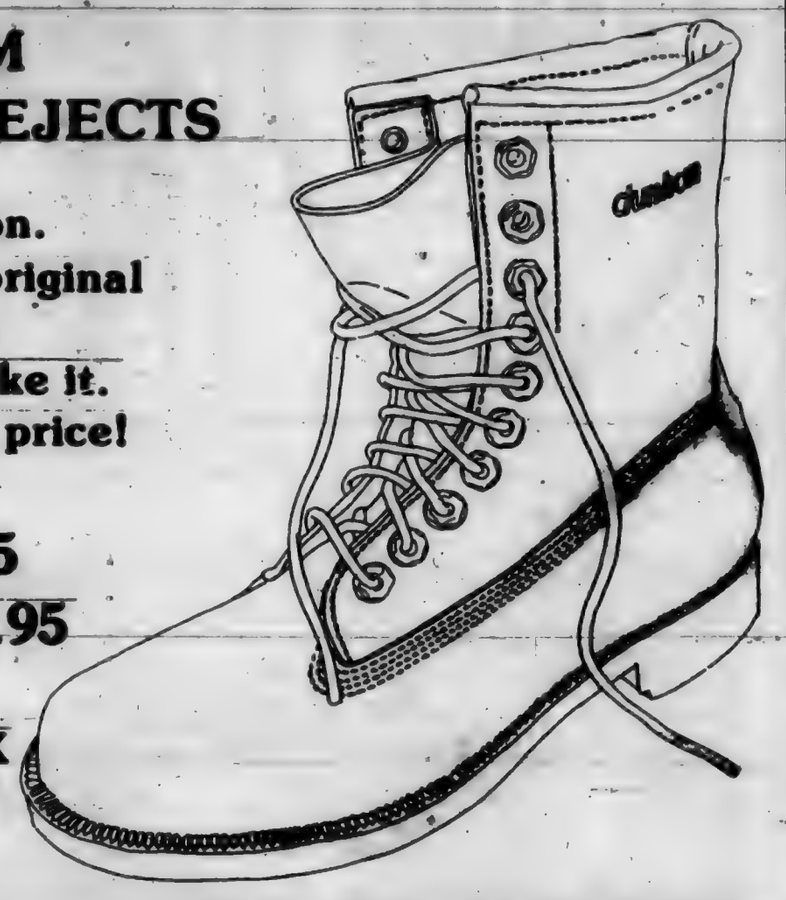
according to saleability, and condition is everything. The prices here are good, and the quality is excellent.



Bygone Books is located on 91 College Street right in back of the Hair Clinic. The building itself is a renovated garage that reeks of charm, from the milkbox outside which is used as a mailbox to the bricks that have been covered with a sock and converted to bookends.

Bygone has an estimated 8,000 books covering a wide variety of topics. There are shelves of American history books neatly divided into chronological periods, with nearly two shelves devoted to Franklin Roosevelt solely. Shelves of anthropology, psychology, sociology, travel, adventure, theatre, poetry, foreign languages, resources, photography, literary criticism, drugs, not to mention a women's section, are all available, as well as a bunch of biographies spreading from Abagail Adams to Mao Tse-Tung, a growing section of prints, both framed and unframed, and much, much more.

The fastest selling books at Bygone are science fiction and religion; the slowest are economics and politics. The books range in price from freebies to $25.00. The price of the used book is looked up in The Used Book Guide, a reference book, where it gives an estimated worth of the particular book, and from there the edition, scarcity, and quality is taken into consideration to make up the asking price. The prices are fair and the finds are tremendous. There are some interesting bargains to be found at Bygone like this one: a set of Encyclopedia Brittanica, plus yearbooks 1958-66, a 2 volume dictionary, and a bookcase, all for the low, low price of $90.00. Now that is some terrific deal. Bygone Books is open from 9:30 — 5:30 Monday through Saturday.

DON'T MISS THE FEAT

Science Fiction

By Jim Wright

In case any of you out there were unaware of it, SF is presently experiencing a "boom" time. The amount of science fiction being published has increased in the last ten years to the point where SF readers will spend a total of $45 million on books, compared to only $1.5 million in 1968. Even Hollywood has rediscovered SF and the success of such movies as Star Wars and Close Encounters makes it certain that we will experience a flood of similar films in the next five years. The major problem with the films which will come out of Hollywood is that the producers seem to have come to the conclusion that SF means special effects, which it does not. But that is another column. The one possible benefit of all this is that we may at long last see the release of the almost legendary Star Trek motion picture.

There will be, during 1978, almost 1,000 new SF books published. Obviously, there is no way that all can be mentioned, let alone reviewed, so I would like to take just a minute to explain how I will run this column. First of all, this is a review column, not a critical one. My main purpose is to recommend books to you that are worth your time and money. I will not be writing any long "killer" reviews since I prefer to use these 400 or so words each week to turn you on to good books. However, if I come across a book I feel that you should be warned about, you will hear of it. I also plan to interject, from time to time, a little of the history of SF into the column, since I believe that you will enjoy what you are reading a bit more if you understand something of where it is coming from. I also have a few surprises planned throughout the semester.

If, at any time during the semester, you want to drop me a note with your reactions to one or more of my columns, please do so. I am writing these columns for you, and I encourage (plead for?) your feedback. Drop a note in the campus mail to me c/o the AGR box in Billings.

Now on to the books!

One of the most popular new writers in the SF field is Jack L. Chalker. Chalker has been a long time fan of SF, having joined the local fan club in the Baltimore area when he was still fairly young. He has worked on the committees of several World SF Conventions and became widely known in the SF community for his skill as an auctioneer at those conventions. He began writing in 1976 and has published five novels to date.

His latest novel, Exiles at the Well of Souls (DelRey Books, 335 pp., $1.95) is a sequel to a book which he published last year, Midnight at the Well of Souls (a book which sold more copies than any other published by DelRey last year). We return, in Exiles, to the Well World only with a different set of characters and with a different problem. The Well World is a complex and exotic place built by a long-extinct race, the Markovians – now home to myriad races of beasties and creatures living in 1500 hex-shaped environments. At the heart of the world is the Well of Souls – a giant complex computer which maintains the different environments.

The book begins with scientist Gil Zinder inventing OBIE, a supercomputer that is capable of tapping the powers of the ancient Markovians, powers with which that race once controlled all matter and all worlds. Antor Trelig, head of something called the "Sponge Syndicate," gains control of OBIE through some predictably nasty means and plans to use the super computer to make himself omnipotent. Enter, at this point, Mavra Chang, whom the Council has sent to stop Antor from using OBIE. The first time that Antor tries to use OBIE, however, he, the small planet he is on, and all the rest of the people on the planet, are drawn millions of light-years away from where they were to the Well World. Mavra escapes from Antor, only to crash on the Well World. Antor and company soon follow her down to the world since they must figure out some way to get back to where they started from. The arrival of these new "entries" to the Well World sparks a major war among several of the hexagons, as different factions attempt to capture enough of one of the crashed ships to enable them to escape what they consider their prison.

Exiles is the first of two books which deal with the war of the Well World (the second and concluding volume will be published in November). Chalker has certainly left enough unfinished questions to fill a second volume. As the action ends in this book, one of the two crashed spaceships is destroyed. The other ship is somewhere in the Northern Hemisphere where it should be safe from capture. We also have a few characters whom we seem to have lost track of after they landed on the Well World. And there is also a rather hazy prediction about Mavra by one of the races of the Well World. We will have to wait until November to see if Jack pulls all of these elements together in the last book.

The book itself is well written and I'm sure that it will sell at least as many copies as Midnight did. With this book and the one to follow, Jack Chalker has firmly established himself as one of the best writers in the genre – don't be surprised if Exiles receives at least a Hugo nomination. An excellent book and I give it my highest recommendation.

Ultimate Frisbee

Ten years ago the Frisbee was considered a hippie toy. But now Disc games have grown into a serious sport with college and professional teams.

By Joshua Reynolds

Burlington, Vt.

Reports of sightings are arriving continuously. Silently, stealthily, the skys are being infiltrated by beings of mysterious origin. They have been spotted spinning, weaving back and forth across the horizon, or carving a gentle arc across the earth. They occur in many colors, but always appear disc shaped. Wherever these airborne objects are found, an eager crowd stares up with arms outstretched, struggling to be the first to make contact.

A new cult? In a way it is. The object (you might have guessed) is none other than the frisbee. Ten years ago it was considered a hippie toy, but people take frisbee seriously today. Although they still maintain the party spirit, disc games have grown into a highly competitive sport. Professional teams and players currently tour the country. Local competition and invitational National Championships are sponsored by the International Frisbee Association (IFA). Frisbee World, a magazine sponsored by the IFA, covers areas of interest and concern in the world of the disc. Despite the rapid increase of skilled players and difficult games, frisbee still maintains its universal appeal. Anyone, from the rank beginner to the accomplished expert, can get out, toss the disc, and enjoy.

Frisbee players at UVM have grown in both numbers and talent. President of the newly formed Frisbee Club, Ernie Flanders explains that interest has grown immensely in the past two years. "This year is definitely the best; many players have improved over the summer and there are some talented freshmen and transfers as well.

UVM's Frisbee Club is being reviewed for S.A. approval this week, and Intercollegiate Ultimate (a form of frisbee football) meets are now taking form. An opener against Vermont Tech will mark this season's start on Sept. 30. Flanders hopes the Frisbee Club will compete with Middlebury, UNH, UMass, and BU this year. The club will sponsor "A", "B", "C", and intramural teams, all of which should compete. As an SA sponsored club, they hope to gain access to the fieldhouse for year-round play. The extent of competition depends upon student interest and involvement.

In this year's first meeting, which was advertised only by word of mouth, 45 players signed up. Practices and Ultimate scrimmages are held three times a week at five and every Sunday afternoon on the green in front of the shoeboxes. Anyone interested can drop over and play Ultimate or jam with the freestylers. The practices so far have been friendly and casual, but competitive and quite popular.

Ultimate is the most widely played frisbee game on campus, but the Frisbee Club is not limited to that. In the near future, lists will be posted naming interested freestylers so that people can find players of their ability with whom they can toss. Flanders hopes to sponsor a frisbee competition in the spring, which will allow people from all over the Burlington area to get together and compete in all forms of disc games.

Frisbee can no longer be thought of as a sport; it is rather an object with which a number of sports are played. The list of frisbee games has grown quite long. It includes Ultimate, Freestyle, Frisbee Golf, Guts and a medley of challenges such as Maximum Time Aloft (MTA), Throw and Catch (T&C) and Distance, all of which are part of most IFA approved competitions.

Ultimate frisbee closely resembles football. The object is to get the frisbee over an end zone. One point is awarded for each goal, and the team with the most points at the end of the 48 minute game wins. Teams consist of seven members who have no positions and are free to move anywhere on the field. The game may be played with zones or each player may cover an opponent. The frisbee must be thrown from player to player. Players are given considerable freedom since rules are generally informal, but play is intense and extremely demanding. A tightly knit team plays with machine-like precision and is a thrill to watch or play on.

Freestyle naturally evolved out of tossing and trying new tricks. It involves numerous moves: jumping, tapping the frisbee in the air, spinning it on the finger and figure-eights, but style and innovation are the key. As Freestyle expert Moses Garcia remarked, "There is a market for innovative disc moves." Freestyle can be taken very seriously, but every

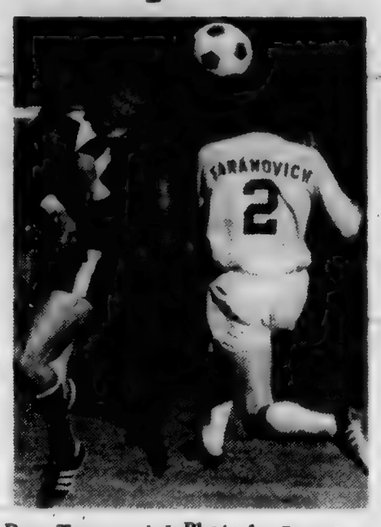
Soccer Cats Squeek by SLU on Penalty Shot

By Thomas Campbell

Beneath a sun that shined as brilliantly as any that this year has yet to reveal, the UVM soccer team squeeked by St. Lawrence 2 to 1 Tuesday afternoon.

It was the season's opener for the two squads, both of whom are coming off what could be their best campaign in each of their school's histories. Looking back at the game, UVM soccer coach Paul Reinhardt remarked that he considered it to have been an "uneven" contest and that he had to be pleased to have come away with the victory.

The game was a rather see-saw battle that included, at times, a lot of fast-paced excitement — especially in front of the St. Lawrence goal where the Catamounts dominated play for much of the first half.



Opening rather sluggishly, both teams had trouble turning on any kind of offensive attack for the first ten minutes. Although St. Lawrence consistently kept the ball in the Vermont end much of this time, they only really came close to scoring once. Freshman goalie Skip Gilbert (who played a superb game until forced to leave in the second half due to a tightened leg muscle)) slid far to his right to block the shot, and the rebound was kicked over the goal by a St Lawrence player. Finally, the tempo of the game began to pick up considerably. Fifteen minutes into the half, Brian Fleming made a fine play to keep the ball in the Saint's zone, allowing Zareh Avakian to feed Barry Ryan a beautiful pass in front of the goal which he slammed home for a 1 to 0 lead.

were sorely missed in the somewhat lackluster second half, a consistent flurry of Catamount activity in front of the St. Lawrence goal and a crowd stirring stop by Gilbert on a penalty kick, the Saints finally knotted the score on an indirect kick.

Both teams seemed aggressive early in the second half but soon they settled into a defensive struggle with few threatening shots by either side. With a bit more than fifteen minutes remaining in the game, the Cat attack began to pick up once more. Brian Fleming was held in front of the Saint's goal and awarded a penalty shot. Although blocked by the St. Lawrence goalie, Fleming alertly sent the rebound into the upper right hand corner of the goal for what proved to be the game winner.

Defensively, Vermont is quite strong, with the goal in the great hands of power booter Bart Farley, Pete Nostrand and rookie Skip Gilbert. With the return of Miller and Winstanley, and the continued excellent all-round play of forwards Zareh Avakian (who seemed to be everywhere he was needed) and Barry Ryan, the offense should soon begin racking up a lot more goals than their opening game seemed to suggest they will.

When asked about the way Vermont looked against St. Lawrence, Mike Winstanley replied, "It's really too early in the season to judge anything on the outcome of one game, but I think the team played fairly tightly and cohesively."

Vermont now faces Boston University on Friday, Sept. 29 and Middlebury on Wednesday, Oct. 4, both away.

Khachain Spurs Tennis Women

By Rich Chalmers

UVM sophomore Carol Khachain blasted her way to a 6-0, 6-0 victory in the number one singles spot as she spurred the women's tennis team to a 4-1 win over Plymouth State Monday.

Sophomores Jenny Hensen and Jeanie Marcy filled the second and third singles positions and walked away with 7-5, 6-3, and 7-5, 6-4 wins respectively. Co-captains Becky Rich and Kathy Stanton combined for the number one doubles team but were upset 7-5, 4-6, 7-5 by a Plymouth combination they had beaten six times before. Kathy Borda and Kathy Babbott split sets with their Plymouth opponents but pulled out a 7-5, 2-6, 6-3 victory.

Whereas coach Marilyn Chase stressed veteran strength on Monday she took to her freshman talent on Tuesday against Green Mountain and was rewarded with a 5-0 whitewash.

Freshman Pam Hensel had an excellent day, dropping a male opponent 6-3, 6-0 followed by an equally impressive no. 2 singles victory by classmate Alicia Good 6-0, 6-2, also against a man. "Both Hensel and Good are well-skilled players," commented Chase. "I'm expecting good results from both of them this season." Beth Cooney went on to pull out her no. 3 singles match in a tough struggle 4-6, 6-4, 6-1. Rich and Stanton made quick work of the Green Mountain lead doubles team 6-1, 6-0 followed by a good win from UVM freshman Stacey and Greene 6-0, 6-1.

Competing against Plymouth and Green Mountain in the early part of the season has given Coach Chase an ideal chance to experiment with the lineup and try new combinations of veterans and freshmen. As Rich explained after the matches, "the freshmen were given the opportunity and they did beautifully."

The UVM Jogger's Trail

An Athletic Facility Breakthrough

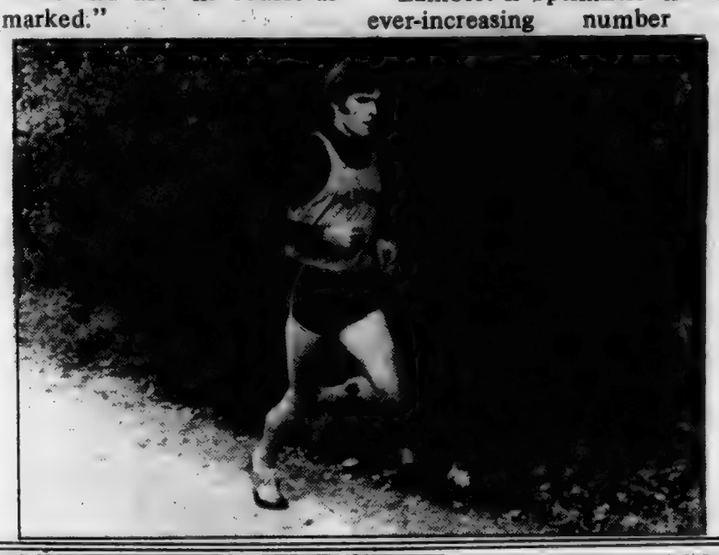
By Tom Phillips

Come 1979, the Barron's Guide to American Universities may describe UVM's athletic complex in words like the following: "The University athletic facilities consist of an indoor pool, a large gymnasium, several paddle-ball and tennis courts, a field house, and a joggers' course." That's right, a joggers' course!

Thanks to the efforts of several individuals, a well-marked and measured joggers' course has been created on the east edge of the Burlington Country Club. A scenic network of alternately wooded and grassy paths, "The Joggers' Course" was realized to serve a dual purpose. Director of Athletics Denis Lambert explains "Essentially, the course was made so that people will not have to run along Spear Street. The cars and runners traveling the same road presented a problem that could only be described as dangerous. With the joggers' course, joggers will be safer. Also, we set up the course along the east side of the country club because many joggers were running all over the club grounds. The country club is a private club that is off-limits to joggers."

However, Lambert is quick to add, "This isn't to say the country club people haven't been cooperative. They have. I just hope the joggers will return the favor and use the course as it's marked."

The course itself – actually there are two courses, 2.5 and 3.0 miles, starting from the same point – begins at the hedge opening behind the outdoor track. From there, it winds its way down the club's east edge, veering left into a wooded stretch, before reaching a fork by the Bio-Research Lab. Here, a runner may choose to continue on the three-mile course, which parallels Spear Street for a time, or follow the shorter path around a cornfield. Either route is sure to offer each jogger an assortment of terrain available nowhere else on campus.



The idea for the course was conceived of last year. Actualization of the plans was delayed mainly by the unavailability of building materials for the course's four bridges. According to Lambert, "we had already started clearing some trees to make the path. But we still had some things to iron out."

Lambert is optimistic that the ever-increasing number of joggers in the area will use the course. He states, "Already, I've noticed a lot of people are using the course rather than fight the traffic on the streets. And I think more people will use it once they know about it and particularly after we make some changes."

The changes Lambert speaks of are related to the "Parcourse" idea that is common in Europe. This concept is oriented towards the jogger who is solely concerned with general physical fitness, in that several stations are scattered around the course. At each station, "the jogger could exercise at a chin-up bar or some other type apparatus," says Lambert.

The Parcourse concept is just one change that Lambert is pondering. He adds, "If people have any comments or suggestions, I would ask that they put them in writing and send them to me, personally. If we find an idea to be reasonable and we can get to it, we will be happy to upgrade and improve the course."

Though the course is Lambert's brainchild, there are others who did much work on it as well. A handful of people, namely, Don LaCross, Marcel Pigeon, Merritt Gordon, and Skip Van Dine III, "did most of the work on the course," credits Lambert. "They are the ones who should really be thanked for this thing." Others who are very worthy of mention are Bob Young and Lee Welch of the City Light Dept. (who donated wood for bridge-building), Dick Streeter of the UVM Grounds Dept. (for operation of heavy machinery), and Bob Hartmann and Fred Martell of the Burlington Country Club.

freestyler is out to have fun no matter how hard he tries.

Disc Golf is the fastest growing branch of frisbee sports. It is played like conventional golf, but the frisbee is tossed into a basket on a pole. Its multiplying popularity may be due to the challenge it presents. Distance, accuracy and control are all essential for a good score in Disc Golf. It may be played on a specially designed course, or on an informal "make-it-up-as-you-go" basis.

A series of regional competitions are held across the country to determine qualifiers for the North American Frisbee Championship Series and the World Frisbee championships held annually at the end of August in the Rose Bowl. Anyone may enter the statewide competitions such as the Vermont Open. Top players from these competitions are invited to the championship qualifiers, and the best of those go on to the World Championships. Last year the Eastern Championships were held in Amherst, Mass., but no one from UVM competed.

Every field of athletics has its professionals and frisbee is no exception. In the Northeast, Daryl Elliot is one of the most prominent. He worked to popularize frisbee at UMass and now plays the sport as a vocation. He is also teaching an accredited disc course at UMass. Since there are few professional teams, a frisbee pro works by promoting the disc. He is hired as a performer to do freestyle moves, tricks and to talk about the game. Sometimes the employer simply wants an eye-catching show, but more frequently a school or club will hire a pro to give pointers. Like many pros, Elliot also sells discs, T-shirts, and disc paraphenalia.

Discs have been manufactured since the 1940's, and rare discs can be quite valuable. Disc collection is a form of frisbee involvement not athletically oriented. A very rare disc may be worth as much as $100. Saucers which have a particular history are also valuable. A disc was once manufactured with a large hemispherical dome, like a capital dome, in the center. It was first discovered washed up on the Atlantic coast and was therefore named "the Atlantis." Only four exist in the world. Anyone interested in collecting discs or with an interesting model should talk to Daryl Elliot through the author.

The Frisbee Club is already preparing for its first meet against Vermont Tech. President Flanders commented on UVM's prospects, "Vermont Tech is a smaller school, but it has developed a lot of interest. They just started last year so they have little experience. We are a young team, but with a large student body to draw from we have a good deal of potential. In three practices we have already improved considerably; people who have just freestyled before are rapidly developing a knack for teamwork, and we have begun working together as a unit. Most importantly, we have a positive attitude; people are taking the game seriously. In the next two weeks before the game we will devote more time to training and exercise. We will be following the conditioning technique devised by Daryl Eliott including running, wind sprints, several drills, and to keep the body in excellent shape, a lot of sex. It should be fun."

Frisbee sightings in Burlington have been reported for many years. The enthusiasm of the fledgling frisbee club combined with the long-standing popularity of the sport in this area, should make the Frisbee Club a permanent and popular fixture of the UVM sports scene.

Quick Work Cut Out for Cross Country Men

By Tom Phillips

To cite an ancient maxim "Time is of the essence" for the 1978 men's cross-country team.

Revolving around a nucleus of both returning veterans and freshmen surprises, the Cats may prove to be competitive with some of the traditionally stronger Yankee Conference foes. The success, however, of this year's squad will depend largely upon what Coach Bill Nedde describes as "our ability to move some key people up to where they belong."

"Unfortunately," adds Nedde, "a few people who have done well for us in the past did not show up this fall in as good condition as was hoped. This makes it difficult to coordinate training programs for the conditioned runners, who need speedwork, and the less-fit guys who need a distance base."

Despite that dilemma, Nedde remains hopeful! "By November, we should be an improved team. Once we get 6 or 7 guys in the 25-26 minute range for the 5 mile racing distance, we'll be competitive. My only worry, now, is whether we have enough time to get that group together by the November championships."

In a recent meet against New Hampshire on the UNH course, the Catamounts were forced to rely on an undermanned squad and bowed 15-40. Rick Solie, a freshman from Alaska, led Vermont with a 6th place finish. Senior Jack Hart, sophomore Tony Bates, and juniors Carl Scott and Tom Beatini placed 9th, 7th, 13th, and 16th, respectively. In another meet, run Sept. 13 at Albany State, a Vermont B squad similarly fell short, 15-45. Juniors Kevin Martell and Kent Karns and freshman Bill Harvey finished 7th, 9th, and 10th in the race.

Though these scores appear lopsided, they are deceptively encouraging — both opponents usually boast impressive won-lost records and aggregate team times. However, the times recorded by the Albany and UNH runners are within the capabilities of the Vermont harriers. Once again, that old maxim is applicable.

As for runners to watch as the season progresses... Dave Elliot, Mike Myers, Randy Sightler, Mike Landman, John Foster, and several other talented runners deserve mention.

The team will open its home season on Saturday, September 23 against a strong Plattsburgh State team. Race setting is 1:00 p.m. at the outdoor track.

Veterans to Spark Women's Cross Country

By Tom Phillips

Women's Cross Country Coach Perry Bland claims that his cross-country corps "might even be stronger than last year's team which compiled an impressive 7-3 record and made a run for the New England team championship."

But, it is easy to see how Coach Bland can possess such optimism — not one of his top five runners was lost to graduation. In fact, last year's highly successful group was strictly an undergraduate squad. Bland is no gambler with his projection.

Though some talented freshmen will figure in the scoring this year, the team will be led by a fine group of returning runners. Judi St. Hilaire, a New England collegiate runner-up in the mile run (4:57), has to be regarded as a challenger for the top spot in the big late season races. St. Hilaire has returned this fall in good condition and does, indeed, look fit. Amy Bouchard, a New England champ in the two mile (11:00), and Robin Snyder, another crack two-miler, also appear ready to roll. Other returnees who may raise some eyebrows are sophomore Heather Adams, junior Nancy Dickson, and senior Maureen Horan.

Another member of the 1977 team, sophomore Donna Raymond, is fast gaining recognition in track circles. Raymond, much improved and better conditioned than a year ago, has been nothing short of fleet in recent months. This past summer, she ran some strong races over road courses — most notably, a 58:00 ten mile run in New Hampshire, and a 10-kilometer roadrace victory over nationally-ranked Dia Elliman of Hampshire College.

At present, the freshmen runners largely remain untested, though there is one noteworthy exception. Anne Schiavone, a graduate of Burlington's Rice High School, is a seasoned competitor. Best known for her fine performance in the 1978 Boston Marathon, Schiavone does possess respectable speed (11:00 two-mile). Her limits are inestimable as she possesses an enviable combination of strength and determination.

Coach Bland, not anxious to offer any predictions, only hopes his squad can perform up to par all year. According to Bland, "there are a lot of talented girls out here, but I have to be careful not to train them into running their best times too early." Most coaches wish they had the problem Bland has.

Apparently, the women are up to par or close enough to it to still be awesome in the early going. On Sept. 17, the girls ran away from second place UConn in winning their second straight Williams College Invitational. UVM compiled a meager 20 points to defeat the seven team field handily. Raymond raced to a 21-second victory over teammate St. Hilaire to seize the individual honors. UVM's superior depth — Amy Bouchard (3rd), Anne Schiavone (5th), and Robin Synder (9th) — complimented the efforts of the Raymond-St. Hilaire tandem.

The squad looks forward now to a September 19th quadrangular meet at UConn with MIT and West Point. After two additional away contests, the Cats will finally come home for an October 7 battle with Dartmouth and Williams.

Rugby Leathermen Crush Concordia

By Dale Gates

The UVM Rugby team opened the fall season on a strong note by defeating Concordia University 34-6 Sunday afternoon at Archie Post Field.

Vermont controlled most of the scrums and allowed the backfield to pierce the Concordia defense on several occasions. Pete Chrisman spearheaded the UVM scoring attack with two goals. Mike Flanders, Jay Chipourous, Kyle Davis, and Charlie Latcher all added one try apiece. Pete Caltaldo and Jeff Small kicked successfully for a total of ten points and kept the contest out of reach of Concordia.

The Vermont Rugby Club returns with much experience and is looking for another undefeated fall season. Last Fall the Rugby Cats compiled a 7-1-0 record. Anyone interested in playing may still join the team. Practices are every Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday at 4:30 p.m. next to Gutterson.

UVM's next game will be this Saturday against Plattsburgh State at Archie Post Field. Starting time will be at 1:00 with Free Beer for all spectators.

Vermont Golfers Third In Yankees

By Steve Larose

Ted Olsen, captain of the University of Vermont golf team, tied with Bill Andrews for the Medalist honors in the Yankee Conference Golf Tournament held Monday in Stow, Massachusetts.

Olsen shot a 75 while the Vermont team placed third overall with a 479 score. URI placed first with a 476 and UConn placed second with 478.

Earlier this year Vermont defeated Plattsburgh 304–312 and ranked 2nd in the Cardinal Classic at Plattsburgh. Vermont's Golfers were defeated by McGill 310-311 in an eight team tournament. In that event Tim O'Connell won the medalist honors with a 73.

Coach Ed Donnelly remarked, "Art Carlson, last year's captain, didn't return to school, and we are hurting without him. We do have Tim O'Connell who is a promising golfer. In addition to him we have Mike Ducette, Hank Battias and Steve Tcolar who is the Vermont Amateur State Champion. Our strengths lie in our number of medalists and our team members possess a lot of skill. This is one of the better teams we've had at UVM. They're five hard-working Golfers who are determined. I'm content with their progress. After all, this was the best we've done in the Yankee Conference, just missing first by two strokes."

Next weekend the Vermont Golfers compete in the New England tournament

Greig Expects 'Different' Tennis Season

By Tom Cianciolo

University of Vermont tennis coach Hal Greig expects a "different season" this year, as the tennis squad lacks experience, a top caliber player and a powerful doubles combination.

According to coach Greig, the team's strength lies in the lower end of the lineup, namely the second and third doubles teams. Greig outlined his strategies by placing emphasis on "percentage tennis" and "defensive players who are cool under pressure."

Prior to the opening match against Maine on Saturday, the lineup was still undetermined due to the "closeness in abilities" of various players. The team has been trimmed to 17 players, many of whom appear equal in talent. Greig stated, "you can expect a rebuilding year due to the loss of many 1978 graduates."

New recruits include freshmen Eddie Bonfigli of Hinesburg Champlain Union Valley High; Kent Friedman of Half Hollow Hills High of N.Y.; John Goldsbury of St. Albans; Phillip Hurni of St. John's Prep. of Danbers High School; and Tristan Zarate of South Burlington.

Returners include Frank Babott of Burlington; Andy Deery of Marblehead, Mass; and Mark Compagnen of Lynnfield, Mass. Transfer Peter Follett of Burlington and the University of Maine also play for the Catamounts.

Vermont's home opener is against Boston University on Sept. 30th.

UVM Racketmen Crunch Maine

By Tom Cianciolo

The University of Vermont men's tennis team opened its 1978 fall campaign with a strong win over the University of Maine, 7-2, on Saturday in which UVM proved its strength by capturing five out of six singles matches and two out of three doubles.

Number one Frank Babbot ousted UMaine's Jim Tartre 6-4, 6-3 to spur on the Catamount victory. Kent Freidman kept the momentum going by clobbering Don Aldrich 6-2, 6-0 in the second singles match.

The Cats now go into the ECAC's at Trenton, New Jersey on Sept. 22-24 and will take on B.U. on Sept. 30th at 1 p.m. in Burlington.

Zareh Avakian-
Key To Vermont Soccer Offense

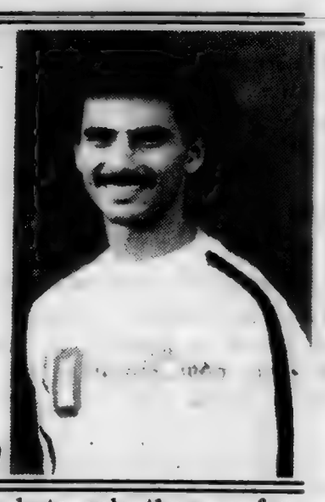
By Randy Briggs

The movements of his body and feet interact so well that opponents are left in confusion and disarray. His tremendous quickness and passing ability gives teammates excellent scoring chances. Unquestionably, Cat soccer star Zareh Avakian has a tremendous amount of talent.

With the loss of UVM's all-time scoring leaders John Koerner, Geoff Greig and Mark Stevenson, there is no question that Avakian will have to take a more active role in UVM's offense this year. "I feel that there is more pressure on me this year," said Avakian. "My game style is passing and opening up scoring chances for others."



As with most incoming freshmen playing varsity sports, Avakian had to make certain adjustments last year. "I had to get used to playing with and against players who had excellent skills," he recalls. "I also realized that I was not going to play every minute of every game."

According to soccer coach Paul Reinhardt, Avakian has adjusted quite well to the caliber of college soccer.

Avakian is very pleased that he chose Vermont as his place to play soccer. He was an All-American in his senior year at Bancroft School in Worcester, Mass. While there, Avakian developed into the type player that fits into Reinhardt's soccer plans of powerful defense backed by a talented offense.

Avakian scored only three goals in his freshman year, but one of them came in a contest that probably put Vermont in the NCAA playoffs. Before one of the largest crowds in Vermont soccer history, Avakian scored the only goal in a 1-0 victory over rival Dartmouth College. It was a clutch goal in a crucial game.

"My game style is passing and opening up scoring chances for others"
-Zareh Avakian

Although the soccer schedule lasts only three or four months, Avakian is hard at work throughout the year. "I normally run five miles in the morning and five miles in the afternoon during the off-season. I also do a lot of juggling with the ball."

Because of his tremendous ball handling skills and passing prowess, there is a very good chance that soccer All-Star Avakian may become a New England in only his second year. Besides winning, that is his only other personal goal.

When asked if this year's team has as much talent as last year's, Avakian answered, "We have as much talent and maybe more than last year's team. Our main problem will be depth. We have six or seven freshmen who are inexperienced. They are working very hard in practice and all they need is game experience. After the season progresses, we may develop the needed depth," concluded Avakian.

Vermont has an extremely tough schedule this year as they take on such soccer powers as Rhode Island, UConn, and Hartwick all on the road. Vermont's post-season playoff aspirations will go down the drain unless they do well against these teams. Avakian is very confident of Vermont's playoff chances. "We come up against tough teams at the end of the year and this will help us a lot," said Avakian. "By then we should have reached a certain level of consistency. But we will have to work very hard to beat them," he concluded.

Avakian is a very friendly individual who is pleased to see the direction that the soccer program is taking. "It was really great that we made national news last year (Vt. was ranked No. 5 in the nation at one point)," said Avakian. "It's going to be tougher this year. We lost some really talented players. This means we will just have to work that much harder to achieve last year's success," concluded Avakian.

Looking to the distant future, Avakian has professional soccer on his mind. "I feel that my chances are good as far as my skills are concerned. I will have to work even harder to make it physically," he concluded.

Many feel that Zareh Avakian could be the best soccer player that Vermont has ever had. He noted that Carl Christensen (now of the NASL's San Jose Earthquakes) has been the best college player he has seen. "Carl was so dedicated on improving himself," said Avakian. "I would like to step in right where he left off."

Athletic Facilities

Work On Patrick Gym Expansion Begins

By Hart Van Denburg

Much to the relief of the Athletic Department and the UVM students, the Vermont State Legislature gave its consent to begin a minimal expansion plan of the Patrick Gymnasium. Work was started recently on the foundations of the west side of the existing building.

One of the major arguments for expansion put forward by UVM to the state legislature was that the fewer changing facilities for women was not in compliance with Federal law. Section 86.41 of Title IX of the Education Amendments Act of 1972 states, "Provision of locker rooms, practice rooms and competitive facilities" must be equal for both men and women. Compliance is required by July 21, 1978, so the plans have gone through just in time.

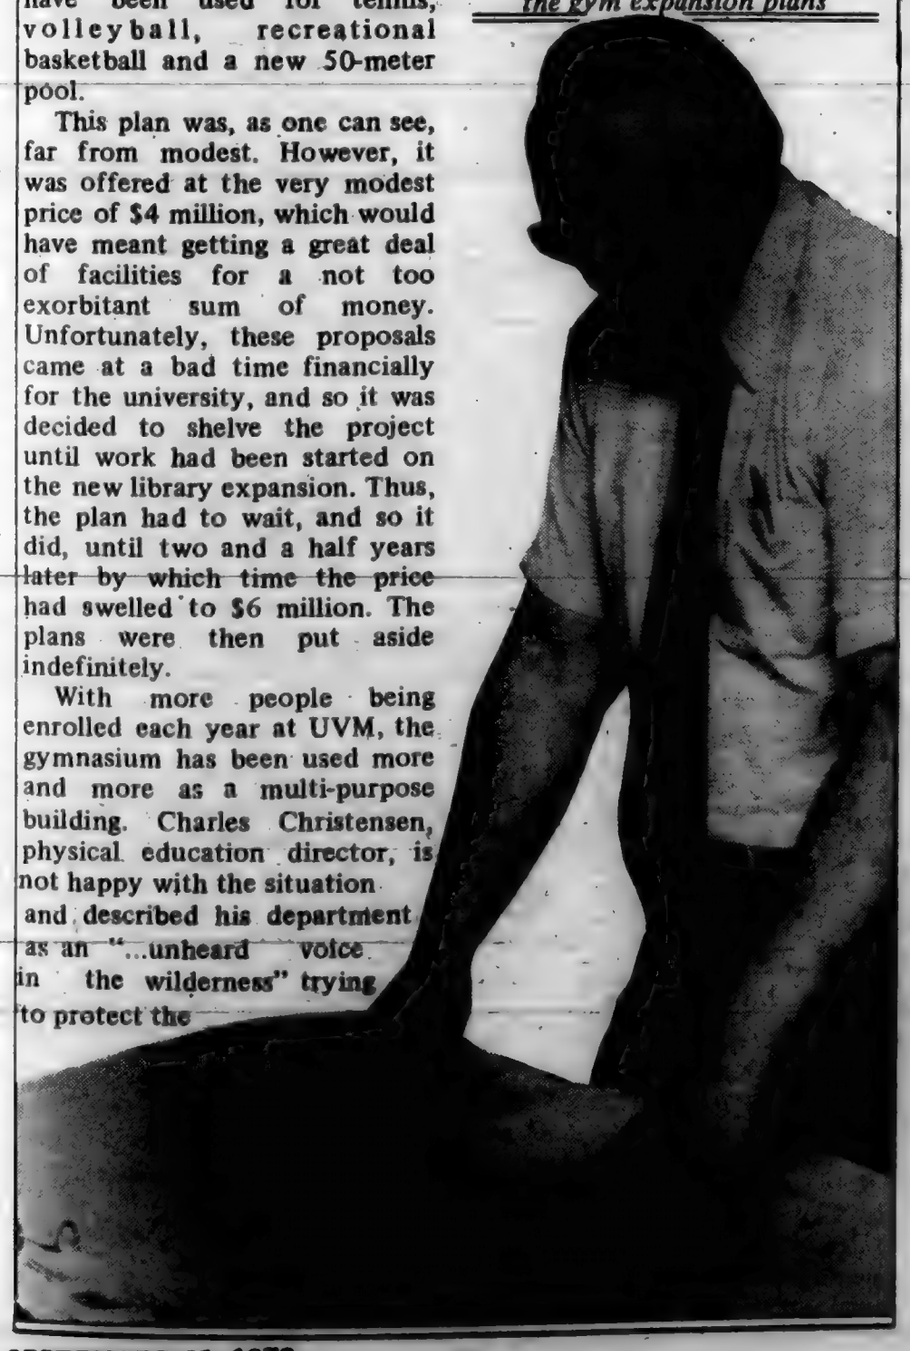
Presently, there are only 600 lockers available to women of which only 300 are assignable. This can be contrasted with the 2600 lockers for men of which 2000 are assignable.

With a current enrollment of roughly 10,000, other needs are apparent as well. The athletic department finds it difficult to cope with 90 people taking part in the basketball program when one-third of the basketball courts are used as a Gymnastics practice area (which has nowhere else to go). Office space is far too cramped to handle the work as efficiently as it could. The part-time staff have no office space available to them at all.

In 1970-71 the first of the two plans was put forward to the Board of Trustees. It called for two new buildings to be added to the complex. One of the buildings would have been for offices, the other would have been a student lounge and three classrooms. In addition to this there were also plans for 12 squash/handball courts, a new gymnastics area, and a covered multi-purpose area that could have been used for tennis, volleyball, recreational basketball and a new 50-meter pool.

This plan was, as one can see, far from modest. However, it was offered at the very modest price of $4 million, which would have meant getting a great deal of facilities for a not too exorbitant sum of money. Unfortunately, these proposals came at a bad time financially for the university, and so it was decided to shelve the project until work had been started on the new library expansion. Thus, the plan had to wait, and so it did, until two and a half years later by which time the price had swelled to $6 million. The plans were then put aside indefinitely.

With more people being enrolled each year at UVM, the gymnasium has been used more and more as a multi-purpose building. Charles Christensen, physical education director, is not happy with the situation and described his department as an "...unheard voice in the wilderness" trying to protect the students from the impingements created by the misuse of the building. On and off the gym is used for rock concerts, exams, conventions, and, of course, graduation.



Finally, the go-ahead was given by the Board of Trustees for a minimal expansion plan. In other words, they would support a plan if all it included were the absolute minimum needed by the athletic dept. for expansion. The athletic dept. developed a plan they considered to be in keeping with what the trustees had in mind. $2 million was requested for new women's lockers in order to comply with Federal law; a new training facility, new Phys. Ed. classrooms, a physiology and exercise laboratory, and a large covered recreational area that could house gymnastics and other recreational facilities were included.

The trustees seemed satisfied and submitted the proposal to the legislature, who then reduced the plan even further. They did support the lockers for women, the new training facility, the physiology lab, and the classrooms, but nothing more.

The new building will be a two-floor affair, with one floor below ground level. The bottom floor will provide 3000 new lockers for women, and as such they will be on the same level as the existing lockers in the original gym. The top floor will house the new training facility and team rooms, as well as the physiology or exercise lab.

Other alterations within the existing gym will include a switch around of the men's lockers so that the women won't have to walk through them to get to some of their facilities, and a renovation of the laundry so, as Christensen says, "...when you have an added 3000 people in the gym you can clean their towels for them!"

Women's Soccer Offensive Line Overpowers Lyndon

By Molly McRoberts

The University of Vermont women's soccer team's offensive line displayed superior passing ability in controlling the ball as they soundly defeated Lyndon State 4-0 in the home-opener last Saturday.

Sandi Wood, left fullback, showed much aggressiveness in clearing the ball out of goalie territory for UVM. On the other hand, Lyndon State had difficulty preventing Vermont's forward line from penetrating. Hilary Engisch, starting at right inner, played an outstanding game, scoring the first goal for UVM in the first half. Engisch assisted on another goal, and made several shots on goal throughout the game. Freshman Ellen Krimmel showed talented skills as she kicked continuous near goals and made two assists. Tori Ryder, left wing, was there to assist one goal before the end of the first half.

There was obviously good communication between UVM's players, as the passes were consistent, and control of the ball was maintained by our women during the whole game. Debby O'Conner and Meme Jacobs each chalked up points for UVM and Sheila Whalen pushed past a bewildered Lyndon State defense to score the final goal, making it 4-0.

Coach Mary Ellen Rathbone had just a week to select the squad and there were only two days to practice as a full team before meeting Lyndon State. The starting goalie, Anna Bartlett, out of the game because of injury, was replaced Saturday by freshman Rachel Lawrence. Because UVM dominated the field offensively, Lawrence did not see much of the ball at her end of the field. "But, Rachel has lots of guts," according to Coach Rathbone.

Coach Rathbone added, "the entire team has the potential to play a strong, hard game. When called upon, our defense did an excellent job in protecting the goal."

Coach Rathbone is working with a young, yet very talented team. "We've got a long way to go," she said, but it was said with a contented half-smile.

Ryder Punches Through Castleton Women's Soccer Defense

By Steve Larose

Tori Ryder punched through Castleton's rock-hard defense twice to lead the University of Vermont women's soccer team to a 4-0 victory Monday afternoon.

Ryder scored two goals while Hilary Engisch scored once and assisted once. Shelia Whalen also scored for the Cats.

Coach Mary Ellen Rathbone later remarked "it was a one-sided contest. Castleton had a lot of hustle but couldn't put it together. For us, things are coming together, considering we've only been together as a team for a short time. We're just beginning to function as a unit." Rachael Lawrence, Vermont's goalie, has been instrumental in both of the Cats' victories. Coach Rathbone continued, "We have a lot of potential strengths, but we have to get used to performing with each other."

With 23 players, each of whom play at least half the game, the women's soccer team has a lot of depth according to Coach Rathbone. As far as games ahead go, Brown University stands out as the challenge of the season.

Vermont now faces Lyndon State on Tuesday, Sept. 26th at Lyndon at 4 p.m. Vermont is now 2-0 in the season.

Field Hockey Goes 1-0-2 in Tourney

By Molly McRoberts

The University of Vermont Women's field hockey team defeated Potsdam State and tied McGill and Johnson State in a pre-season tournament at McGill University this past weekend.

The UVM women played on an astro-turf field, for the first time and during the first game of the three, UVM's players were hesitant to drive the ball with too much force. In the first match versus Potsdam State, lacking their usual aggressiveness, UVM defeated Potsdam 2-0. Jeanne Gaudru scored a goal on a high scoop during the first half. In the second half, Mary Ellen Chickering drove in the winning goal for UVM.

Johnson State came up next to try to stop UVM in a second game. The Cats failed to stop Johnson State's forward line, which scored on a goal coming off of two of their teammates' sticks in the first half. Vermont didn't score until the latter half of the game, when sophomore right wing Libby Sharp drove the ball in to tie the game 1-1. Since neither team could penetrate the strong opposing defenses the game ended in a tie.

In the third and final match for UVM McGill University displayed powerful skills, but failed to score and the game ended with no score.

Ali Cheered On By Barroom Crowd

By Rob Smith

It seems that in the world of professional sports these days, all we hear about is free agent drafts, lawyers advising big money players to hold out for more of the green stuff, and how the current trend in football is to sign eleven Raquel Welches who can shake their cheeks as well as Tony Dorsett shakes off linebackers. Thus, it was with a sigh of relief that I knew last Friday that I could watch a classic sporting event that brings out the best in barroom rowdiness – another Muhammed Ali title fight.

Visiting a friend in Saratoga, I headed for a bar called "The Hub" which I was told would be as good a place as any to watch the fight. I wasn't to be disappointed either as the big screen, 35 cent drafts and a fight-hungry crowd set the mood just right. I knew I was in for a great evening.

Being a Red Sox fan, I wasn't too enthralled with watching the Yankees demolish the Red Sox once again for pre-fight entertainment, but even these Saratoga Yankee fans weren't too interested with the game tonight – for it was Ali they came to see.

As Howard Cosell enthusiastically moderated a brief history of Ali's boxing career, the barroom crowd rushed to the screen, with the intensity that later Ali would provide for Leon Spinks in the form of a taunting left jab. That questioning spirit of whether a 36-year-old veteran could defeat a 25-year-old fledgling had filled the room. Ali's final test – his judgment day had arrived.

As Round One began, Spinks bobbing and weaving, Ali dancing on his toes, it appeared that young Leon was set to end the fight quickly. Being the aggressor, he landed two solid rights on Ali's chin as Muhammed missed badly with both lefts and rights. It seemed that maybe the man who used to "float like a butterfly and sting like a bee" had lost his sting.

However, in rounds 2 and 3 the tempo of the fight changed. Ali, keeping the smaller Spinks at bay with his long, left lead, forced Spinks to miss badly at times. Though Spinks was not allowing himself to be the easy, straight-up target he was in February, Ali was scoring with intelligently-placed left jabs. Although Spinks continued to be the aggressor, his limited experience showed in his wild misses. Ali, using no rope-a-dope, appeared to be picking his openings well and piling up points.

In Round 4, Spinks once again took charge. Moving Ali into the corners, he scored hard with a series of lefts and rights. Early in Round 5, Spinks aggressively attacked the old warrior and scored heavily with two hard rights. Just as the momentum appeared to be swaying back to Spinks, Ali unleashed a hard left jab, followed by a blistering right uppercut. As the partisan Ali crowd went crazy I couldn't help but notice the tremendous intensity on Ali's face. He appeared to want his crown back badly and was willing to give everything he had in him for it.

In Round 11, Leon Spinks went for it all. Charging at the opening bell, Spinks scored with two rights, then following on an Ali miss, he forced Ali to the ropes with a devastating right jab. Spinks was continuing his wild, miscalculated punching, but for the first time since Round 1, he was scoring effectively. However, as Round 11 came to a close, Ali was still standing. Leon could not put away the man who wanted to be the first boxer ever to win the heavyweight crown three times. Rounds 12 and 13 found Spinks tired and Ali still pursuing with his piercing left jab and occasional combinations. Spinks, after a great eleventh round, looked confusedly upon the reborn Ali. It was obvious that only a Spinks knockout could save his title now.

Rounds 14 and 15 demonstrated the great class of Muhammed Ali. Knowing that he had taken enough rounds to win a decision, he continued to box, but very tentatively. In both rounds, Spinks fought gamely to send Ali to the canvas with a series of right jabs, but Ali, still on his toes, kept the young champ away with his long-reaching lefts. Some of Ali's sting was gone, but for the most part, his accuracy and quickness were still there.

As the bell sounded ending the fight, the barroom went into a frenzy chanting "Ali! Ali! Ali!..." We all knew that

Will Spinks Fight Again?

Only two hours after Muhannad Ali regained the heavyweight boxing championship of the world last Friday night, Leon Spinks' promoter, Bob Arum, commented, "I don't think Leon will fight again." He seemed relieved at the thought, glad to be rid of Spinks and the whole mess concerning Spinks and his legal problems. Arum isn't the only important figure disenchanted by Spinks' showing. George Benton, said to be the world's best teacher of young fighters, left Spinks' corner and walked out on the fight in the fifth round.

Plunkett Joins Oakland

Jim Plunkett has joined the Oakland Raiders this year as their third string quarterback after disappointing seasons with the New England Patriots and the San Francisco 49ers. Plunkett will man the squad behind starter Ken Stabler and Reserve Dave Humm. No salary figures were presented, but Plunkett's pay with the 49ers has been reported to have ranged up to $150,000.

Lauenstein Wins Casco Bay marathon

Kurt Lauenstein of Essex Junction covered the 26 miles, 385 yards from Portland, Maine to Yarmouth and back again in two hours, 27 minutes to win the inaugural Casco Bay Marathon Race held last Sunday. Lauenstein, a surgical intern at the University of Vermont, moved up from well in the back of the pack to take the contest. Bruce Ereme, a University of Maine undergraduate, finished in second place.

Redskins Remain Unbeaten

Rookie Tony Green returned a 99 yard kickoff to spur the Washington Redskins to their third straight victory in as yet an unblemished season. The Redskins went on to score 28 points against their N.C. East contenders, the St. Louis Cardinals. The Cardinals took a 3-0 lead early in the first quarter but were unable to register more than 10 points for the afternoon. Redskin quarterback Joe Theisman connected for two touchdown passes while John Riggins and Mike Thomas rushed for 108 and 78 yards respectively.

Ali Regains Title

Muhammed Ali became the first man to gain the heavyweight boxing championship of the world for the third time last Friday night by outboxing former world champ Leon Spinks. Although the World Boxing Council refuses to recognize the fight as a championship bout, Ali considers himself world champ, even over WBC's "paper champion" Larry Holmes.

Having said he would retire after recapturing the title, Ali would not commit himself after the bout. The judges voted unanimously in favor of Ali, scoring the rounds 10-4-1, 10-4-1, 12-3-0.

"Thank God it's over," Ali said, once he had begun resting in his dressing room, "I don't think I'll ever fight again," he added, "but I don't want to announce my retirement right away."

Ernie DiGregorio Retires

Ernie DiGregorio announced his retirement from the Boston Celtics Saturday, stating that he didn't feel like he fit into the Celtics' plans for the 1978-79 season. He added that he would "rather sit at home than sit on the bench all season." Red Auerbach admitted DiGregario would probably not play much, but he stressed that the decision to quit was DiGregario's, not the Celtics'.

Allison Takes Delaware 500

Clocking an average speed of 119.363 mph, Bobby Allison ended his seventh winless month by cruising to victory in the Delaware 500 Stock Car Race held last Sunday. Allison, driving a Ford Thunderbird, recorded the 49th win of his career as he crossed the finish line 19.7 seconds ahead of season leader Cale Yarborough.

Yarborough, driving an Oldsmobile, set a track record of 120 mph but was plagued by tire troubles near the end of the race. Allison spent three days in the hospital earlier that week undergoing blood tests but seemed in excellent form on Sunday. Buddy Baker apparently ran out of gas at the finish but coasted over to take third place.

No More Rope-A-Dope For Ali

boxing's greatest public relations man had won.

As I strolled out of the "Hub," my beer stained notebook in my back pocket, I thought about the professionalism that Ali had shown. Though the fight served to prove that Leon Spinks is not all that the press made him out to be back in February (though poised, he is technically an amateur in style). Once again Muhammed Ali had shown that he can win when the money's there and the whole world knew it was his last shot. He fought a technically superb fight, didn't joke around with his boring rope-a-dope, and, best of all, he won. The legend lives on!

RANDOM NOTES

Baha'is of Burlington

The Baha'is of Burlington sponsor a meeting open to the public, featuring Soo Fouts, the first Asian American selected to serve on the Baha'i administrative body (National). Mrs. Fouts will give an introduction on the Baha'i Faith. Refreshments and conversation will follow. 216 Commons Living-Learning Center. September 23, Saturday, 8–10:30 p.m.

Do You Need?

Need a German band to play for a beer party?

Need a pep band to cheer you on at your dorm soccer game?

Need a jazz band to play for your dorm formal?

Want to hear an outdoor band concert on a lazy Sunday afternoon?

If you answer yes to any of these questions, then the UVM Band is ready and willing to accommodate your needs.

Keep an eye open for our upcoming outdoor concert, and if you are interested in any of our other performing groups, call the Music Department at x3040 for details.

Frisbee

Frisbee Club – Ultimate and Freestyle. If interested, call Ernie at 864-4370.

We Want You!

Underclassmen desperately needed for the 1979 Ariel, University of Vermont Yearbook. Presently 90% of the staff is seniors leaving virtually no one to run the book for next year!

If you want a quality book for next year and the years after, join now.

Meetings are every Wednesday at 7 p.m. in the Ariel office, lower Billings Center, x2056. If interested and unable to make the meeting, contact John Puma, Box 429 L/L Ctr., x4259.

Song Swap

Picking and song swap every Saturday 1:00 – 4:00 p.m. at the Presto Music Co., Guptil Road, Waterbury, Vt. All acoustic instruments welcome. For information call 864-0767. Free, no admission.

Vermont ETV Plans Open House

Vermont ETV is holding its first Open House Sunday, September 24, from 2-6 p.m. at the ETV studios in Fort Ethan Allen, Winooski. Manager Jake Dunlop says "We're planning an afternoon that's fun as well as informative." Visitors can not only see how a TV program is made but even be in one, meet the staff, say hello to ETV's Big Bird, and tour the station. Information booths will be set up with background material on TV for Learning (classroom and adult learning opportunities) volunteer activities, and other ETV services. Taped previews of new fall programs will be screened.

The highlight of the look around ETV is sure to be the new satellite receiving dish, installed earlier this month, and soon to be operational. It will link Vermont with the PBS satellite system for transmitting programs, a first for American broadcasting.

Does Phys Ed Turn You On?

Does judo, raquetball, slimnastics, roller skating, fencing, badminton, conditioning, golf, archery, gymnastics, yoga, or jogging turn you on? The University of Vermont's Physical Education, Health and Recreation Department presents the Saturday Morning Lab School. The school provides an opportunity for individuals to participate in a wide variety of athletic activities.

The school is offering three programs. These are an Elementary Program, a Secondary Program, and an Adaptive Program. The Elementary Program is under the direction of Mr. Tom Dunkley and enrolls youngsters aged 5–9 years. The Secondary Program is supervised by Dr. Bob Gobin and enrolls teenagers, adults, and senior citizens. The Adaptive Program under the leadership of Dr. Beverly Nichols is designed to serve the special needs of the disabled in our communities, ages 5 to adult.

Applications are being accepted now on a first come first serve basis. You can pick yours up at Room 208 Patrick Gymnasium or phone 656-4456 to have forms mailed to you. The fee is only $3.00 per family. Please return application with the required fee.

The Secondary and Elementary Programs will be run on Saturdays, September 30 through November 18 from 9:00–11:00. The Adaptive Program will start October 7. Hope to see you there!

Attention Volleyball Players

If anyone is interested in being on a men's USVBA volleyball team, there will be a semi-organizational and practice session at Trinity College from 6:30 – 8:30 on Friday evening, September 22. Also, if there are any people out there who want to get the UVM club team together again, let me hear from you. For further information on either of the above teams, please contact Michael Kirick at 862-1867.

Basketball Tryouts

There will be an opening meeting for the women's basketball team, on September 25 at 7:00 p.m. The meeting will be held at the 118 Patrick Gym. If you are planning to try out, physicals must be taken prior to the meeting. (Forms may be obtained in Mrs. Brunswick's office in the Patrick Gym.) Tryouts for the team will commence October 23, and the prerequisite for the tryouts is a timed mile run. All girls are encouraged to start conditioning as soon as possible. Patrick Gym is presently open for use from 3 p.m. to 8 p.m. daily. If you have any further questions, please contact Miss Condon (x-3240).

WOMEN. YOU'RE EQUAL IN THE AIR FORCE.

Women start out on the same footing as men in Air Force ROTC. Women wear the same insignia and hold the same cadet positions in AFROTC, just as they do later on as Air Force officers.

And the same AFROTC scholarship can be yours as a woman. If you qualify, you can have your tuition, book costs and lab fees paid by the Air Force, and receive $100 a month for other expenses. It helps free you to concentrate on your education. And that's important.

As an Air Force officer, you'll be expected to use your training and education, and be a leader managing people and complex systems. You'll be handed executive responsibility starting with your first job.

It's a great way to be equal, and a great way to serve your country. Check into the AFROTC program at your campus. Be sure to ask about AFROTC scholarships — you may be helping yourself earn an exciting new lifestyle.

Merchants Compete For the Student Dollar

UVM Students Will Spend $11 Million This Year To Help Keep Burlington Businesses Afloat

By Scott Sartorius

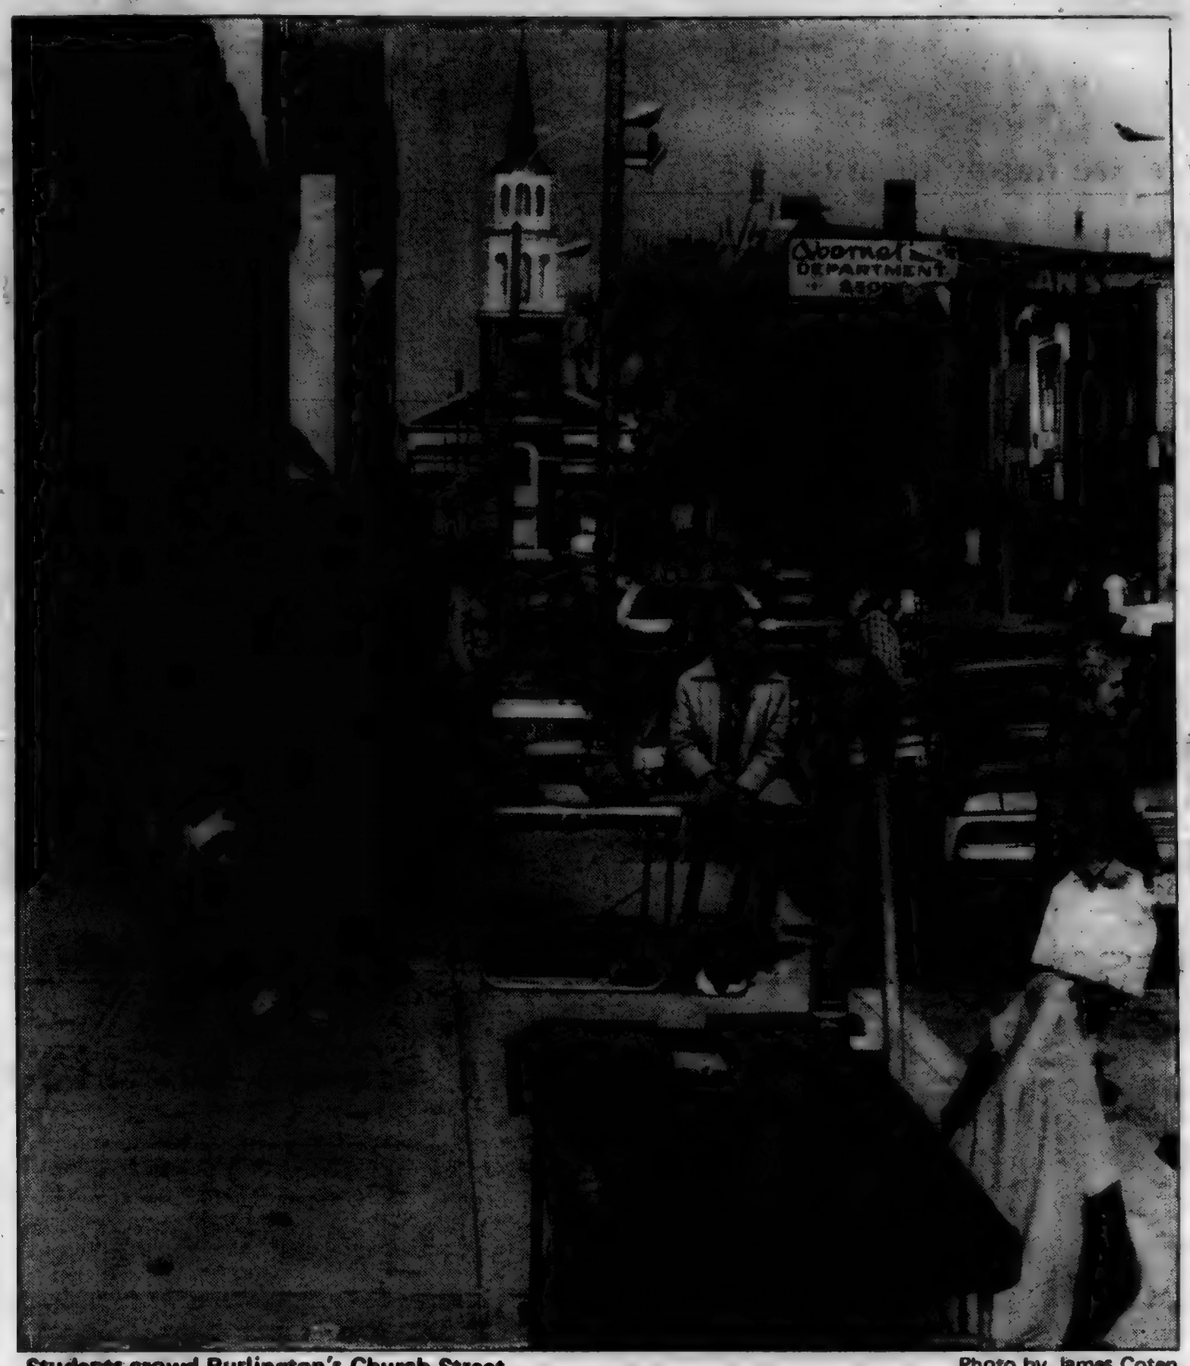
The race for the student dollar at the beginning of each school year is a frantic one. Merchants, realizing that every new student will be confronted with unfurnished rooms and apartments, incomplete wardrobes, and an unquenchable thirst for the nightlife, compete for a piece of the pie.

Not all businesses in the Burlington area cater to students, however, but because Burlington's school year student population is well over 10,000, many retailers have sought ways to tap a student's wallet. At the beginning of each September, evidence of this competition is readily seen in the thickness of normally skinny publications.

That is, nearly every periodical in the area from the Vermont Scene to the Burlington Free Press to the Vermont Summer Cynic has a proverbial "Back to School Issue." And each of these publications is fat with large display ads offering give-aways, student discounts and specials, and many proclaim openly: "Welcome Back, Students!"

An informal survey of Church Street stores revealed pretty much what one would expect in terms of responses to the question: How do students affect your business?

Retailers selling goods a student might be likely to buy, such as records, certain types of clothing, plants, and, of course, food and drink all readily agreed that students have an initial or long-lasting effect on their store's income.



Charles Amblo, president of Bailey's record store, said, "It's like having a whole new city move in." He said his volume picks up in September and drops off again in the Spring. Even though Bailey's does not offer any form of student discount in the first weeks of September, Amblo said his student business is good because, "This is a natural place for students to come."

Janis Marcotte, of Claussen's on Church Street, said that business in the store is "heavier for the first month they (the students) are here." Claussen's ran an early September plant sale for everyone, not just students, that "definitely improved business."

Ms. Marcotte attributed the 15 to 20 percent increase in business largely to students who want "to fill dorm rooms."

Magram's, a department store that sells more than just items a student might be apt to buy, still registers an increase in business when the students come back, according to Magram's cosmetics manager, Mary DeVost. Although she had no specific figures, Ms. DeVost said, "Overall volume seems to increase when the students return."

One of the things that a student must deal with upon arriving in Burlington for the first time is a bank. The student generally opens some form of checking account, and in order to lure the potential depositors to their lobbies, some banks offer frisbees, pencil holders, a free book of checks or a "circus tent" atmosphere. More importantly, though, the banks each have some variety of types of accounts that may be opened.

Of the banks in Burlington, the one that seems to be the most used by the students is the Chittenden Bank. Chittenden gives away a flying saucer with each new "Thrifticheck" account opened, and encourages student business by setting up a tent at their Williston Road branch near the Marsh-Austin-Tupper complex in early September.

John T. Carpenter, senior vice-president for marketing and community affairs at Chittenden, estimated that the campus-side office opened about 500 accounts during the first two weeks in September. He said, "I'm not sure all the banks feel as strongly as we do about student accounts."

Carpenter added that one of the main reasons Chittenden does so well in obtaining student accounts is the proximity of the Williston Road branch to the campus: "We happen to be the closest bank to your campus."

Carpenter also mentioned the free flying saucer "that I'm sure you've seen around" as another possible reason for Chittenden's success with students.

The attractive thing about the Burlington Savings Bank as far as students are concerned, according to Ellie Spence, vice president for customer service, is the Automatic Teller Machine (ATM). The ATMs, positioned outside various branches around town, allow a "Heritage" account card holder to obtain amounts of money 24 hours a day.

"We are pleased with the student accounts," Ms. Spence said. "Students are really quite good."

As is the case with all of the other banks, the Burlington Savings Bank does not segregate student accounts, but Ms. Spence said that about 1,000 new accounts were opened around the time the students returned. She cautioned that not all of those accounts were opened by students, though.

She said the Burlington Savings Bank "didn't advertise too heavily" in trying to obtain student accounts, even though the bank did have "demonstration areas" set up on campus for two days. She said most of the "advertising" was done by "word of mouth."

She also noted the number of student accounts obtained by the Chittenden Bank, saying: "The Chittenden is very active in it (the student market). They're very close to campus."

Joel Molnar, a member of the new accounts department at the Howard Bank, said that, for the most part, students "just go to the first one (bank) they see." He added however, that "this year I saw a lot of shopping around for banks."

Still, Molnar maintained that most banks are chosen as "a convenient thing." He said The Howard does not get a great number of accounts from UVM students, but added, "You go over to St. Mike's, and the majority of them are going to The Howard."

Molnar said that more than 250 student accounts were opened at The Howard's main office in Burlington in the first couple of days after the students came back. "We give them their first book of checks free (with the "Handi" account). This year we also gave them a pencil holder," Molnar added in reference to new accounts.

Molnar said The Howard had a solicitation of students before they arrived in September to open their accounts by mail "because of such an influx in early September." But Molnar also said, "I wouldn't say there's any real competition for the student account."

The Merchants' Bank seems to be less involved in procuring student accounts than those already mentioned even though their main office on Church Street was "quite busy" with students during the first week in September, according to Lea Coggio of the bank's new accounts department.

She said the Merchants' "didn't push" to obtain student accounts, "at least, not that I know of."

In the Vermont Summer Cynic's "Back to School Issue," The Howard, The Chittenden and Burlington Savings all purchased display space, while The Merchants' didn't, thus supporting Ms. Coggio's claim.

But just how much money do the students really spend?

A survey completed last year by St. Michael's College business and economics instructor John N. Carvellas answered that question, at least as far as St. Mike's students are concerned. The study concluded that for the 1976-77 school year, the average St. Mike's student spent $1,268 and that all students in the college combined spent $2,071,284. The categories surveyed were: food, beverages & tobacco, housing, furnishing, entertainment and recreation, clothing and accessories, transportation, medical care, reading and education and other. The total figure was obtained by totalling all of the categories.

Ninety-five percent of all undergraduates attending St. Mikes live outside the Chittenden County area, and thus, Carvellas said that an attempt to correlate his figures to UVM students might yield a difference as far as in-state students are concerned.

Nevertheless, he said that because most St. Mike's

Over 3,000 High School Students Expected to Attend College Fair

Over 140 colleges and universities will send admission officers to the University of Vermont Oct. 3 for the 3rd annual College Fair, to be hosted this year by UVM at the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium.

The event, scheduled for two sessions, will attract over 3,000 students and/or parents, with most of the students expected for the morning session, 9–1:30 p.m.

Following a buffet for all the counselors at the Marble Island Resort Club, the Fair will open again in the evening from 6:30 – 8:30 p.m. "Both sessions are open to students and parents, but past experience has shown us that the morning session has seen the largest audience," says Richard E. Steele, director of admissions at UVM. Dr. Steele recommended that students and parents hoping for "more extensive questioning of the visiting representatives" plan on attending the two-hour evening session.

According to the UVM Admissions office, several schools will be busing students to UVM for the morning session.

The program, begun three years ago, has afforded the Vermont high school youngsters – primarily juniors and seniors – opportunities that the city youngster has had for many years. The concept of the College Fair has been accepted throughout the New England area, with over 20 different locations using the college-fair idea this fall.

What makes Vermont's program unique is a pre-Fair brochure that is mailed to all of the guidance departments in the state. The pre-Fair guide gives the student the opportunity to narrow down his college choices, so that by the time he arrives for the College Fair, he or she has a very good idea what schools are the most appealing.

Although the College Fair is primarily designed for high school students now in their junior or senior years, it is open to all age groups.

In addition to the admission personnel from the various colleges and universities, there will also be representatives from other organizations, including the Vermont Student Assistance Corporation (VASC) and the American College Testing Program.

Although the College Fair at UVM is the major showcase for the visiting schools, there will also be a college night, Oct. 4, at Mt. Anthony Union High School in Bennington, with many of the same admission officers in attendance. The Oct. 4 session is for those who are unable to attend the Burlington session. The evening session at Mt. Anthony is scheduled for 6:30 p.m.

UVM hosted the first Vermont College Fair in 1976, while St. Michael's held the event last fall.

Assault – What's Being Done a About It ?

By Eric Kilburn

Violence returned to the University of Vermont campus last week when two women were assaulted in separate incidents, one in Converse and the other on College Street.

Although the attacks were "not really sexual" according to UVM chief of security Scott-Smith, efforts are being made to reduce the chances of violence occurring in the future.

Following the series of rapes and sexual assaults on the campus during 1977, security and residential life personnel promoted an alternative route from the library to Redstone campus. Students were urged to walk in groups of two and to take the well-lit highly-traveled walkways via the Living/Learning Center and Patrick Gym. In addition, Chief Scott-Smith stressed the importance of walking in groups of two or more, because "in past assaults, the lighting factor was not as important a determining factor as isolation."

In the past, students have carried whistles and pooled walkers with similar destinations in the lobby of Bailey library. Chief Scott-Smith expressed hope this would continue and added, "If anyone is too nervous to walk alone, they really should assert themselves and ask someone to walk with them." Scott-Smith further said, "Any suspicious person wandering around dorms should be reported to security immediately."

UVM recently produced a professional-quality 27 minute videotape program on sexual assault. The program is being shown to men and women around campus (available through Coreen Richards, in the Dean of Students Office).

In expressing the hope that many students will have a chance to see the videotape, Chief Scott-Smith said "Our biggest problem is getting to the students who say it can't happen to me."

Buying

out-of-state students come from "relatively affluent" backgrounds, "the spending patterns are most likely the same for out-of-staters (in comparison to UVM)."

During the 1976-77 school year, UVM had about 7,580 undergraduates enrolled. Taking Carvellas' $1,268 figure, a ball park estimate as to the amount spent by UVM undergraduates that year would be $9,611,440.

Using a seven percent inflation rate, the latter amount of money adjusted to the 1978-79 school year is $11,004,136, assuming the number of students has stayed the same.

Because of the different comparative percentages of in-state versus out-of-state students for the two colleges, the $11 million figure may be off, but it does represent the fact that there is a great deal of money to be made by tapping the UVM student population.

And it is this student population, like it or not, that helps to keep many Burlington businesses financially viable.

New Central Heating System to Cost more than $4 Million

By S. Bailey

A new central heating system costing more than $4 million will be installed next summer to replace the present outdated system and prepare the University of Vermont for potential changes in future heating methods, said Ray Lavigne, head of the heating utilities for UVM.

Three new boilers will be added to the two already in use to heat the entire campus from boilers located behind the Royall Tyler Theatre. The change will occur within the year to replace the five heating plants that are now in the dormitories. These range in age from five to twenty-two years old and "definitely need replacing" according to Lavigne.

The new system will be steam heating the campus north of Main Street, which services the dormitories. It will be an expansion of the system already in use for all the buildings south of Main Street, except for Waterman, the DeGoesbriand Unit of the Medical Center, and Dewey Hall. It consists of a centrally located boiler unit to heat the water which will then be piped to the dormitories and converted into steam to heat the rooms. The cooled water will then be piped back to the central unit for another cycle.

The university chose to install a new system rather than merely replace the old boilers because "we're embarking on a long-range energy plan for the university," according to Lavigne.

"We see potential problems both with the source and the cost of natural gas and fuel oil in the next ten, fifteen, or twenty years" he explained. "This system allows us flexibility to adapt to whatever we may need to do."

In addition, the new system is the least expensive option for the university. An engineering feasibility study in 1976-77 estimated the cost of simply replacing the old boilers as needed (approximately every fifteen years) would cost, at 1977 prices plus 8 percent inflation, $7 million dollars over the next 35-40 years. The central heating system, involving two new boilers and all the piping would cost $4,075,000 over the same period of time.

Lavigne, who is also a member of the Burlington Electric Dept. Advisory Board, said that first year savings alone would be approximately $180,000. "That, plus the fact that we get over 80 percent efficiency with the central system as opposed to 65-70 percent with the old boilers was a large factor," said Lavigne. The new system is also expected to save up to 300,000 gallons of fuel oil.

After the Board of Trustees approved the central heating system, the university applied through the Housing and Urban Development (HUD) 1978 series for a College Housing Loan of $4,075,000. Last July they were granted the HUD award at three percent interest for 40 years. The university plans to pay it back in twenty years through increases in the residence hall rates. "By paying it off in a shorter time, we allow ourselves the funds and the time to begin to deal with alternative heat sources as we need to, as well as have money to keep up the new system," explained Lavigne.

"The University plans to pay it back in twenty years through increases in residence hall rates . . . total cost to the students will be $27 per year."

The total cost to the student will be $27 per year. It would be higher, but the Board of Trustees has already begun allocating money from this year's fees.

The HUD award will only pay for two of the three proposed boilers. The third one will be used mainly as a back-up in case any of the residential boilers fail. "There's no way that we won't be able to keep the dorms heated in any circumstances," assured Lavigne. The third one will be paid for through a state capital appropriation fund provided to UVM.

"What we will have is a centrally located system to distribute heat of almost any kind," said Lavigne. "We will be able to burn natural gas, or one of two kinds of fuel oil — no. 2 or no. 6. This allows us to use whatever is most abundant and cheapest in a given period."

"In the years to come, we may find that other forms of energy are more appropriate. We have the potential to link up with the Burlington Electrical Development (BED) to use their waste heat from either the proposed wood-burning plant or the proposed solid waste burning plant. We probably wouldn't get enough energy from the waste-disposal process, but we would from the wood-burning program. It is a viable alternative that we have to examine closely," Lavigne continued.

The work will be started sometime in January or February as a construction company prepares the boiler site for the contractor — as yet unchosen — to work. The contracting bid will be awarded sometime in December. Some of the interior work within the dorms may be done next spring, but it shouldn't interfere with the life of the students. "We're on an extremely critical timetable," said Lavigne. "We have to work around the university programs of the spring and summer, but once we rip out the existing boilers, we have to get the job completed by next November. Otherwise the dorms won't be habitable."

"Central heating is not that new an idea," said Lavigne. "In Europe, it's what they've used for years. It is new here, but we predict success with it. Not only will it save money, but it allows us to start looking now for other energy sources and be able to adapt them to our system. We have flexibility and that's important."

Overacceptance = Overcrowding at UVM

By John Letteri

The principal cause behind the shortage of housing in residence halls this semester is caused by policy employed by the University of Vermont each year of overaccepting incoming freshmen.

Every year, college admissions offices must anticipate the number of accepted applicants who will choose other schools. In UVM's case, Richard Steele, director of admissions, said the university can expect approximately 70% of all Vermonters accepted at UVM to come to this school, while the percentage of out-of-state acceptees who attend UVM varies between 34-40%. The in-state percentage is relatively constant, and accurate estimates of incoming in-state freshmen can be made. However, out-of-state percentages shift from year to year, and estimates are sometimes low.

This year, approximately 40% of the out-of-state acceptees came to UVM. This inflated the number of incoming freshmen to 1,920 or about 50 more than Steele had predicted.

The reasons why out-of-state

Wiesel Decries Nazi Extremism

By Stacey Cushner

Elie Wiesel, internationally known author and survivor of the Auschwitz and Buchewald Nazi concentration camps, delivered an impassioned speech on the horrors of Nazi extremism at Ira Allen Chapel on Sunday night.

Wiesel, opening speaker for the Vermont Seminar Holocaust series, said he does not know "how to describe children burning, killers laughing, and death with its thousands and thousands." He said it took him ten years before he could write a story. "Many of the victims felt we couldn't write about it. No one will ever know what it feels like."

Wiesel doesn't think a single person can precisely deal with the past, present and future of the holocaust. He explained he is "not a historian, philosopher, rabbi or theologian," but simply one man trying to communicate his personal experience. "If you listen to a witness, then you are a witness," he said. "The holocaust was a unique event, and never in the history of mankind has there been such a tragedy. It affected not only the victims and killers, but everyone else as well."

For the future, Wiesel said he likes to think something like the holocaust will never happen again. He believes there will be no holocaust if the world remembers the previous one; yet he does not rule out the possibility of a nuclear holocaust. "Who knows?"

Concluding his speech, Professor Wiesel asked his audience, "Is sadness the answer? There are no theories, no generalizations, just tears. Mankind must realize the opposite of love is not hate, it's indifference. Mankind must find out how to fight indifference."

Wiesel's most noted works are Night, Dawn, The Jews of Silence, The Accident, and Souls of Fire. He is the only survivor of a family of six, having spent several years in concentration camps. He has been the recipient of many literary awards and holds numerous honorary doctorates. Today, he maintains a U.S. citizenship and is a professor at Boston University.

Democracy Depends On Rural America

By Mary Dixon

Saving rural America is tantamount to saving the U.S. democratic system, contended Richard Margolis, noted journalist and editor of Rural America magazine.

Speaking to open the Rural Options in Urban America series at the University of Vermont, Margolis said the growth of the urban segment of the U.S. and the resulting suburbs creates a population where people are constantly moving in and out of places. He contended "there can be no democracy with transiency." He believes rural situations offer more stable setting for the workings of democracy because of the participating citizens, the stability of place and daily contact with friends and enemies.

Margolis did not advocate the demise of cities nor the return to rural America of the 19th century. But he believes a "redistribution of power downward" to include more people would allow democracy to survive and would enable the American people to "collectively shape" their future.

This change cannot come without organization, Margolis said. The cumulative effect of numerous "little acts" will result in a re-emphasis of the person and the rural community on America. He feels energy and input into the democratic process is "dwindling" under control we "can't see or understand."

These unseen forces have been forcing ruralists to the cities for a number of years. When speaking of Vermont, however, he said "Vermonters have not bitten the apple" leading to suburbanization and uncontrolled development. He called the notion that only large farms can exist in Vermont a "myth." The always growing agribusiness should work for the people and their prosperity and not for the corporates and their prosperity. Presently, 13,000

Rubin, Kunstler, Brown To Speak At UVM

The Student Association Speakers Bureau will be presenting three distinguished orators during the week of Sept. 28–Oct. 5.

Jerry Rubin, leader of the anti-war movement in the 60's, will speak Sept. 28 at 8:00 p.m. at Ira Allen Chapel. Rubin has been involved in such things as the planning of and march on the Pentagon in 1967, the disruptions of the House Un-American Activities Committee hearings in 1966, and the planning and rioting in Chicago in 1968.

On Thursday, Oct. 5 at 8:00 p.m. in Ira Allen Chapel, attorney William Kunstler will address the subject of "Law and the Outlaw."

In a star-spangled law career spanning three decades, Kunstler has championed the cause of such notables as Martin Luther King, Daniel and Philip Berrigan, the Chicago 7, Julian Bond, the inmates at Attica prison, H. Rap Brown, and American Indian Movement leader Russell Means, to name a few.

Thomas Brown, the chairman of the history department at the University of Massachusetts, will speak on the "American Irish Experience: The Uncreated Conscience" to open the Irish Experience Seminars on Oct. 4 at 8:00 p.m. in Room 103 in the Rowell Building.

Hydro Potential in Vermont Overestimated Says Saudek

By John Letteri

Public Service Board Chairman Richard Saudek blamed competing interests and parochial infighting among potential developers as major obstacles to the development of regional hydro-electric power in Vermont.

Saudek said a "meandering" federal energy policy has provided a number of small grants to would-be developers of hydro power, which raise their hopes for building plants without any guarantees for funding the whole project. A lengthy bureaucratic process when applying for federal funds can also result in a "duplication of efforts" said Saudek.

Adding urgency to the problem is the "uncertainly" of Vermont's future energy supply, and inaccurate studies projecting Vermont hydro power to "preposterous" levels. For example, Saudek said an Army Corps of Engineers study projecting a possible 145 megawatt hydro plant on the West River failed to mention that a large portion of the town of West Dummerston would have to be flooded for the project.

Saudek said the solution to these problems lay in "changing our expectations" from a "virtually limitless source" of hydro power to considering the use of smaller power plants to help lower costs at certain peak times of the year. He said Vermont utilities should also "take some chances" when developing energy or face being stuck "dead in the water" while out-of-state utilities take the initiative.

Before developing a hydro plant, utilities must consider the development cost, the environmental impact and the possible aesthetic effects the plant might have on the river and surrounding area. If any sewage treatment plants exist, stream flow studies have to be done to insure adequate stream flow for proper sewage treatment.

Fifty small hydro plants already exist in Vermont, and Saudek said these could be used to generate power during peak hours, saving ratepayers from using more expensive out-of-state peak power. Since Vermont already depends on the Power Authority of the State of New York and the St. Lawrence river power projects for more than a third of its power, Saudek said developing a "smaller use" strategy would be advantageous.

In response to a question from the audience, Saudek said the possibility of creating a semi-public power authority in Vermont, which would eliminate much of the federal bureaucracy involved in trying to develop hydro power plants, deserved a "closer look." He said if projects continue to jam up, the possibility of such an authority will become even greater.

He explained the Burlington Electric Department is currently exempt from going before the PSB before they can raise their rates because they needed to assure Wall Street bond buyers of a constant cash flow. Saudek said without the exemption clause, BED would not have been able to float $105 million worth of bonds on the market. Yet, Saudek lauded BED for their efforts (wood-burning plant, hydro plant, and trash incinerator) saying it was in line with his strategy calling for Vermont to become less dependent on the whims of out-of-state utilities.

Are Downtown Bars Dangerous To Your Health?

By John Letteri

Burlington Police would be allowed to immediately shut down bars that violate the occupancy rate set for them if a proposed change to a city ordinance receives approval from the full board of aldermen.

The aldermanic licensing committee proposed the change to the ordinance that presently requires the city to issue three citations and then take court action before it can shut down a bar. Committee member Janet Stackpole said the bars are "grossly overcrowded" and the problem needs immediate attention. She said complaints from the dangers of overcrowding have been received by Burlington residents and bar patrons as well.

An editorial in the Burlington Free Press (9-25) urged the alderman to pass the new ordinance because of the grave potential health hazard overcrowding creates. In addition, they said each club's wiring and other safety requirements have to be adequate to insure people's safety.

Yet, a random poll of thirty-five University of Vermont students showed most considered the overcrowding situation an inconvenience, rather than a real health hazard. Thirty of those polled offered solutions of "being patient and waiting in line" or "going to another" of Burlington's 52 bars if one is too crowded. One said to alleviate the overcrowding crunch, they should "simply build more bars."

The remaining five said overcrowding was a health hazard. One explained, "When you're in a social situation, you tend not to think of problems like that." But she agreed that problems existed and something should be done about it. Another complained the bars were just "trying to make as much money as they can by stuffing as many people as they can into a club without thinking of the possible ramifications."

In addition to the occupancy question, the aldermen have requested two Burlington nightspots to install proper fire safety systems. Hannibal's and BT McGuire's have been given until December 15 to install the sprinklers or face license suspension. Other bars in town, such as the Chickenbone Cafe, said they have already installed adequate safety systems. Burlington's newest bar, Rasputin's, said they went before "every board they had to" in order to insure they were properly outfitted with fire safety equipment.

S.A. Elections

The deadline for senatorial petition papers (September 29) is approaching quickly, so all those students still interested in running for the S.A. Senate had better get those signatures in. Senate elections will be held October 3-5th. Students will be able to vote any of three days according to the following schedule:

at Billings 9–4 p.m. daily.
at Waterman Lobby 9–4 p.m. daily.
at Bailey Library 9–10 p.m. daily.
at Simpson Dining Hall 4:30–6:30 p.m. daily.
at Harris/Millis Dining Hall 4:30–6:30 daily.
at Living/Learning Dining Hall 4:30–6:30 daily.

Remember, only with a good showing at the polls will the S.A. have a Senate which is representative of the student body here at UVM, so vote next Tuesday–Thursday, and don't forget your UVM ID when you go place your vote.

Student Action

Believing that a truly effective student action committee must work beyond the constraints of UVM's campus, Missy Burke, S.A. vice president and chairperson of the student action committee, has begun laying out the groundwork for a student lobbying effort in Montpelier this year. Burke has also indicated that she has tentatively planned to work with her committee on the issue of student financial aid, both at a state and federal level. "There's interesting stuff out there that will take you beyond the S.A. van," Burke stated when describing the need for students to understand the intricacies of USAC, BEOG and other federal aid programs for students. Other issues which she is interested in working on this year are the completion of a comprehensive student grievance procedure and improving the present system for internal university transfers.

Final 77-78 Senate Meeting

On September 19th, the final meeting of 77-78 S.A. Senate took place in Billings North Lounge. At this meeting, president Charlie Clark informed the senators of the on-going work in the S.A. this summer, particularly in the treasurer's and Student Legal Services offices, and encouraged all senators to run for senate once again this year.

The following is a list of actions taken by the Senate at this meeting:

–approved a new treasurer for 78-79, John Myers, by a unanimous vote.

–approved the finance committee's recommendation that the Gay Student Union be allocated $300 for their 78-79 budget.

–approved the finance committee's recommendation that the Mortarboard be allocated no S.A. funds this year since it was decided that the Mortarboard is an academic club, and thus not eligible for funds under the current S.A. financial policy.

–approved an additional $200 to be given to the Oktoberfest committee to help them in meeting inflationary increases which were not throughly recognized at the time of the Oktoberfest allocation made last April.

–gave approval to President Charlie Clark to set up an ad hoc committee to investigate the feasibility of the present Special Events Funding Procedure. This committee will be selected after the upcoming Senate elections.

News Briefs on Student/Faculty-/Trustee Committees

Students are reminded that applications to become one of the two students who are voting members on the Board of Trustees, are available now in the dean of students office. Remember, we need strong and responsive student voices on this, the major decision-making body of the university, so if you have any interest in the destiny of UVM, consider running for this position.

Also students are needed to become active participants on the following university committees:

–University Hearing Panel in charge of all academic honesty trials

–Faculty-Senate academic committees

–The Vermont Council – a committee of 150 concerned citizens advising the Board of Trustees on the future of UVM.

Overacceptance

percentages vary include the weather of the past year, how well the hockey team did, and how competitive schools' costs compare to UVM, said Steele. The admissions office tries to narrow their estimate for a given year as close to their target number as possible, using these and other criteria.

UVM does not have a strict set of standards by which a student is measured before he comes to the university. Nor does it have any geographical or minority quotas to fill. UVM will accept, however, a Vermont freshman first, if he or she has had an adequate high school record as that of an out-of-state applicant.

Asked about minority admissions, Steele said UVM is improving its efforts to attract more minority students, for UVM is "well below" the national average. Currently, UVM has 62 minority students out of a total undergraduate population of about 7,700.

Despite the apparent glut of new students this year, Steele said recruitment efforts have been stepped up to attract quality students from all parts of the country because of the anticipated drop in the number of people applying to college in the next decade.

Information Revealed on Ambassdor's Death

A high Palestinian Liberation Organization official has revealed information in his memoirs regarding the murder of a U.S. ambassador and two aids during the Lebanese civil war of 1975-76.

Breaking a two-year silence a man called Khalaf by the Associated Press said that the murders were intended to drag the United States into the conflict.

Khalaf claimed the murders of U.S. ambassador to Lebanon, Francis E. Meloy, his economic advisor and a chauffer, were planned and executed by Lebanese leftists.

Although an inquiry into the deaths was performed by both U.S. and Lebanese governments, no motive or suspects were found.

Khadaf said that an informant overheard the assassins say they "hoped their operation would bring about American intervention in Lebanon."

It was hoped the Palestinians would go to war with the Syrians and "transform Lebanon into a new Vietnam."

Khalaf is a member of the PLO's military wing, Al Fatah, and reputed to be the number two man under Yasir Arafat.

Israel Cabinet Acts on Camp David Accords

In a strong show of support for the agreements that Prime Minister Menachem Begin signed at Camp David, the Israeli cabinet voted Sunday to evacuate Israeli settlements on the Sinai Peninsula in return for a peace treaty with Egypt.

The cabinet decision allowed Begin to present the framework agreements to the Knesset, or Israeli parliament, for their final approval.

The resolution Begin will present states that the Sinai settlements will be dismantled only if a peace treaty is signed with Egypt. The exact dates of evacuation of the settlements will be determined by negotiation.

The Knesset convened for debate on Monday and the vote is expected by Wednesday.

Vance's Mideast Mission

After a five day Mideast mission which ended in a meeting with Syrian President Assad, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance returned home earlier this week.

In a five hour meeting described by the Secretary as "frank and exhaustive," Vance was unable to persuade Assad to change his opposition to the Camp David agreements.

It was hoped that if Vance could convince Assad to soften his position on the agreements other Arab nations would find them easier to accept.

In a speech which ended a meeting of the Arab hard-line states, Assad called Camp David the "summit of surrender" and urged all Arab nations "not to adopt this treasonous line."

Syria is the leader of the Arab opposition to a peace settlement in the Middle Wast. Neither Jordan nor Saudi Arabia, which were also visited by Vance, accepted the Camp David proposals. Both countries are considered vital components to any successful Mideast peace plan.

Switzerland Creates New State

In an effort to solve a minority problem that has bothered the nation for more than one hundred years, Switzerland created a 23rd state last week.

A constitutional amendment creating the new state was passed on Sunday with the approval of 82% of the populace.

Jura, the name of the new canton (state) is primarily a Catholic, French-speaking area. The state is approximately the size of New York City and borders on France.

During the Napoleonic wars, the area had been combined with the canton of Bern, which was German-speaking and predominately Protestant.

During the past decade, opposing radical groups favoring separation or continued unification have clashed in various acts of violence and arson. It is hoped the creation of the new state will ease tensions.

California Air Disaster Worst in U. S. History

A Pacific Southwest Airlines Boeing 727 collided head-on with a Cessna 172 above San Diego, killing 147 people last Monday.

Both pilots were advised of each other's positions by air traffic controllers. The Cessna was piloted by 36-year-old Marine Sgt. David Bozwell. Although he already had a license to fly, he was being instructed on instrument landings by Martin Kazy of the Gibbs Flying Service.

As is normal procedure during training, Bozwell's vision was blocked. But Kazy had complete vision and access to the controls.

Burning and severed parts of bodies fell onto roofs and streets. One motorist and her child were killed by the force of a falling corpse which broke through the windshield.

At present, the National Transportation Safety Board is examining tapes of cockpit and control tower conversations.

Mars in the Sahara

Last Monday American and Egyptian geologists set out on a 1000 mile expedition into a section of the Sahara that resembles Martian deserts.

The majority of research will take place at the Oweinat Mountain in Egypt's western desert. In studying wind affects on sand movement and dune growth, scientists hope to gain insight into Martian environments and the prevention of desert encroachment onto fertile arable portions of the earth.

Chief scientist of the expedition Dr. Farouk Baz of the Smithsonian Institute, hints at the inevitable earth's devastation unless a better understanding of the desert environment and the ways and means to control it are discovered.

Monitoring the expeditions progress by way of a jeep mounted radio beacon, a Nimbus satellite will be used. The two week project is being sponsored by the U.S. Space Agency and the Smithsonian Foreign Currency Program.

Boxing Anyone?

Last week in Perth, Australia, David McGinlay, 24, had the boxing match of his life. Hiking through the bush, McGinlay just had time to take a photo before he was attacked by his subject, a kangaroo. "It had forearms thicker than my legs, a girth twice as thick as a man's, paws bigger than my hands and talons three inches long," said McGinlay.

The kangaroo swung at him grazing his shins. Trying to flee, McGinlay was knocked down and kicked twice by the enraged kangaroo. Fortunately for McGinlay, his pet bull terrier distracted the kangaroo by biting its tail, receiving blows itself.

McGinlay's words, "I was sure I was going to die."

House Approves Budget

The House of Representatives approved last week a federal budget for fiscal 1979.

The budget calls for revenues of 448.7 billion and spending of 487.5 billion. The resulting 38.8 billion dollar deficit would be the lowest in five years.

Representative Robert Giaimo, chairman of the House budget committee, told his colleagues that it may be possible to balance the budget by 1981. To do so would require continued restraint on spending by Congress and healthy growth of the economy, he said.

The proposed spending is approximately nine billion less than President Carter expected in his revised proposal offered in July.

An agency to feel the crunch of reduced spending is the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. The HEW underwent a billion dollar budget cut voted by the House on the assumption that money could be saved by curbing waste, fraud and abuse.

FDA Ruling

The Food and Drug Administration will put into effect new rules regulating the labeling of low-calorie food stuffs, effective July 1979.

In order for a food to be labeled "low-calorie" 40 calories per serving or less is the requirement. "Reduced calories" requires the product to have 1/3 less calories than the food it's comparing itself to as well as the percentage of reduction over a similar non-dietetic product.

Foods carrying these labels are required to have nutrition labels quoting caloric content per serving, vitamin and fat content. To further protect the consumer, the FDA has prohibited the labeling of foods that are normally low calorie from using the words "low calorie" before its name. In other words, carrots can't be advertised "low calorie" carrots due to the suggestion that this brand of carrots is lower in calories than competing brands.

Bakke Goes to School

Five years after he applied to the University of California, Davis Medical School, Alan Bakke attended his first class there on Monday.

Bakke, a 38-year-old white engineer and Vietnam veteran, was allowed to attend medical school after the United States Supreme Court struck down in June the school's policy of preferential admissions for minorities.

The program allowed for 16 minority positions for every 100 persons admitted. The court said this denied Bakke his constitutional rights.

The court also ruled, however, that race could be taken into consideration when screening applicants.

A group called the National Anti-Bakke Decision Coalition said it would picket and hold a demonstration on campus.

A spokesperson for the medical school said extra security would be on duty, as is the case during any demonstration.

The View From Here

By Tony Lopez

The art of dormitory living is the art of socialization. It isn't too often in a person's life that he lives under the same roof with fifty people for an extended period of time. As a result, an incoming student grows and matures almost overnight.

Being a freshman in a dorm is an exciting change from the daily life they lead at home. With no parental guidance, most freshmen look stunned and bewildered their first few days at UVM. When put in a situation such as this one, most human beings are compelled to seek some sort of companionship, to subdue their feelings of uncertainty and loneliness.

What better place to find companionship than in a residence hall. With a healthy mix of seniors, juniors, and sophomores in most of the living areas, a new university student has an abundance of experienced, knowledgeable people from which to seek advice. When important matters such as roommate hassles, or adjustment problems, every floor is equipped with its own resident assistant (RA). Someone who has been trained to deal with certain problems, or who can refer one to other agencies within the university for further information.

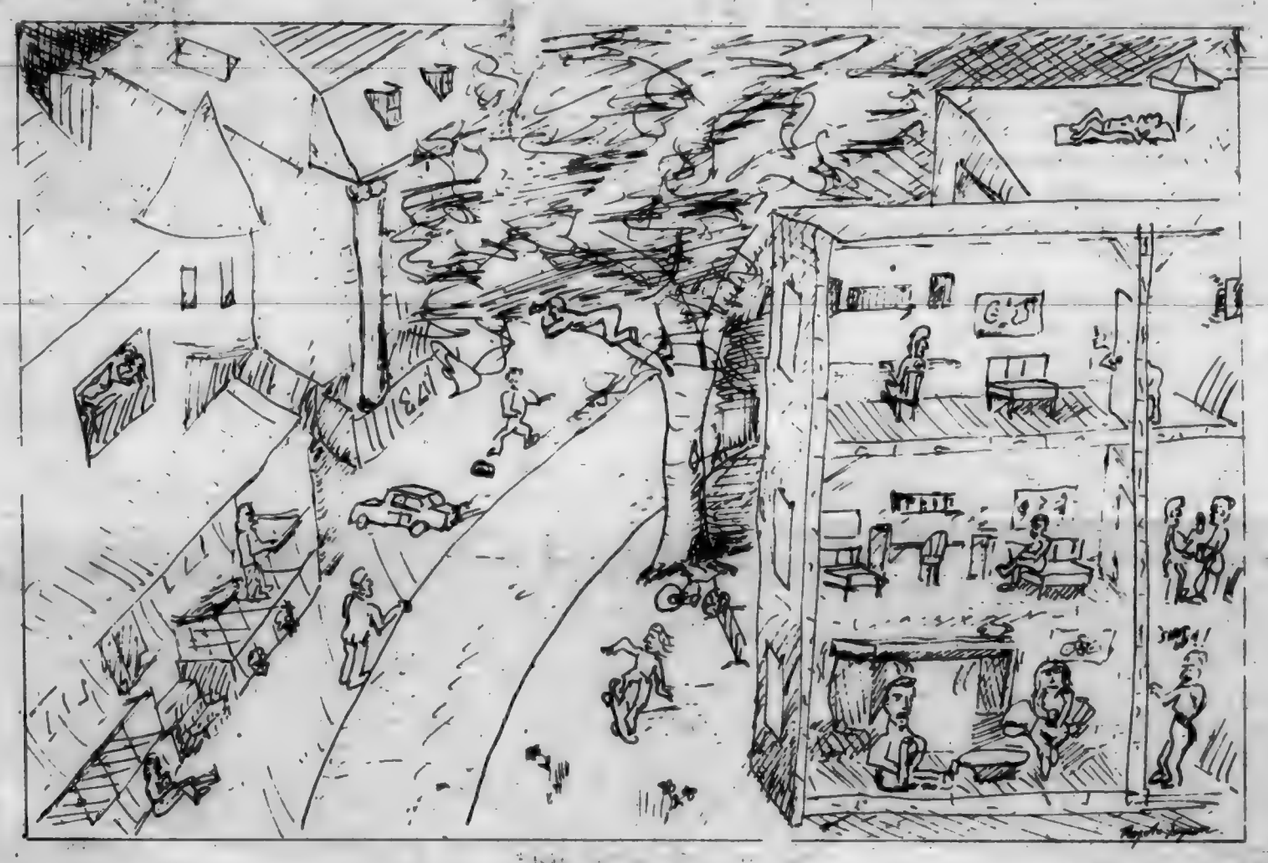
Floormates are a source of entertainment. When living among a small community, there is always someone wanting to go downtown. Floormates are also an inexhaustable source of conversation, a good way to justify relaxation.

Throughout the week there are posters and signs alerting students to the numerous events going on around campus. Individual floors very often invite numerous other floors over for a dance or a cookout, or sometimes even a blowout. There are progressive drinking parties, progressive eating parties, boxer short parties, and what have you. If that isn't enough, in the middle of the week, many floors have "over the hump" to celebrate the passing of yet another half week.

On campus housing is not open to just freshmen alone. For the returning student, it gives him/her the choice of which room to live in, and even more importantly, who to have as a roommate. After living on-campus for a year, it is hard not to have an abundance of friends, not to mention a new floor full of people to meet, and the excitement of another semester.

The sophomores and other assorted upperclassmen are a special kind of student – already attuned to survival techniques to be employed while in the residence halls. When a neighbor down the hall starts blasting his impressive stereo, the student should simply kick the door in and demand calm. It is daily confrontations like this that students deal with in pursuit of a comfortable dorm life.

For the student who is tired of the rowdy life, Harris-Millis and Converse offer a quieter setting where some serious studying can be done. If you are really interested in pursuing a hobby or interest, Living-Learning offers the chance of creating a program of your interest or of joining one already in existence.



Although apartment life has its conveniences, if you are unhappy where you are living – tough luck. Burlington in the school year is not the place to go looking for a new place to live. Places are just plain scarce. Whereas on-campus if you really feel compelled to move, your chances of moving between dorms are pretty good.

Whether it is the Cynic or posters, or simply word of mouth, the on-campus student is exposed to cultural events happening on-campus. The campus is constantly buzzing with activity. While on-campus, it is much easier to be in the flow of that activity, something apartment residents simply are not able to do as easily.

Being able to interact with so many people and learn so many different ways of life is fascinating. The difference in life-styles just within New England is absolutely amazing. It gave one the chance to meet different sorts of people who might become close friends.

At times students become annoyed at their fellow floormates for making noise late at night or infringing on their privacy, but it usually works out without much argument. Everyone needs a break now and then from living with other people. But it is the best medium in which to learn how to deal with other people that you will be dealing with the rest of your life.

In evaluating the whole situation, the recreational benefits and social rewards far outweigh the inconveniences associated with the adjustments and accommodations of living off-campus. On-campus housing is the easiest and most rewarding of the different living situations. You have your entire life to live off-campus, now isn't the time.

On the Lighter Side-- Off Campus

By Henry Chamberlain

One decision which looms in the forefront of every student's future is – no, not what are my prospects in the future, but rather, where to live during my student life at UVM. Upon arrival at UVM every freshman is given on-campus housing; if you want to call four in a lounge or even a cot in the infirmary housing. As a result, the decision to move off-campus looms as a major consideration.

There are three categories of off-campus housing, the Greeks, apartments, and houses for groups of students. The most structured of the three are the Greeks. Those sororities and fraternities offer a unique extension of campus life.

Greeks offer you a housing variety which caters to creating a friendly social situation. Fraternities and sororities, while offering a comfortable living environment, bring man and woman together in that unique social situation, the party. Through teas (parties between a sorority and a fraternity), formals in the fall and spring, or simple get-togethers, the Greeks strive to bring the opposite sexes together.

A distinctive common Greek quality is their clothing. The alligator, which is prevalent on such items as shirts, belts, socks, and even an occasional shoe is popular along with khakis. Status is something which the Greeks strive for. If you want to create a new identity, inquire about house life from the next Greek you see.

Students who have either already created identities, or who are attempting to remain anonymous, may lean to the somewhat private medium of the apartment. Here, the student (where allowed by often frightened landlords) can seek a room which may satisfy his/her needs. A basic problem arises from the extreme scarcity of available "student" apartments.

This problem can be side-stepped in many different manners. Obviously, you can look well ahead of time, keep in touch with off-campus friends, or even advertise. However, tell the landlord of a "restricted" apartment that you are a med-student – you're a shoe-in. Admit that loud noise gives you a headache or that you don't enjoy parties. Those remedies have been known to further landlord attentiveness to their apartments.

Where does this leave you? Probably at either the "student ghetto" on Pearl Street by the State Liquor Store, on pretentious South Willard St., comfortable South Union St., residential Loomis St., or in an "affluent apartment" out on Spear St. The variety is staggering, the chances of getting what you want, a possibility.

Once you have found your own little world, reality strikes. You discover that you truly are living in a residential area where there are twice as many cars as spaces. Those amiable students above you really got off on throwing weekend parties at sixty watts per channel. Even more amusing, whenever you have a problem with your apartment and require some maintenance, you discover that your landlord only understands Greek, a language native to the Aegean Sea.

Your final alternative is to rent a house with a group of friends. This is easier than building your own house as building costs are up and land in Burlington is somewhat scarce. Houses offer a lot of chance for creating a habitat you are really going to enjoy. You can choose a group of people you are very compatable with and make a time of it.

Houses (for students) become available in a wide range of locales. You might find one within walking distance; there are several. For those more independently oriented, some great places are available along Lake Champlain including Malletts Bay and Shelburne Point. These homes offer you the comfort you want while giving you the escape from the madness and confusion of the UVM campus. Houses are definitely a consideration for future residential life. Whatever the belief, that off-campus housing is less expensive than on-campus housing is a myth that doesn't always ring true. Greek houses are virtually no different in price, plus you have to pay a social fee every semester which guarantees some good entertainment. Apartments can be had for somewhat less than room costs, but the rising cost of food and unforeseen extras brings the bill to about par with on-campus. Houses, when done properly, offer you the least expensive path through the semester because of the split up of expenses you have with numbers.

However you see your future at UVM, focus in on off-campus housing. It offers you a lively social life, or the chance to build yourself a hermitage. It offers the chance to go wild or to mellow out with your advancing years. It offers you a chance to play pauper or to live like a king. Whatever, off-campus life gives one great satisfaction, the satisfaction of being on your own and a visitor at the dorms.

The Orbs

Ahhh, the exhileration of Springs' newness to me is such a pleasure.
To watch the Green of the land grow and turn more rich has been my real soulful treasure
Finally she reaches up to caress the magnificent Blue Sky, and they both come alive and dance together.
They rejoice in reunion to embrace once more and savior each others beauty.

But only for a short while however because winter is again.
The leaves change and all too soon fall off in their lifeless array of colors. The Blue Sky is now embraced by an ugly brown death, and cries out in anger and remorse.

Winters' coldness affects me also,
making me numb.
This numbness around my body
Begins at the outer edge of my apparition and contaminates every organ.
It races around my very veins.
So intense and complete it is that no man could endure for long.
And the focus of this numbness is that where it must return, my disguised foe...
–Ahhh, the heart –
Yes, that's the clue my friends.

I await in peace however for Spring since she is so nearby.
To allow her Greeness to caress and love her light Blue Skies

J Alan Levine

Journey

I pass the hothouse
And wish I were a plant
Warmly rooted
In dark soil.

The parking lot has been magically erased of snow.

My car, my mecca from blasts of wind.

Metal hovel of plastic and chrome, home sweet home.

Language

Trees are calling for rain, in imperceptible movement
a leaf drops.

A low river slides around the curved bank scraping clay
like sandpaper.

Sun scorches the brown turf with hot breath;
no creature runs.

An erect form bends down with cupped greedy lands, cracked lips;
he drank the water and with a thick voice
he names it.

David Lloyd

On the Ship

"Come through the iron white bars.
And talk to me, you and I
To talk.
I am that beetle on the stone floor
On its back, jointed legs struggling for a grasp
No blood, no mind, I am it before it died.

The naked bodies stare and primitive souls
Baking beneath the sun cry with mimicking, yes.
"I don't know English; I am from Cirrus, no Athens."
Twenty years ago women wore glasses for sun on top of their heads; naked minds grow lazier heavy with sleep and empty, empty winds.
"You are very beautiful"
She says with tarnished teeth and accent
Long turbulent hours, she assumes her role
Placing plastic glasses on dyed red hair.

I am entrapped on a sailing ship
Distant music is too gone; I am that imaginary major interval too submerged to hear. Rise within my clothed body.
If all the material was scratched away, maybe blood would flow
I could feel the pain, keep my red motor's maintenance.
Benches wooden and salted hard on my back –
She winks at me
Bile formulates in my intestines from
Her uncertainty, rough water in Aegean
So soothing, soothing.
"I am fifteen, oh I look older."
Cigarettes dance with their lights; their heads fall in cliched
Cremated ashes; the filter masquerades the black pulp in her lungs
And then is tossed into the sea.

Prevention Is The Key--A Commentary

By Barry Gustin

While scientists do not yet agree on the specific causal relationships, evidence has been steadily mounting – enough to form a general consensus – that the kinds and amount of food and beverages we consume have a marked effect on our health. With the simultaneous decrease in physical activity, America has witnessed an increase of cardiovascular diseases, diabetes, and other chronic degenerative conditions. These conditions are responsible for the majority of lives taken annually.

Popular reports suggest that with the advancement of medical technology and the improvement of socio-economic conditions, the average American can expect to live longer now than did his counterpart at the turn of the century. This is misleading.

At the turn of the century a white male infant was expected to live 50 years while now his life expectancy approaches 70 years. But this statistic fails to make clear that because many more infants died in 1900 than they do now, the average was lower. In fact, in 1920 a white male of 50 years was expected to live to age 72.25. Today, he can be expected to live to 73, not much of a difference. Thus, even though medical technology is fully developed, there is little difference in how long a fully grown person can live today as compared to 1900.

The reduction in infant mortality is not directly due to the technical intervention of physicians, but rather the result of improved food safety and sanitary conditions. Even this has limited merit since the United States has a high incidence of infant mortality relative to the global picture. This has been expressed by Dr. Merrit Low, a past professor of pediatrics at the University of Vermont and the current president of the American Academy of Pediatrics. Dr. Low has emphasized that the major reason for high infant mortality and morbidity is malnutrition of the mother and/or her infant. In addition, he acknowledges that the child is vulnerable to a myriad of environmental poisons. It is well-established that several of these poisons, once in the mother's body, can easily cross the placental barrier and pass into her offspring.

The attention given to misleading life expectancy data has tended to obscure an important general trend: morbidity or total illness has been steadily increasing. This has been shown by absence from work, by the omnipresence of obesity and its related conditions, and by metabolic data which indicates an elevation of several disease-risk factors such as high blood lipids (fats) and hypertension (high blood pressure) which portend heart disease. To get some idea of the magnitude of the problem, it has been estimated that between 25 and 30 million Americans have high blood pressure.

"When a man dies, he does not just die of the disease he has...he dies of his entire life."

--Charles Pierre Peguy

DEFINING THE PROBLEM

Medical intervention, which deals largely with the treatment of manifested illness, does little to promulgate an approach aimed at the elimination of risk factors – which when present increase the incidence of a disease. Consequently, morbidity is increasingly prevalent, physicians place greater emphasis on therapy, patients become more dependent, and the cost of medical care increases. The cycle feeds on itself.

Prevention of the killer degenerative diseases is the most urgently needed and most promising obligation of modern medicine. Prevention entails education and a willingness by every individual to take full responsibility for maintaining their own health. One must be decisive enough to accept necessary changes in lifestyle (eating habits, exercise habits, and so on) that would result in the decreased probability of developing a chronic disease.

The nature of the killer diseases is such that by the time they are discovered, it is usually too late. Current modes of therapy are only partially effective in decreasing the severity of their debilitating conditions. In the words of Charles Pierre Peguy, 19th century French philosopher, "When a man dies, he does not just die of the disease he has... he dies of his entire life." This is our predicament. Most killer diseases progress over an entire lifetime and only appear late in life. They are not our birthright and they are not the outcome of senility. The sources of degenerative disease are preventable conditions, as has been shown by numerous epidemiological, clinical, and experimental studies. This is a general statement which accurately applies to the vast majority of persons. There are, however, a small percentage of people that are genetically predisposed towards developing a disease. For example, Dr. Jeremiah Stamler, a renowned researcher at Northwestern Medical School, said in his book Preventive Cardiology, that only about 5% of the American populace have inherited high blood lipid levels. For the other 95%, the habitual diet is the chief factor leading to this condition. Thus, it is clear that urgent attention be focused on the concept of mass prevention as it relates to favorable living habits.

PREVENTION FOR THE MASSES

Although absolute certainty has not been established, a substantial number of authorities in medically-related fields recommend changes in lifestyles, with particular emphasis on diet, exercise, and smoking. In many cases, it is necessary to make a decision on the basis of knowledge sufficient for action but insufficient to satisfy the intellect.

Dr. Kacere Norum, a researcher in Norway, recently surveyed 193 of the world's most prominent scientists currently doing research on atherosclerosis (a disease causing cholesterol to accumulate in and on the arterial walls which is the forerunner of coronary heart disease and stroke), fat and cholesterol. When they were asked whether our knowledge about diet and coronary heart disease is sufficient to recommend a change in the diet for the population in an affluent society more than 90% said yes.

THREE STEPS TO A BAD DIET

It appears that our diet is unhealthy for three main reasons: (1) its content of total fat, saturated fat, and cholesterol is too high; (2) it contains too much refined carbohydrates, sugar in particular; (3) it is lacking in "roughage," that is, dietary fiber.

These dietary problems are in part attributed to the widespread consumption of fabricated food. Overconsumption of highly processed food will often lead to obesity and other health problems.

A moment's inspection of the first reason shows that red meat is the prominent offender. The more meat that is eaten, the greater is the consumption of total fat, saturated fat and cholesterol. An abundant number of studies have implicated an overconsumption of these nutrients as a major factor in the genesis of aterosclerosis, breast and colon cancer, gallstones, cirrhosis of the liver, and diabetes.

But haven't we always eaten lots of meat? Isn't it man's natural predisposition to make meat the principal component of his diet? The answer is probably not. Meat has been a prominent part of the diet only since World War II, when for the first time in history there was a huge nationwide abundance of grain. But instead of consuming more grain, people converted it into grain-fed meat. Beef, at that time, was plentiful, well-advertised, and relatively inexpensive.

In contrast to this, our ancestors were conceived with a more basic struggle for food. Meat was obtained as an infrequent treat. The chief portion of the traditional human diet was composed of rice, soybeans, wheat products, seasonal variations of fruit and vegetable, and perhaps some dairy products. The increase in the diet-related diseases is satisfactory evidence for the inference that the human body is not equipped to facilitate the normal degradation of an excess of meat. Meat will always contribute to the human diet but it should play only a minor role. Good health dictates this.

As for the secondary dietary culprit, much has been written about the disadvantages of a diet high in sugar and other refined carbohydrates. The mass production of sugar and refined white flour, like beef production, is a relatively recent phenomena. The problem arises not when sugar and refined white flour are used as spices in small quantities, but when its use comprises a major percentage of the diet. These substances tend to replace other more nutritious food which supply essential minerals and vitamins. They also stress the body by upsetting the finely tuned endocrinological system, which plays an important role in digestion. Many scientists suspect that an overconsumption of these foods contribute to the degenerative process.

The third major dietary consideration is closely related to the first two. The dietary increase of meat and refined carbohydrates has led to a reduced intake of foods high in fiber such as whole grains, beans, vegetables, and fruit. Valuable sources of nutrients are neglected, the composition and transit pattern of stool changes, and we become victims to the ailments which are the hallmarks of developed cultures.

The topping on the cake has been the tendency of Americans to eat too much relative to their energy output. The outcome is obesity; and all the other problems are compounded.

Americans are a crafty lot. We have achieved a high degree of success in satisfying our domestic needs for adequate production, preservation, and distribution of food. Yet, out of our very successes troubling issues have surfaced.

The overconsumption of food in general, and foods high in fat, salt, and sugar has resulted in a major public health problem. To diminish these health problems would be to make the public amenable to preventive intervention. This entails a consolidated effort by all involved. Nothing short of a major change in cultural value structures and priorities can bring this about. Is it worth it? Only our health is at stake.

In The Midst Of Prosperity

Everybody's going to the country, but Burlington is sprucing up its appearence to bring the consumer back.

By Henry Chamberlain

Burlington is a city in the midst of an economic boom. While much of the rest of the state has been recovering from the economic recession, Burlington has been plodding along on an ambitious program of renovation for its downtown section. The scope of future projects is impressive, including a proposed pedestrian mall on Church Street, and a twenty-five hundred seat civic center at the corner of Battery and Main Streets.

Like other cities around the nation, Burlington experienced an immigration of people and commerce from its downtown section. Following World War II, people began to use the mobility afforded them by their cars and moved to the country. Droves of people headed to the peace of suburbia.

With this exodus of consumers, businesses followed suit and moved out to the country. The result was a dramatic decline in the economic health of downtowns around the country. Business districts were no longer just concentrated in the inner city, they were migrating away from the cities and into suburban shopping malls.

As downtown began to decline, abandoned buildings were becoming a more common sight with each passing year. With the convenience of local stores out in suburbs, consumers didn't make the trip into the city very often. Only the very well established, unique, or large stores still had a clientele.

Stores began to spread down the Shelburne Road, a route which is now heavily populated with assorted commercial enterprises for most of the seven miles out to Shelburne. The Williston Road does the same as Route 7, only to the East.

The result of the "shopping center" culture is vividly apparent in another Vermont city, Brattleboro. Between the city of Brattleboro and town of Putney stretches the Putney Road. More and more businesses moved out along the road for years with a resulting decline of the inner city. Today, the heart of Brattleboro has little to offer, most of the action is away from downtown.

Since many cities across the country experienced similar declines, the federal government began to play an active part in attempting to revive the downtown areas. This effort came to a head with the Model Cities program which was begun in 1966 under the effort of the Johnson Administration. For its emphasis, the Model Cities program talked for rebuilding vast areas of some U.S. cities. These areas were to be socially as well as physically reconstructed.

The program never succeeded, largely because surplus revenue which had been expected at that time was drained off to feed the war effort in Vietnam. This is not to say that work on American cities stopped. To the contrary, local citizen's groups began their own smaller-scale efforts.

Author Unknown

I couldn't wait for the door of the subway car to open. This end of the Orange Line was above ground, and the next stop, Wellington Circle, was mine. As the train crossed over a barbed-wire bridge, my fingers drummed an impatient tattoo on my leg. Slowing into the station, I stood up, tossing my army jacket over my left shoulder, tugged my baseball cap a little further down my forehead, and fingered my keys out of the pocket of my jeans. The door silently opened, an unfeeling servant at a thankless job. I was free.

Pivoting on the ball of my left foot, long legs moving me at a flat run, I took the flight of brick stairs in fours, and in a dozen bounds, I'd reached the turnstyles. It was like a scene from one of the comic books that I was always reading: the hero rushing to stop some disaster. Catching one with the heel of my hand, I kept up the pace, running another hundred feet, then veering to the right.

Through the enclosed overpass, then at the outer doors, black metal and handprint-smudged glass. Hitting the little stainless steel plate that people were supposed to hit when they opened the door, then out.

In the darkened parking lot, three cars stood, a '77 T-Bird, a Plymouth wagon of indeterminate age, and a battered '65 Buick, cream colored. I allowed myself a wry smile at my ingenuity as I hoofed over to the Buick, for one of the fluorescent overhead lights had caught the license plate: it was the green-and-white of Vermont. I'd by-passed the mandatory insurance clause of registering a car in Massachusetts, and had used my school address as my place of residence. Screw you, Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I got in on the passenger's side door, as the driver's side wouldn't open, courtesy of the previous owner. Sliding across the dirt-brown upholstered seat, shoving aside two grimy T-shirts and a trio of comic books, I was behind the steering wheel. Fumbling with the key-ring, clumsy fingers found a small key, with an octagonal head, yellow where age had worn away the silver cosmetic veneer, and put the silver into the ignition. Again, a wry smile. The symbolism of the act was too blatant for me to miss, in my current frame of mind. I even allowed myself a deep-throated chuckle, to relieve my tension and turned the key. I would not allow myself to feel the frustration from the course of past events. As I had learned, I could not keep the anger to myself, but had to face it.

The old car hesitated, thought again of it, and roared to life. Not deceived by the heap's clarion-call of vitality, I kept my foot steady on the accelerator regulating the gas flow so that it could run with me this night.

I paused to catch my breath, literally and figuratively. To reflect upon what Ellen said only a score minutes ago. To recall what I'd dreaded, like a little boy very afraid of getting nipped again by the wolfish German Shepherd, by what I knew that she'd say.

She didn't love me.

Oh, a concession was made, that we would still be friends (a brief color of a memory of a beach, over a year earlier, where we had ended up one night, where she asked me that I be the godfather of the child that she would have in the future). But lovers no more. My foot came off the gas-pedal, the engine maintaining its throaty growl of life. I turned on the radio to an FM station, shifted into Drive, and headed out of the lot, pensive.

I was driving along Interstate 93 north, when a song pierced my fog of thought. It was about street life, being born to run, and a last chance power drive, and the movement of the music sucked me in, battering me about my hidden fury. The song hit its climax, and my anger pulsed forth, free from tightly-seated controls. The sticky fury pooled slowly into my stomach, knotting the sack, gripping the steering wheel tightly, with a monomaniacal determination.

I was drowning in a sea of hate, amphibian when I had been an air-breather. A curious marionetter in a Walter Mitty fantasy, I gunned the engine, and it took up the hue and cry, roaring to life that, in a little same corner of my mind, I hadn't expected that a 250-inch six-cylinder engine to have. Melding with my craft, I was hell-bent on some noble mission, perhaps to save an isolated colony-outpost, all for God and Country. I twisted under the abject simpleness of the raw emotion, weaving through the lanes about the other cars, little metal bugs to be skirted about with care. I took ramp fourteen, Route 128 east, Peabody and Gloucester, and reasserting my identity, let off the accelerator, coasting to a slower speed.

"Pretty fuckin' foolish, boychick." I thought.

"Back off, Jack! It's for a reason." A conversation sprung up in mind, vestiges of the anger nibbling upon my tired body.

"Granted, but you bloody well needn't bag a one-way ticket to Valhalla in the process."

"Agreed."

"Right now, you're like one of those sealed-liquid kids' toys, the kind with the winter scenes, that you quickly turn upside-down to make it snow, like at Christmas. How about hitting Rockport Beach, for some R&R?"

Motion made, seconded, and unanimously voted upon, I checked the fuel gauge, stuck the speedometer needle at 55, and concentrated my efforts on driving.

Thirty minutes had passed when I signalled, and turned onto a hilly seaside road, the cracks in the pavement caulked with white sand.

Abruptly, I came upon the sea. I parked the car in front of the burnt-out skeleton of the Sandpiper Inn, a familiar dinosaur in my past, now its blackened bones the only physical reminder of having worked there. Getting out, I locked the car, a well-conditioned lab animal, and began my late night sojourn by strolling down the concrete ramp to the beach.

I damned-well nearly fell on my face by tripping on a small boulder, and made a footnote to watch where I put down my big feet, the lighting being poor due to a half-full moon and clouds.

Fifteen minutes at my limping gait, and I was at my favorite spot, a thumb of a peninsula, just scraggy rocks, through yellow-green grass and sandy soil. Finding a large, flat rock, I perched, facing the black-blue expanse of water. The July breeze was salty, moist and damp, relaxing and comfortable. The breakers smashing themselves on the rocks were gentle in their force, and I focused on the rhythmic beat. The rest of the world didn't exist.

It was time for rational thought.

I had loved and lost. Why, I wasn't sure, but by the stars above and below, I wasn't about to let it crush me. I ruminated in the dusty attic of my mind, and found, tucked away, a cherished memory of a rite of passage. I remembered the past May, at Dandridge Hall.

Dandridge Hall is notorious on campus as the party dorm, and being a young and naive freshman (though I don't consider this an excuse for my conduct), I quickly immersed myself in the flow of the social tide.

Lemme explain a bit about ol'Dandy. Dandridge is "unique," though a dump. However, it is composed of a spectrum of stereo-typical people. There were heads, eyes glazed wedgewood china, drinkers, large of stomach and mouth, pre-meds, noses surgically attached to the textbooks that would win them fortune, liberated women, chained kids, local folk, the "men" and the machines, students, husband hunters, the just plain crazy, and me.

In this kaleidoscope of personae, I felt lost. I shouldn't have stayed there. But, through bull-headed tenacity, I stayed, always too hard on myself. I did not allow myself the privilege of being human, of making mistakes. I could not fail. I pushed myself, schoolwork, play, women, all, not letting up for a nano-second. Yet effort isn't always success, and when I failed, vulnerable and ordinary, I got frustrated. Too many comic books, I guess.

My problem was my temper. I treated other folk with every consideration, while I would be merciless in my retribution to myself. Caught up in a game of images, I wasn't too comfortable, my veneer would often crack.

I'd thought that I'd ease up on myself at college, learn to relax, be human. By panning through the sand of daily drudgery, I hoped to find enough precious metal to make it worth it all.

The result: I ended up fighting myself the entire year, staving off the frostbite cold of loneliness while trying to get better than a 2.67. It is tough trying to be superhuman.

My answer to the problem: get rudely drunk and/or stoned at every available opportunity.

This self-destruction had to stop. Throughout the year, I'd been building self-confidence in myself, relaxing my frustrations of life. The last week was to be a show-down, a resolution of my anxiety.

********

The last Thursday of class meant the last weekly keg of the year, and I figured that now would be a good time to square this tension up with myself. Yellow half-gallon pitcher in hand, my mission was to inebriate these anxieties in fine brew.

Brimmin', me'n' the pitcher high-tailed it up to the second floor, room thirteen, my hovel.

I prepared for the first night of self-examination. Checking through my vast record collection, I opted for a diet of heavy metal, the maincourse being Aerosmith, Jethro Tull and Deep Purple. I noted that my neurotic roommate (who was I to point the finger, I thought?) was probably off intent upon a heavy evening of nookie with the messed-up middle-class damsel/mother image that he was after. Hell, if he interrupted this first phase of judgment, it'd be Wolverine's claws for roomie and his honey.

First off, lemme explain what I mean by the phrase "Wolverine's claws." I'm into comic books. Very much so, and that was part of my problem. In trying to get a trip on myself, I'd not allow myself to get angry. Attempting to halt this anger, I rather embarrassingly found out that I had to get rid of it somewhere. So I discredited it from myself, and identified it with certain comic book characters. That way, I could rationalize the fury better.

Characters. Well, two, actually...

The Wolverine, by convention, was a Canadian super-hero type, with agility, strength, and an animal tenacity. I saw him as my frustration given form. Short, ornery, quick to anger, his main gimmick were the claws that would come out of his hands when he fought. There were times when I could feel the trio of white tines on my hands, armed to fight, eager to rip, slash and tear at my opponent, my enemy, my confusion. Wolverine's favorite parlor pasttime was getting into a fight, whereupon he'd slice his opponent like an Albertan steer. He could drink anyone under the table, and was glad to prove it, a very valuable masculine trait, and got women when he wanted them, how he wanted, and on his, and his alone, terms.

E.R.G.-1 was energy given form. A young astro-physicist of the future, he was caught in the backwash of an anti-matter energy drive, and was converted into pure energy. Restricted for eternity to a man-shaped costume, he possessed innumerable super-powers, chiefly a catharitic energy blast that knew no limit, though drained him immensely. He could challenge the stars with the power of a god, trapped forever in man-form.

Anyway, getting back to what I was saying about these two. I'd often wonder how either would handle the pressures upon me, and when this little mental game failed in drawing of frustration, I got plastered. Hell, if you got so angry at life in general that you wanted to lash out at someone, and hit hard, you'd want to make sure that you were so messed-up that you couldn't remember your name.

So that was what the night was like. Getting up only to turn over the records or refill my pitcher, I sat facing out the window, feet on the radiator, looking out at the people.

The next three days were spent in accomplishing the Twelve Feats of Hercules. Constantly drunk and stoned, living in the slime of total decadence, I unearthed decayed and festering frustration, upset the graves of long-forgotten fury, to meet and master it with every iota of my personality, all that was sane and understanding in me. Vision showed me life out of focus, out of synchrinization, jerky and uncoordinated. My medulla oblangata maintained necessary life functions by default of a higher level of my mind and removed my contact lenses for me.

In three days time, I'd submitted my psyche to years of hatred, unnecessary anger directed towards myself for having failed to be perfect. In understanding my preoccupation of perfectness, I thwarted the energy of failure from myself.

Eight o'clock Sunday night, I integrated my senses back into the soft envelope of human form. Thoughts were like little puzzle pieces and I tried to put them together. In a state of sheer exhaustion, the tension was drained from me, I'd stopped fighting the world and myself.

Dressing, I went to Walters, ordered and wolfed down a turkey sub and a coffee light. With solid food in me for the first time in days, I could think.

I had only two distinct memories of my trial. I remember Saturday afternoon, working at the gym, and my thoughts were of Ellen.

I had known Ellen since third grade, eleven years now. We had attended the same elementary school together, and during junior high, I lost contact with her.

It surprised the hell out of me when, on my first night working at this restaurant, this small, red-headed girl said to me, "Don't worry, you'll live through it. First nights are always hell." I looked up at her, as I was on my knees, getting a bus tray of dishes, nodded agreement, and continued in trying to catch up on the pile of dishes.

She was still standing there.

"Well, don't you remember me?"

I looked about making sure that the manager wasn't there, then looked at her. She seemed familiar. Her name tag said, in blue, "Ellen."

"Ellen Terra?"

"Yeah, turkey." She smiled.

Well, from there on, things got better.

Very slowly, I might add. We started going out about a year later, during the spring of my senior year in Prep school. Things went well between me and her, but after my Senior Prom, it was as if a silent agreement had been made between us.

We never went out again.

Okay, now move forward almost a year later, my nineteenth birthday. It was a Monday, and I hadn't planned much in the way of a celebration, as I had two tests the next day. At eleven, I finally got back from work. As usual, my roommate, who's into things like surprise parties, pulled one on me. He had that damn shit-eating grin on his face. About quarter to midnight, after I'd eaten my cake, smoked my birthday bongs, and drank from the keg in my favor, roomie said, "Doug, you have a visitor."

I figured that it was a kid in my Computer Science class, asking for some help on some programs.

It was Ellen.

"Well, Doug," she looked around, "pick your jaw off of the floor, even if there are no flies, 'n' say something," she said.

What could I say?

She stayed until six the next day, and it was only then that I came out of my shock. After that night...

Creative Sound offers carefully selected stereo systems We'd like to introduce you to our new matched

SYSTEM $379

Our stereo systems have become known for the high quality and value that they present. It's taken over 12 months to find just the right products to achieve such a fine system, priced under $400, and yet worthy of your ears. System $379 will bring years of high fidelity performance to you, with the same high standards of performance that you might have paid twice as much for several years ago. In this sense, System $379 is truely a value breakthrough.

System $379 consists of the new Technics SA80 receiver, it features a powerful 30 watt RMS output, and an FM tuner that is as sensitive as many receivers costing more. And it has many of the same high performance characteristics that are found in even the most expensive Technics receivers, such as: flat group delay IF, phase-lock-loop FM, 90dB phono S/N radio.

We've coupled this first class receiver to the Fisher MS 135 passive radiator speaker system. These very efficient speakers will surprise even the most critical ear, for their high clarity and accurate base handling response are very good. When you listen to System $379, you'll agree that these speakers are far from ordinary.

Last, but not least, we've included the BSR2260 automatic turntable. It comes equipped with the QLM 30 MDIII stereo cartridge. The BSR2260 is a very reliable performer. It features cue control as well as auto eject at the end of a record. It can also be operated manual as many audiophiles prefer.

Upon credit approval System $379 may be purchased for as little as $37 down with $17.10 a month for 24 months (A.P.R. 18.11%)

UVM May Adopt New Department

By Eric Kilburn

Citing increased student demand and ease of implementation, UVM President Lattie Coor recently outlined a proposal for a new department of scatology which will be considered before the board of trustees on October 4.

In explaining the need for a new department, Coor said, "Because of an almost fanatical concern over post-graduate employment, UVM students are showing a remarkable tolerance – even a desire – for irrelevant information, meaningless memorization and cadaverous classes. It's high time we created a department that would meet these needs. Today's technological society demands people with skills that a scatology major could offer. Graduates in scatology could expect to go on to a variety of high-paying jobs as sanitation engineers, compost specialists and politicians."

According to Coor, UVM's new department will not result in an increase in tuition or the state appropriation, since "professors with previously demonstrated scatological talents will simply have their contracts renegotiated to include scatology instruction. When questioned as to which professors might be candidates for positions, Coor said, "It's too early for anything definite, but a professor from the dairy sciences has expressed an interest in teaching "Bovine Scatology," and we think he's highly qualified. We're also considering other positions in Fecal Philosophy, Small Business Scatology and Scatological Economics, but as I said earlier, this is only speculation. The most important thing is that for the first time ever, students will be able to spend four years at UVM learning nothing useful, interesting or significant, and get credit for it."

Reactions to the proposal have been varied, although the general student consensus seems to be apathy. Student Association President Charlie Clark stated his opposition to the department, deeming it "unnecessary." Said Clark, "Most students naturally acquire scatological skills by about their junior year. None of last year's S.A. Presidential candidates had ever taken a course in 'Bovine Scatology,' yet we all consider ourselves experts – just read our campaign platforms." Several SA Senators took issue with Clark, using the minority student as a case in point. Said one, "Many Third World students enter UVM with a disadvantage because they don't have scatological backgrounds comparable to those of their white counterparts. A department of scatology would help reduce this inequity."

The scatology issue also polarized UVM's student trustees, with Andi Pearl calling the proposal "ridiculous." Butch Crandall was more philosophical however, perhaps reflecting his business administration background. Said Crandall, "Think of the potential economic spinoffs of a scatology department – less people studying in the library, more people in the bars. The tax base of Burlington would be broadened considerably, and UVM could reduce or eliminate the library expansion."

In a related development, UVM trustees Morgan and Beauchamp expressed the concern that the scatology department might become a haven for

More Than A View

The Woman's Referral Center has just about everything for women except opinions. They save those for professionals.

Aside from having a panoramic view of the Adirondack's, the Women's Referral Center, located on the third floor of Billings, has a ton of information on anything on, by, or about women.

After their first "official" meeting, the WRC was filled with many ideas for this year's activities. On the agenda are workshops (i.e. bicycle repair, income-tax returns, health and exercise, self-defense, and informal discussion groups acting as a form of support). Music on Fridays from 3–5 p.m., films, lectures and a possible booth at the Oktoberfest are also in the planning. Any woman wishing to become a member of the WRC can just walk up to the office and offer a hand. The WRC encourages all to join. Sara Packard, an active member, said, "The WRC is a way to bring something meaningful and educational into your life – something besides school."

The WRC has resource files on: agencies for women (both on and off campus), medical information, counseling centers, and education women centers. Being that the WRC is run by students and not professionals, they are unable to give opinions – just referrals. As one member said, "We would be off our rockers to tell them (women asking advice) our professional opinions."

The WRC has its own library carrying books on women's literature and poetry, as well as medical references and books on sociology, self-defense, and a variety of other women's related topics. There are also leaflets and brochures concerning women and politics both in Vermont and nationally.

The WRC subscribes to several magazines including Ms., Sojourner, and the new Vermont women's monthly, The Commonwoman. In addition, plenty of literature concerning all forms of birth control is available. All books can be taken out; simply leave your name at the desk.

One major reason for the WRC's growth this year is the fact that the WRC and the now defunct Women's Organization have merged. The WRC has since become a recognized student organization. Thus, Student Community in Action allocated the center $500 this year, up from last year's $50.

The benefits of these two similarly related organizations merging are not strictly financial however. Having merged, they feel they can focus and direct their energies more effectively. The co-directors, Lydia Snow and Mary Beth Hughes, are excited to see the WRC evolving into an active organization. So far this year there has been a tremendous amount of interest from the students and community members alike. Roughly 50 women are presently involved with the WRC, which, according to last year's members, is more than encouraging. In past years, a ten-member force was not unusual.

The Women's Referral Center is opened Monday–Friday 9–5 and they are extending their hours soon. Their telephone number is 656-4460.

Return to the present. I was concerned over her because I was worried about the way that the summer would turn out. She was peculiar about lasting relationships, and I was not too keen about getting burned again.

The other memory, a brief one, was also of Saturday, at night. I was sucking down a beer, choosing dusty tidbits of rage to nibble on, when I triggered an internal frenzy. A huge plank of oaken fury hit me in the face, maddening me to heights of Wolverine rage. I remembered going out running for three hours, exhausting the animal that wanted me at its owl level.

I quit doing my corpse imitation around Monday noon. I don't know how I could've slept so deeply, as my dreams were haunted by intangible phantoms, mute shadows. It was a grey world, and I wondered why I hadn't wakened up just once, screaming.

I ate well that day, studied, and didn't make it a point to talk to anyone. The jury was out on my case, but I didn't fear the verdict.

Seven o'clock meandered in, as I was reading in an overstuffed chair in the corner of the room. Relaxed, totally at ease with my world, I was preparing for the right moment of pronouncement. I put on a record, Steve Miller's Anthology album, second side.

Getting on towards sunset, I watched as the sun's dying rays cast a quicksilver gleam to the edging of the clouds. I let my thoughts drift with them.

I became aware that I had accepted myself.

I was not perfect, super-human. I could make mistakes. It was alright. And I was not a faceless runner, going it alone. I could depend on others.

I accepted patience, ignored anger, and cried, glad to be alive.

The memory done, I smiled. I didn't hurt anymore. Remembering the painful lesson learnt only a few months earlier, I put my rage in its place, in its context. I did not succumb to my own private fears.

I slowly jogged back to my car, headed home, intent upon getting food in my stomach and a solid eight hours of sleep, for I had to work at three tomorrow.

"communists and other leftist-type professors," particularly in the Fecal Philosophy courses. President Coor moved quickly to defuse this speculation, saying "the trustees shouldn't worry. If any faculty member gets too radical, we'll just fire them."

Five years ago a department of scatology would have been unthinkable, and President Coor anticipates a struggle with some of the more conservative trustees. Said Coor, "Since there are always going to be backswimmers in the tide of progress, I don't doubt that some amount of convincing will be necessary to get the department through. Scatology is a progressive idea, but one whose time has come. Believe me, we have students' best interests at heart."

ATTENTION ENGINEERING AND SCIENCE MAJORS!

The Air Force has openings for young men and women majoring in selected science and engineering fields. Like Aeronautical, Aerospace, General and Electrical Engineering, Mathematics, Physics and Computer Technology.

To help prepare for one of these, Air Force ROTC offers two and four-year programs of study which will defray some of your college costs.

After completion of the AFROTC requirement, and upon your graduation, you'll be commissioned an officer in the Air Force. Then comes responsibility, experience in your specialty with some of the best people and facilities in the world, and a mission with a purpose. You'll get excellent starting salary, medical and dental care, 30 days of paid vacation beginning your first year, and more.

Look into the Air Force ROTC program right away. See what's in it for you. See how you can serve your country in return. You'll be glad you put your major to work on a job that really counts.

In New York, the thousands of brownstones which were standing began to be rebuilt and made liveable because of the bargain prices. Philadelphia had community groups renovating many of their inner city dwellings which lay dormant. Boston constructed a new government center, the Prudential and Hancock complexes, and opened its waterfront through construction as did Chicago.

Burlington consists of forty thousand permanent residents, with thirty thousand assorted others, including college students. Its economic base, according to the mayor, draws from a population of about two hundred and ten thousand people. That is a large foundation upon which to build and support a business district such as we have in Burlington.

However, there is one major problem. Burlington itself is built up. There isn't an area in town, except for a few spots that you might rezone, to accommodate a major increase in population. So, how do you support an expansion of the inner city financially?

For one, Chittenden County itself has a large potential for expansion, something it is already doing. But, more fundamentally, you create a shopping experience for your potential market. Make your area different, more appealing to the consumer. You have to get the flow of traffic moving back into Burlington.

How else do you accomplish this? First, you clean up the downtown area so that people will not be turned away. Then you create an attraction. The first thing which Burlington has done is to build the Burlington Mall.

In Burlington's case, the Mall worked beautifully, but it is only the beginning. In the works for the future is one of the most ambitious plans for a city development to be found anywhere in the Northeast. It is proposed that Church Street be closed to traffic to create a pedestrian mall on street level, and shoppers mall below. Further, a twenty-five hundred seat civic center is planned to be put at the corner of Main and Battery Streets. Finally, two high rise apartment buildings are proposed to be put just above the Radisson with another large department store between there and the parking garage.

Plans are well along for this project already. A model of the proposed construction is on display down in Burlington Square. The architects for the project come from the firm Alexander and Truax, Inc., a firm which is based in Burlington. Support in the form of financing for the initial plans has come from the federal government. Mayor Paquette stated that the project has received a "good reception" from the federal government.

Long-term ambitious new projects such as this take a risk, you are counting on the future, something which at times is tremendously unpredictable.

Added to this concern is the proposed Williston Mall which the Pyramid Developers wish to construct. The proposed complex would create two major problems; the first is that it would offer a mall that would easily be the size of the Burlington Mall, and the other is that an impressive mall out in the country would keep a large potential market from driving into Burlington. The Williston Mall is currently being held up, but nobody is certain that it won't be built.

If the proposed plans are carried out, the city will attract numerous new shoppers to the area. The price will be somewhat high. Traffic will be rerouted in a two-way traffic loop around downtown, from Pearl Street to South Winooski Avenue, to Main and Battery Streets. Bus routes would take passengers from South Winooski Avenue down College Street to Battery Street and then up Cherry Street. Parking will be no problem with the addition of the new parking garage and possibly addition of another one to be incorporated into the plans.

From the more personal vantage point, economically speaking, the downtown mall will be partially financed by the citizens of Burlington. Mayor Paquette relayed that upwards of ten percent of the project would be financed by the citizenry. As financing, either on the local or federal level, is not final, the issue will be coming to the public relatively soon.

Proposed construction could begin as early as next summer. That means that the city council is going to have to present the proposal in the very near future. At that time, anyone who lives in Burlington is going to have to decide if they want this plan for their future.

Is a pedestrian mall the best thing for the city? Is there sufficient economic power to support the plan? Do you want Burlington to expand in this manner? Finally, do you want to pay for such a project?

This is an exciting time for Burlington and Chittenden County. The region is based on economic bedrock. Expansion is on the horizon for Vermont's premier city. Whether the current plans, or a modified version, will take place is speculation at this point. However, imagine the walk up the Church Street Mall (above or below ground), or seeing a performance in a spacious civic center. It gives you something to think about.

Departure

a last kiss, and out the window
like an unwanted instinct, across the lawn,
into the salt night
quiet as a weapon.

and what's been obtained cannot be used.
memory converges into flow—
or worse, seems merely a photograph, time-locked, hinting at meanings
the eye can no longer bear.

no Mary, the loneliness returns absurd, coded & uncoded, squared to work my hearing:
ale, cigars, the dictionary an eraseable risk — almost too human.

Priorities For S. A.

In the vacuous rhetoric of every S.A. election, familiar themes invariably surface. Phrases like "a hard worker," "vote for action," and "time for a change" abound, yet at year's end, a measure of significant change continually reveals that little — if any — progress has been made. Student interest has fallen to minimal levels, as last year's elections 20% participation rate clearly attests. Because S.A.'s previous sluggishness can be partly traced to their failure to gather momentum early in the year, we would like to volunteer our assessments and recommendations on S.A.'s policies and priorities for the future. It is our hope that by defining goals early on a more effective student government will result. The following five issues provide, in our view, a good starting point.

Rent Control: With a Burlington apartment vacancy rate of less than 1% and the community growing every year, rent control and its ramifications should be a central concern to the S.A. All the conceivable positive and negative benefits of imposed rent control should be drawn up and analyzed by the S.A.

Tuition Increases: While the ability to prevent tuition increases is not within the students' power, lobbying efforts both on campus during Trustees meetings and in Montpelier can exert important influences. The objective should be to maintain the state appropriation at a level commensurate with inflation and mandatory costs, in an effort to stop increases for Vermont residents. In any event, the S.A. should study closely the reasons why tuition goes up yearly and present a detailed report for student examination.

South Africa: It is a well-known fact that UVM has large investments in corporations with branches in South Africa. In our view, such investments indicate at least tacit support of Apartheid. The S.A. should investigate the issue and take a stance.

Communications: Communication of the S.A.'s activities to the student population has been inadequate and consequently unsuccessful in generating student action. The new S.A. column in the Cynic is a good start, but much more effort in this area is needed.

Student Legal Service: The SLS is, in our view, one of the most praiseworthy S.A. accomplishments in the last couple of years. Its continuation and growth should be assured.

President Charlie Clark and Vice-President Missy Burke have shown an encouraging receptivity to suggestions for S.A.'s improvement. While we definitely hope that this open-mindedness will continue, it is obvious that an S.A. administration cannot single-handedly change the student's perception of S.A. without an energetic, concerned senate and general assembly. This is the minimum effort necessary if any of the rhetoric of the past is to become the reality of the present.

Maximum Sex

To the Editor:

Thanks so much for your editorial of Thursday last. It is good of you to express so well the opinions of those who chose not to attend the "Maximum Sex" lecture and yet hold definite opinions about the subject discussed and the manner in which it was presented. I must, however, be mildly reproving of your faulty research and editing. The fellow who spoke was Josh McDowell (as in "That's Josh" and "Josh is Coming") and not John McDowell as your editorial indicated. The error was minor and can surely be forgiven in light of your desire to defend the mental purity and hygiene of the student body. I am ignorant of any hallucenigenic mushrooms of the genus Evangelism, but will be sure to avoid them in the future.

Most Sincerely Yours,
Eric Pollard

Jesus! Not Josh

To the Editor:

I appreciate Randy McMullen's treatment of the Josh McDowell lecture series. Randy devoted time and energy to draw out both students' reactions to Josh and Josh's attitudes and perspectives, such as his "love for college students" and his "theme of a personal relationship with Jesus Christ." However, Randy did misquote my statement about the success of Josh's lectures. Randy's article reads, "Josh is something for people to get excited about; he is someone who can help us find fulfillment." In my statement to Randy, I was referring at this point to Jesus Christ. We never did view Josh as someone to help anyone find fulfillment, but we do know Jesus to be the One who gives a fulfilling, exciting and worthwhile life to those who place their faith in Him. Josh's objective here at UVM, as is the objective of other Christians, was to challenge students and faculty to intellectually consider the claims of Jesus Christ and the validity of the Christian experience. Consequently, the reason we publicized and promoted "Josh" is that we knew he would present evidence for Christianity and solutions to relevant issues from the Christian perspective. So, in reality, Josh wasn't the issue, Jesus is.

Sincerely,
David Aune

The Truth, and nothing But...

To the Editor:

I submit the following to your "Letters..." section aware that topics dealing more specifically with UVM are probably preferred. However, it is my belief that nonsense such as what follows may sometimes stimulate legitimate thought regarding important subjects such as our government's capricious allocation of funds.

Basing my assumption upon the infinite munificence of our Federal government as regards the Kennedy Assassination, the infinite esoteric investigations of that long since dead event must surely reveal some fact or facts on par with Einstein's formula. Adhering to this line of reasoning, I demand that the government instigate immediately a comprehensive investigation into the events surrounding the death of my eminent ancestor, Genghis Khan.

Although the good Genghis expired a mere 750 years ago, previously suppressed information of universal import has recently been placed before me. It seems that a Communist conspiracy, headed by the nefarious Lee Castro-Khan, may well have been responsible for the untimely death of the hardy Genghis. Had that worthy Mongol remained alive history's course most certainly would have deviated from the well trodden path. Rome might have stood, Britain might remain a simple Roman outpost and we all might be eating pasta.

I thus demand that the government readily dispatch a battery of forensic anthropologists (along with the ubiquitous trailing minions of lawyers) to research and hopefully unearth the realities of that dastardly event.

Sincerely,
Peter V. Howe-Khan '79

Red Sox 7, New York 3?

To the Editor:

I feel compelled to comment on an article that appeared in your first issue, entitled Sox 7 Yanks 3 by Harry Chambermaid. There are several disturbing instances that occur in Harvey's article. First, the full title of the article is not Sox 7, Yanks 3, but rather

Yanks 15 – Sox 3
Yanks 13 – Sox 2
Yanks 7 – Sox 0
Yanks 7 – Sox 4
Yanks 4 – Sox 0
Sox 7 – Yanks 3

Second, the MVP award certainly belongs to a pitcher whose record, as of date, is 23-3: Ron Guidry of the New York Yankees. Granted that Jim Rice is an excellent baseball player, he is far from the level Guidry has achieved. This season. Guidry has thrown nine shutouts, three two-hitters and has lowered his ERA to an impressive 1.74.

Lastly, saying that the Yankees are a team of average talents while the Sox have potential, is totally irrelevant. Oakland has potential, Toronto has potential, the Mets have potential, but the team must not choke in order to achieve the end result of that potential. The team that wins is the better team. Chambermaid seems to have forgotten that simple fact.

Let's hope that Bosox dreams, along with their fantasy-fiction articles, are curtailed in the future with the emphasis on factual journalism.

New York will win and for that I'm psyched. But for the third straight year I'll have to listen to Red Sox chants of "wait 'til next year!" Will they ever learn?

Do I Deserve It?

By Eric Kilburn

In one of life's least comfortable yet often most revealing circumstances, I recently found myself unable to reconcile two distinctly opposite points of view. Our philosophy class was discussing individual versus societal needs and one student contended that personal greed often obstructed basic societal necessities. When he cited the high cost of medical care (in Chittenden county a doctor's average annual income is $70,000) as frequently creating economic barriers to public health, he apparently struck a sensitive nerve in one of the class' pre-medical students, who quickly rallied to the defense. "I know $70,000 is a lot of money, but that's the price society is willing to pay," he said. "Besides, they (the doctors) have earned it."

It was the pre-medical student's last remark that caught my attention, because the phrases "they earned it" or "they deserve it" are two of our culture's commonest yet least-noticed expressions. The phrases are so ingrained in our minds as to go virtually unnoticed, yet their ego-gratifying connotations are subtly but effectively employed throughout our daily lives. For example, how often does one hear variations on the "earned it" theme entering into advertisements and conversations such as "Drink Chivas Regal – you've earned it" or "Man, I just studied two days straight for that chem test, and I aced it. Now I'm gonna get wasted – I deserve it." Despite the irony of rewarding one's labors with the destruction of a few brain cells, we often justify our pleasures with the rationale that they are somehow "deserved."

On the surface, one might be tempted to limit the "I've earned it" phenomenon to such contemporary individualistic fringe benefits as intoxicants, vacations, second homes, boats and other nonessential but relatively harmless items. However, a look into past and contemporary societal problems reveals many instances where the "we earned it" ideology directly contributed to the situation.

The discovery and subsequent colonization-exploitation of Africa and the so-called "New World" is perhaps history's most far reaching examples of "we deserved it." By sailing across an ocean and conquering indigenous populations, our European ancestors must have felt they had "earned" the right to do as they pleased with the land and people. A slave trade that lasted over 350 years provides ample if not inhuman testimony to the "earning" philosophy in action. Interestingly, it was the colonists' rejection of the "we earned it" system of taxation imposed by England which helped fuel the American revolution. By defending the colonies during the French and Indian wars, England felt it had "earned" the right to pass the expenses along by increasing taxes. A few rabble-rousers didn't buy the line however, and slogans like "No taxation without representation" sprang up. The rest is history.

Well, I Earned It.

Despite, or perhaps because of the pervasiveness of the "I deserve it" philosophy in contemporary American culture, we generally undertake a shallow and often condescending analysis of those who didn't "earn it." We reason that if the poor people of the Third World or north Burlington somehow tried harder, grew more, or otherwise bettered themselves, they too would receive their just desserts and all would be well.

The problem is, where does one delineate between "I deserve it" and "No, you took it" or "No, it was given to you." At what point does one person or group of people's interests prevent or step on someone else's basic needs. Food First authors Frances Lappe and Joseph Collins show how, in many cases, occurrences of malnutrition are related not to the desires or abilities of the people in question, but to who controls the land and food supply. In South and Central America, there is a widespread incidence of Vitamin A deficiency among the poor, not because the land won't grow crops with ample Vitamin A, but primarily because the land is controlled by people or companies who prefer to grow more lucrative crops (bananas, sugar cane and coffee are a few examples) for export. Have these powerful individuals and corporations "earned" the right to grow export crops, or have they in effect "taken" the ability to produce a healthy diet away from many of the native population?

It might be fairly argued that societal suppression of an individual's abilities to achieve results in frustration and reduced creativity. Again though, where does one distinguish between greed and need? In China, where a population nearly four times as large as the U.S.'s sustains itself on about one-half the arable land, the need to restrict personal greed is paramount if the country is to survive. In the U.S. we have far more money, art and color TV's per capita, yet there are probably more malnourished people here than in China (even if one denies that America's 70 million overweight people are malnourished). America also has more than 50,000 millionaires, people with more money than they will ever need to survive, who are the envy of our society. Although a large fraction of these people were either "given" their money by inheritance, or have "taken" their money by exploiting others, presumably at least a few have "earned it."

Perhaps it's only natural to pity those with too little and emulate those with too much, but if one holds to an ideal of global equity, justice and cooperation, the personal notion of "I deserve it" clearly needs reexamination. Many of us in college are currently living in or just coming out of "given" environments. For 18 years we were given a comfortable living situation, an elementary and secondary education, and now Mom and Dad (and ultimately society as a whole) pays the tuition. Soon we will be expected to earn what we were formerly given, and it is likely that many of us will fall into the "I earned it" rationalizations – and $70,000 salaries – of our predecessors. Ultimately, such a "me-first" attitude can only result in more of the same for an already sick society, and there are no guarantees of anything better if alternatives are taken. Still, one cannot help wondering.

A British Journalist once asked Gandhi what he thought of "Western Civilization." "I think it would be a good idea" replied the Indian philosopher-statesman. Obviously, an individual cannot singlehandedly change society, but if "Western Civilization" really does seem like a "good idea," looking at one's own attitudes and lifestyle is an excellent place to begin.

Buying Power

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

This week's cover story on student buying power is largely the result of a survey completed last year by St. Michael's College instructor John N. Carvellas. The response rate obtained during the study was quite high, Carvellas said, bringing in completed questionnaires from a large majority of St. Mike's students.

Nearly all of the state's colleges and universities are currently cooperating in the completion of studies similar to Carvellas', including UVM. Unfortunately, Fred Curran, the director of Institutional Studies at the University, said UVM's is far from complete as much of the raw data has to be further tabulated and correlated.

Last fall semester, however, a group from a UVM marketing research class did a study similar to the one being completed by Institutional Studies, only the group, because they were students, were able to go a step beyond where most such studies go. The study asked how much students spend on illicit drugs.

In addition, the study examined the differences between on- and off-campus students as to their comparative spending patterns as well as a comparison between male and female students.

The study completed by the four students was researched through telephone interviews with 150 UVMers. The results of this study are likely to be less accurate than those that will eventually be obtained by the University because the random sample size was relatively small, yet many of the statistics are in the same "ball park" as the similar studies. Part of the reason they are being printed here is that the statistics obtained on the purchases of marijuana and cocaine are rather high – and staggering to some.

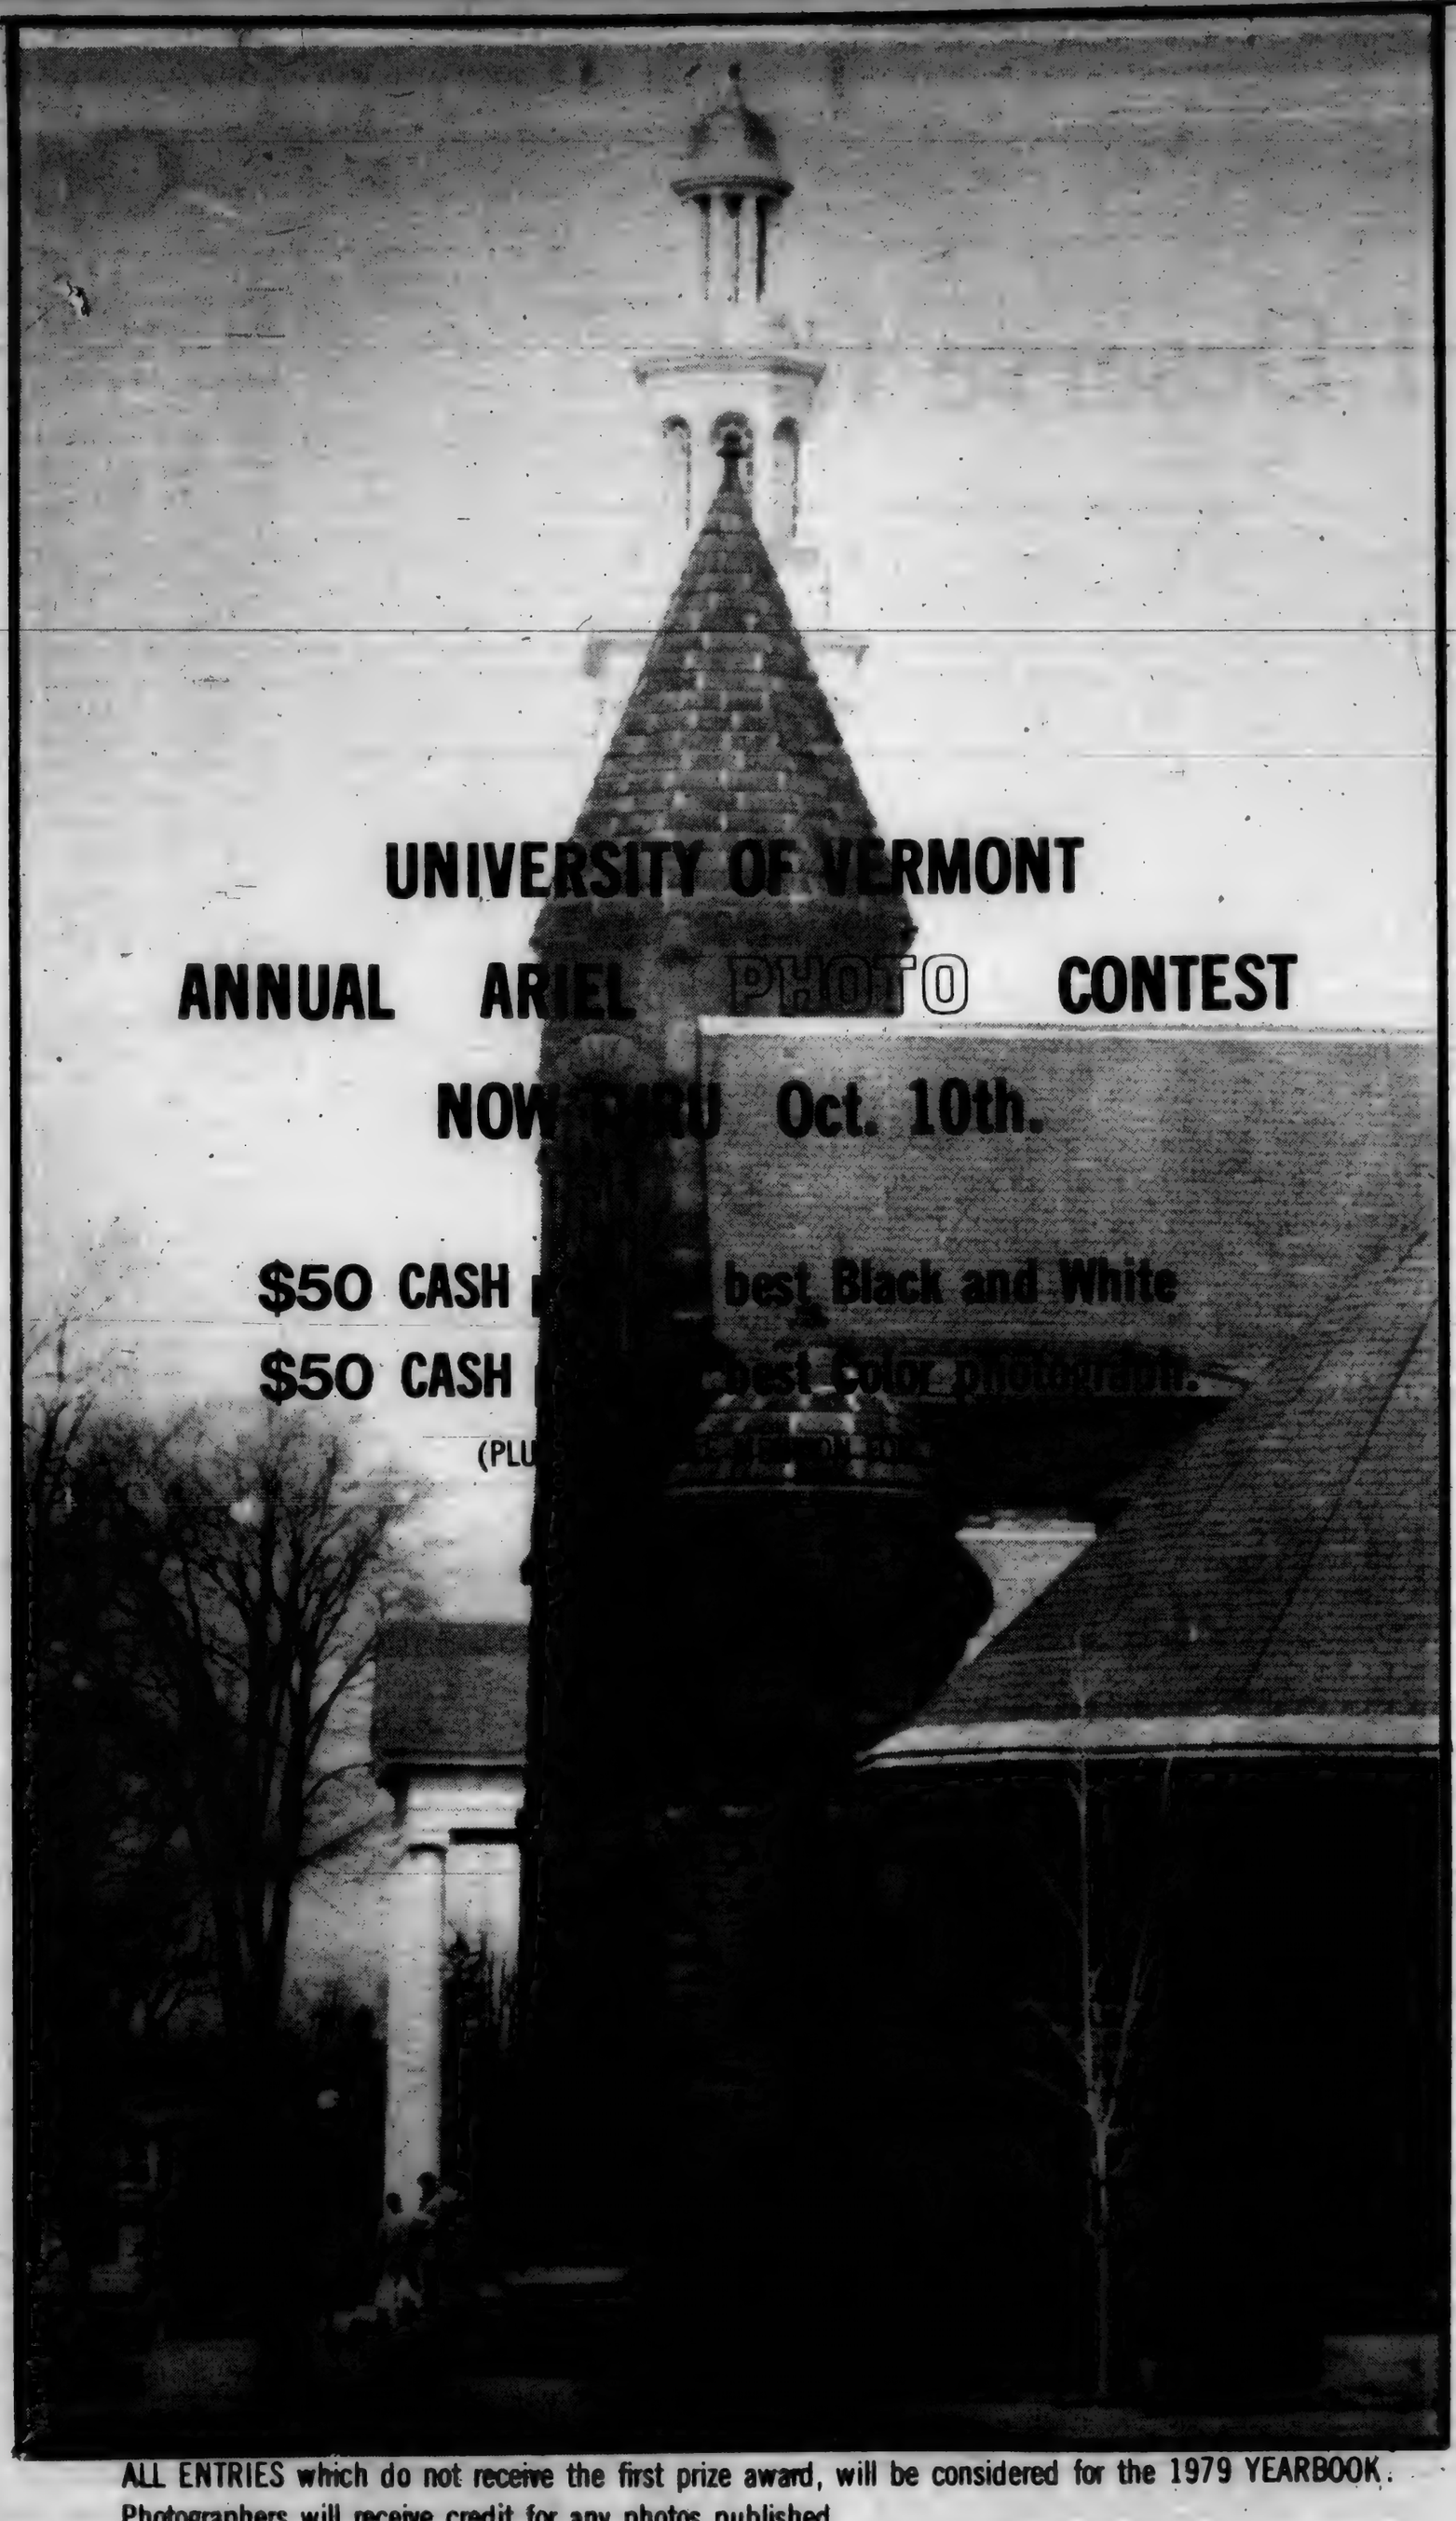
Overall, the study estimated that over the course of four months (one semester), each student, on the average, spent $19.53 on cocaine and $43 on marijuana. Given the total number of people who were full-time matriculating students that semester (the universe used) at UVM, the total amount of money spent on cocaine in a semester at UVM was $146,475. On marijuana, the corresponding figure was $323,250.

Other drugs that were included in the survey, but which yielded lower results, were amphetamines, barbituates and hallucinogens.

For amphetamines (i.e. speed, etc.) the amount spent per student was $4 per semester, and for all students, the amount was $29,400. The amounts for barbituates and hallucinogens were $1.29 and $.27, respectively, for each student per semester. For all students, the amounts for the latter two drugs were $9,675 and $2,025.

It goes without saying that not everyone surveyed buys such drugs or was willing to reveal such figures, the survey says, and that in the case of cocaine, there was apparently only a small percentage of people spending most of the money.

The summary of the study has some interesting comparisons between the individual stratified samples used in breaking down the raw data into useable figures, though.



It concludes: "As had been initially hypothesized, most students spend about $1,000 per semester in all categories combined. Overall, males spend about $1,061 per semester and females spend about $919. This trend where males were the biggest spenders remained consistent in all categories except clothing and public transportation. In the clothing category, females outspent males by more than two times."

"While in most instances males outspent females regardless of whether or not they lived on campus (except in the two previously mentioned categories), the on-campus female also outspent the on-campus male in the categories of amphetamines and barbituates. Additionally, the off-campus female outspent the off-campus male in Saga coupon books, records, clothing and public transportation."

"Earnings, as would be expected because of the expenditure patterns, were higher for males in both the on- and off-campus categories."

"The on-campus student, including both males and females, outspends the off-campus student in total expenditures: $1,067 to $912. Part of this high expense for the on-campus student results from the average housing cost (includes heat, etc.) of $443 as compared to $371 for the off-campus student. (Here, figures for the on-campus student were taken from the amount charged by Residential Life.) Overall, the off-campus students were earning approximately four times as much as the on-campus student, although this does not take into account unearned income, from home, for example."

"To generalize," the study concludes, "off-campus students tend to spend more in bars, groceries, phone bills, restaurants, clothing, gasoline, public transportation, the theatre, movies, concerts, most illicit drugs, and less in housing and Saga coupons. These latter two categories account for the fact that, on the whole, the on-campus student does spend more than the off-campus student."

ALL ENTRIES which do not receive the first prize award, will be considered for the 1979 YEARBOOK. Photographers will receive credit for any photos published.

RULES:

- ★ Photos must be transparencies or glossies - no flat prints will be judged
- ★ Subject matter must be representative of UVM - i.e. recognizable UVM people, places or things

Politics Meet Music at the Martha's Vineyard No Nukes ! Festival

By Jim Oakes

The Clamshell Alliance surfaced again last weekend, this time on Martha's Vineyard. 6,000 people and Carly Simon were brought together in an effort to rally support for the planned blockade of the ship that will deliver the Seabrook reactor vessel to the nuclear plant site.

Appearing before Simon at the Martha's Vineyard No Nukes! Festival were John Hall, of Orleans fame, Kate Taylor, Alex Taylor, and the Pousette-Dart Band.

The crowd, sun-drenched and relaxed, experienced spirited performances by all the musicians starting with the Pousette-Dart Band, joined by John Hall, and continuing through the final encore led by the sensuous Carly Simon. While the rumor of a surprise appearance by James Taylor never materialized, Simon's performance was so captivating that no one seemed dissatisfied.

From the beginning, the No Nukes! Festival was a curious affair. Martha's Vineyard has never held such a large scale event. In addition to the standard bottle-neck at the ferry, most islanders feel their home has been raped and pillaged by a summer of tourist traffic. How an anti-nuclear music festival was ever approved in the first place is still a mystery. Peter Simon, Carly's brother, Clamsheller and island resident, was obviously instrumental in the project.

Given the Clamshell Alliance record of confrontation, albeit peaceful, and the spectre of rock concert riots, one would think island residents, with no profits to be made, would be singularly opposed to the event. Not so. While no ready explanations exist, perhaps the anti-nuclear movement is at least tacitly supported by Vineyard residents.

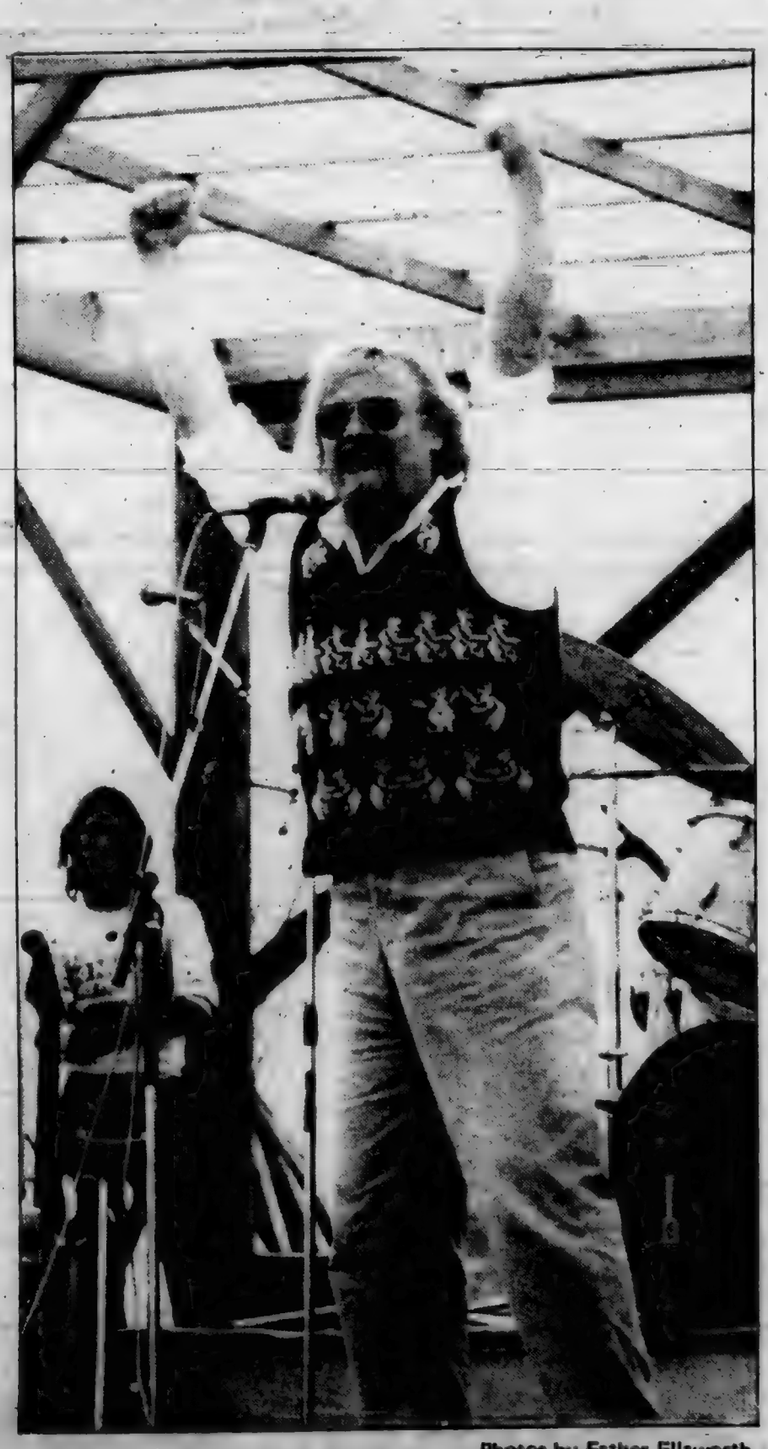
After the concert opened with a collection of local talent, the Pousette-Dart Band, led by vocalist John Pousette-Dart, played a rapid-fire set. Between numbers jammed with John Hall, Pousette-Dart stepped lightly into the political atmosphere which surrounded the festival, saying, "There are only two things this band doesn't like. The first is nuclear power plants, the second is disco!"

During the set break, Sam Lovejoy spoke to the crowd. He was, in his own words, bringing "politics to a cultural event." Speaking voraciously about the alliance and unity of oppressed peoples, the anti-nuke movement and the Seabrook blockade, Lovejoy made the point that "civil disobedience is making a statement with your body, not just your mouth!" Lovejoy is an expert at such statements.

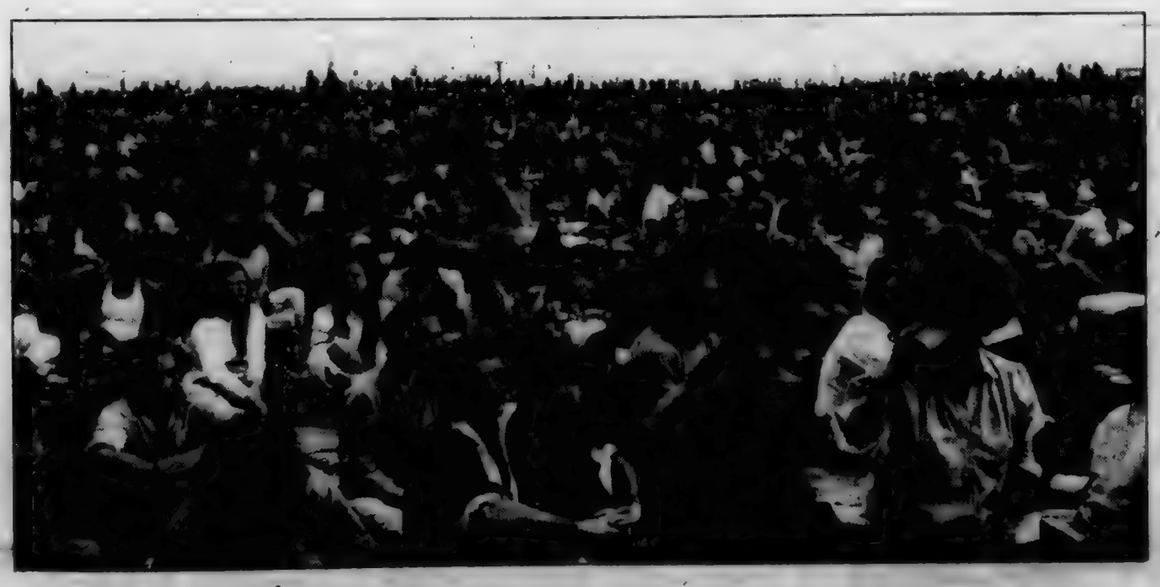
Anyone familiar with the documentary movie Sam Lovejoy's Nuclear War will remember Lovejoy as the father of guerilla warfare in the anti-nuclear movement. A decade ago, Lovejoy single-handedly tipped over a giant steel tower which carried transmission lines from a Massachusetts nuclear power plant by unbolting the support cables. Costing the utility company a massive amount of money and delaying the opening of the plant for months, Lovejoy avoided conviction through a legal foul-up after turning himself in! When Sam Lovejoy cryptically announced last weekend, "One way or another we're going to stop that Seabrook Nuke – the blockade is the next step," the crowd cheered.

Kate Taylor followed Lovejoy's speech, backed up by Hall's band and joined by John Hall midway through the set. Relaxed, tracing her tongue lusciously around her puckered lips between songs, Kate Taylor ranged freely between traditional rhythm and blues and her original compositions.

Brother Alex took the stage after Kate, also backed up by Hall and his band. John Hall proved to be the cohesive force of the day, playing with everybody. In complete contrast to the rest of the Taylors, Alex is a wild man! No other word fits. He looks like a biker, he screams his blues, and he is fond of kicking mike stands and throwing his enormous bulk high into the air. Joined by the harp player from the Jimmy Buffet band, Alex Taylor cooked through his set. Pounding the stage mercilessly, slugging beer and exhorting the musicians around him, Alex Taylor belted out the blues in the style of early Paul Butterfield. The crowd didn't quite know how to react to Taylor's performance. Taken aback by the wild man's howls, the mellow crowd at least appreciated his unflagging spirit.



Hall took the stage after Alex Taylor, or rather remained on stage; he had been there most of the day. Playing old and new material interspersed with Orleans' hits, Hall's voice made it through the solo portion of the set but seemed a little strained after four hours of use. Hall's excellent guitar playing was backed up vocally first by Kate Taylor and then by Pousette-Dart. After sitting in with everybody else, Hall played an excellent set of his own – his energy and staying power was incredible.



After a smoking stretch of music, the audience was subjected to a forceful speech by Australian Doctor Helen Cauldicott on the dangers of nuclear bombs, power and waste. Graphically descriptive on topics ranging from thalaidomide to cystic fibrosis, Dr. Cauldicott pounded home her point in no uncertain terms. "Plutonium is the worst thing

Feat Fever

A stubbornly original rock and roll band, Little Feat has been known to respond to enthusiastic audiences

By Pablo Conrad

With the first concert of the season now only a day away, the excitement that is so often a measure of success in rock and roll productions is spreading rapidly throughout the UVM community.

At the same time, S.A. Concert Bureau chairman Pat Butler, who spoke with members of the Little Feat tour last week, reports that the six piece Los Angeles band is "psyched" for this stop on a tremendously successful fall tour.

Coming out of the American rock and roll tradition in the early Seventies, Little Feat has remained stubbornly original, drawing almost exclusively on the songwriting talents of its own members. They are Lowell George on guitar and vocals, keyboard player Billy Payne, guitarist Paul Barrere, Sam Clayton on percussion, and Kenny Gradney and Richie Hayward on bass and drums respectively. With the release of their live double album Waiting for Columbus this year, Little Feat has finally started to enjoy some of the widespread acclaim it deserves.

Little Feat blows into town this Friday.

Since the release of Little Feat in 1971, (with slightly different personnel) the band has proven again and again their ability to write, play, and produce the kind of music that stays surprisingly fresh and exciting without borrowing from earlier successes. This may be attributed to the fact that Little Feat was never intended to be just another rock band on AM radio, but rather a group of musicians dedicated to the pleasure and quality of their own music. The level of their musicianship can be judged partly by the demand for their energies on albums by such diverse types as Bonnie Raitt, Frank Zappa and Jackson Browne.

Since establishing themselves as masters of their own unique rock and roll style on Sailing Shoes (1972) and Dixie Chicken (1973), they began to move into new territory, incorporating a looser funkier feel on their fourth effort, Feats Don't Fail Me Now. Recorded in 1974 with the help of Bonnie Raitt, Emmylou Harris and Van Dyke Parks, the album proved to be a greater success on rock and pop charts with its raw "Oh, Atlanta" and "Rock and Roll Doctor." By then, observant fans had noticed Lowell George and Billy Payne turning up on other albums, their sly funky influences heard throughout Bonnie Raitt's excellent "Takin' My Time," along with Paul Barrere and Sam Clayton. Bill Payne is a regular on Bonnie's studio dates now, lending his keyboard talents on Home Plate and Sweet Forgiveness.

Opening the Friday night show at Patrick Gymnasium will be Craig Fuller and Eric Kaz. Fuller, who founded the Pure Prairie League in 1969 and penned their top forty hit, "Amie," is a fine singer/songwriter and guitarist. His clean, warm vocals and guitar work distinguished Pure Prairie League's first two albums. Eric Kaz is known mostly for his accurate sensitive songwriting, creating "Love Has No Pride," "I'm Blowing Away," "Cry Like A Rainstorm," and "Gambling Man." His songs have been recorded by Bonnie Raitt, Linda Ronstadt, Joan Baez, and Tom Rush. Having worked together in the band American Flyer, Kaz and Fuller had always wanted to do an album of their own, and this summer their collaboration produced the LP Craig Fuller/Eric Kaz on Columbia Records.

Kaz and Fuller will open together at eight o'clock and play a short set, eventually combining with members of Little Feat, to jam before leaving the stage to the main attraction.

The seating at the gym will be similar to that of last spring's Grateful Dead concert with floor and bleacher seats facing the stage directly. Limited seating will also be available in bleachers with a rear view of the band. According to S.A. Concert Bureau chairman Pat Butler, a few cancelled reservations are opening up some good floor locations, but seats will be limited on the night of the concert.

Tickets are still on sale at the Grassemount ticket office. For further information, purchasers are advised to call the Lane Series information number 656-3418.

As Butler put it, Little Feat is known to respond to enthusiastic audiences and to judge from the Feat fever on campus this week, the Friday night show should be excellent.

Contrasts: Larry Carlton at Mead Chapel

"We flew to some town yesterday from LA and drove up into some beautiful trees and the doctor said I was cool, and well, it's good to be here."

By Pablo Conrad

Jazz guitarist Larry Carlton broke loose Friday night at Middlebury's Mead Chapel, escaping from the confines of slick studio style and venturing into the wilds of an uninhibited jam.

Best known for his tastefully restrained session work as member/guest of the Crusaders, Steely Dan, and more recently with Joni Mitchell, the twenty-seven year old Los Angeles guitarist treated listeners to a wider range of styles than was evident in his guest appearances.

Smiling back at his band and swaying with his own relaxed rhythm playing, Carlton immediately went into his instrumental version of the Steely Dan hit, "Peg." It was soon apparent that the pleasure of this rare live performance was to be appreciated not only by the audience but by Carlton as well. "We flew to some town yesterday from LA and drove up into some beautiful trees and the doctor said I was cool, and well, it's good to be here," Carlton said. As he stepped back from the mike, the band fell into the punch and swing of "I Don't Know," a cut from the Gap Mangione LP Suite Lady, on which Carlton is credited with production and engineering as well as some instrumental and arranging work. At the Chapel, the tune showcased the studio veteran's well-rehearsed and enthusiastic band, Greg Matheson on keyboards, John Ferraro on drums and New England bass player Neil Stubenhouse.

Onstage, the concentration on a tight ensemble performance was impressive. Carlton delivered the long sustaining guitar lines that are his trademark and then dropped back altogether to listen to an exuberant bass solo. In the breathless moment following "I Don't Know," Carlton introduced his band and told the audience simply "We're almost warmed up."

That was the only introduction to a series of unexpected contrasts that surprised a crowd geared more toward the slick Los Angeles jazz style heard on Carlton's work with other artists.

A driving rock introduction was the first: Carlton totally uninhibited, poured out a searing lead and then stepping back to a chattering organ break, melodic and heavily percussive, while the others surged on behind him. Initially taken aback by this unrestrained exhileration, the audience responded heartily. Carlton, beaming at his band, came to the microphone joking, "This is supposed to be a jazz band, right?"

After a pause to tune up and banter with the increasingly vocal crowd, ("I have to preach, since we're in church,") chanting "Uh, uh, a k'ch'ka, uh, uh," and clapping steadily, he coaxed the audience to join in. The band took up what was likely the most charged piece of funk they played. Again, contrast was what came through the most, Carlton moving from coy riffing with eyes closed and lips smiling, to a rippling take-care-of-business climax, rocking gently to the tense, solid rhythm behind him.

Part of the guitar style that is so distinctively Carlton's are the near vocal-sounding sustained notes that, with the aid of a manual volume pedal, dip and bend around the chords being played. At times almost too delicate to be associated with electric guitar, the style is Larry Carlton at his most expressive.

While the hour long set and the ensuing encores shifted easily between languid jazz and occasionally excessive levels of funk, a high point came when Carlton introduced the Miles Davis tune "All Blues," from Miles' 1962 Kind of Blue LP. Opening with a thoughtful and subdued electric piano introduction by Matheson, Carlton and the others waited attentively before taking it up together. For ten minutes, guitar and keyboard alternated an exploration of a piece from that period whose influences showed in their fluid graces and sometimes tense phrasing.

Almost as soon as the last notes of "All Blues" had faded, Carlton was at the front of the stage again, this time to start the solid dance feel of Average White Band's "Put It Where You Want It." Opening with Matheson's sailing organ lead, the band had again abruptly changed gears and rapidly built up to a near crescendo, with Matheson's keyboards stuttering and percussive against the rampant bass and drums, and the terse chording of Carlton's Gibson hollow body.

After telling the ecstatic audience about having to play in Syracuse the next day, "We're going there tomorrow, bet it's not as hip as here," Carlton stormed into another driving blues to close the night. Although he seemed to give himself over entirely on his soloing, bent at the waist, pushing a string past the playing point and then playing on without it, no one expected him to leave without an encore. The set had been brief, only an hour, and when the band left the stage, the standing ovation rapidly became more demanding until they returned, still glowing from the last song.

Working through three more songs broken only by another brief attempt to leave and another standing ovation, Carlton asked, "Are you sure this is how Pat Metheny got started?" and included a quiet blues, answering a request for him to sing. Although irritated by a sore throat, his mellow plaintive voice carried him through; apparently, he appreciated the request enough to ignore doctor's orders.

Building up out of the innocuous blues lyric, Carlton played a strong, emotional solo, reaching each note further out and approaching the brassy powerful sound of a soprano sax. By this time the deceptively well-groomed and attentive audience had been worked up to whistles and shouts, more of a rock concert atmosphere than the staid Mead Chapel had held earlier. Leading into a complementary rocking build-up, the banter and excitement between crowd and stage showed its effect on the music. The band took turns with the tune, Matheson switching easily between piano, synthesizer and organ, Stubenhouse climaxing his bass solo, and Carlton's guitar crying and crackling with soul.

Part of the joy of the Friday night show was the obvious pleasure that Larry Carlton took in playing at Middlebury for a relatively small and enthusiastic audience. The clean, airy quality of Mead Chapel and the relaxed atmosphere of a small event were ideal for performer and listener equally. The overall feeling was that it had been a rare and special evening.

'Passion of Dracula' a Biting Social Commentary

By Judie Yuill

Flashes of lightning, a good deal of thunder, and an abundance of sinister fog were all prevalent in Saturday night's performance of the Lane Series Dracula.

The show opened as Dr. Cedric Seward, head physician of an insane asylum, was lamenting the curious affliction of his niece, Wilhelmina Murray. The lovely Wilhelmina had become subject to screaming fits and eerie trances of late and no one, not even Professor Van Helsing or Dr. Helga Van Zandt, was able to diagnose her illness.

Of course she is under the spell of the dreaded villain Count Dracula, a new face in the neighborhood who has been terrorizing the villagers by ripping out the throats of their wives and daughters. This does not become evident until later in the play, and consequently, there is opportunity for jabbing bits of social commentary concerning newly discovered Freudian psychology and the chauvinistic attitudes of twentieth century England.

Bits of humor ran unevenly throughout the play until one wondered if it was necessary for anyone to try and be funny. Humor and melodrama are difficult to combine and often produce a tongue in cheek effect where none is intended. This was the case in Dracula, and it detracted time and again from the suspense of the play.

Jose Greco as Dracula made his entrance with plenty of poise and dignity, and even swooped his cape a couple of times as a real villain should. But he lacked mystique. Greco had the face, voice, and body of the Count, but never projected the basic evil necessary to personify the Prince of Darkness. There were many attempts at special effects, ranging from the bloody demise of Dr. Helga Van Zandt to the appearance of a large bat, presumably Dracula himself, that flew out over the stage at the end of the second act. Unfortunately, none of this horror was cohesive enough to be truly convincing.

When the third act began, there were only three really strong performances left in the play. Lynn Watson was excellent as the beautiful and tormented Wilhelmina, and Jim Stubbs was sincere and endearing as her beloved Jonathan Harker. Kevin McCalrnon gave an outstanding performance as Mr. Renfield, an inmate at the insane asylum whose unerring devotion to the Count added enormously to the suspenseful pace of the play. At the end of the third act, when a stake has finally been driven through the monster's evil heart, Renfield's grief alone really touches the audience. Aside from that and the reunion of the two lovers, there just wasn't much else for the audience to become involved in.

By Mary Casale & Louise Jaqua

A special spirit encompasses the works of the Vermont Photo Group on exhibit at the Francis Colburn Gallery starting October 2nd. Underlying the retrospective is a group of artists interested in sharing and generating new ideas and techniques. For one year now, the group has held informal meetings to discuss and criticize each other's work.

The eight members bring together a variety of distinct influences. Some special interests to be seen will include: works done with a Diana camera, portraiture, natural environments, human figure studies and works inspired by photographer Ralph Gibson.

The artists have chosen to remain anonymous, because they feel the works will undoubtedly speak for themselves. "There will be no 'stars'," said one of the artists. "We want to get away from names. The works are what's important." The group energy inherent in this collection of artists promises to make the show an inspiration for all. The community is invited to sip and chat with the artists at their reception on Wednesday, October 4th from 5–7 p.m. The gallery is, otherwise, open daily from 9 a.m. – 5 p.m. Please come by!

THE ROCKY HORROR PICTURE SHOW

By Peter Wentworth

Not so long ago in the galaxy of Transsexual, on the planet Transylvania, lived a race of people who enjoyed: (1) Incest – a game the whole family can play; (2) Bisexuality – doubles the chance of a date Saturday; and (3) Leather – the newest in spring fascism.

This inhibited civilization has been documented in The Rocky Horror Picture Show, probably the greatest cult movie ever produced. The film includes some excellent acting by a cast of unknowns and the reputation of being the only film in which the audience participates. If you plan to see Rocky Horror plan to take rice, water pistols, newspaper, toast, and, for those really into it, costumes similar to those found in the film.

The Rocky Horror Show is a parody of the late 50's horror movies, Charles Atlas courses, and musicals, co-mingled to produce an outrageous sexual screen play.

The two All-American characters – Brad and Janet – find themselves in need of help when a flat tire leaves them stranded in the woods. The only light for miles is from the castle of Dr. Frank N. Futer (Tim Curry) who appears on the scene wearing panties, lace stockings and a leather vest. Our couple – Brad and Janet – witness the creation of Frank N. Futer's diabolical monster, Rocky Horror (Rayner Bourton). "I've been making a man with blonde hair and a tan and he's good for relieving my tension," Futer says. Brad and Janet are accomodated for the night by Frank N. Futer. This entails a midnight visit by their host, who creates a new sexual awareness for the once sheltered couple. Frank N. Futer completes several sexual fantasies in his private domain before being disposed of by the butler and his sister, upon which the entire castle returns to the planet Transylvania. Meatloaf makes a cameo appearance as a frustrated punk, who supplies Rocky Horror with a brain, but is quickly murdered by Frank N. Futer and served for dinner.

Tim Curry (Frankenfuter) provides an excellent performance; he also played the same role in the unsuccessful British stage version after which the film is modeled. In addition to his powerful vocals, his portrayal of Frank N. Futer is nearly flawless.

The music to the Rocky Horror Show is catchy and one quickly notices the enthusiastic audience singing along to most of the score. The film has a devoted following. In fact, the record attendance, by one person from Yale, is reported to be about 120 times.

"The most interesting aspect of The Rocky Horror Show is the audience's role in the film- they are part of it. The opening scene at the wedding calls for rice throwing by the entire audience so bring along a little Uncle Ben's unless you plan to render yourself defenseless."

The most interesting aspect of the Rocky Horror Show is the audience's role in the film – they are part of it. The opening scene at a wedding calls for rice throwing by the entire audience so bring along a little Uncle Ben's unless you plan to render yourself defenseless. A rainstorm is simulated by a squirt gun douse and newspaper is placed over the head to simulate the heroine's own alternative to getting wet. The birth of Rocky Horror calls for a toast, so naturally the crowd tosses burnt bread around the theatre. Each character is developed by the audience as they scream "asshole" before Brad says any line and "wise" (Janet's last name) precedes the heroine's dialogue. Pauses in the dialogue are accented by audience prodding, "Go ahead, say it."

For those people who have not experienced the Rocky Horror Show, it is hard to describe the film. The music, story, acting and audience are all of superb quality. And for those of us who have, let's do the time warp again!

Bringin' Back That Old–Time Bluegrass

Dealers Choice plays for an attentive crowd in City Hall Park.

Dealer's Choice: A Musical Full House

By Tom Daniels

On a late and sunny summer afternoon, the three men and two women of Dealer's Choice treated an attentive crowd to an acoustic concert in City Hall Park. Despite the droning of a nearby bulldozer, the five musicians played on without fluster and with the patient determination which has seen Dealer's Choice rise in popularity and overcome personnel changes. Keeping a band together is no simple task; booking, traveling, and just getting by can take the toll of even the most talented.

Since opening at Hunt's last December, Dealer's Choice has been playing an array of smooth, fresh country-bluegrass tunes. Fans often compare Dealer's Choice with Burlington's well-known country-bluegrass band, Pine Island.— The similarities are no coincidence. Dan Mahoney, a former Pine Islander, used his Dobro and silver voice to help found Dealer's Choice. Last spring Mahoney departed and was replaced by ex-Pine Island banjo stand-out Gordon Stone. Stone, one of the finest pickers in New England, also plays pedal steel and is an exciting soloist.

But Dealer's Choice has its own distinct style and repertoire. Rhythm guitarist Nancy Beaven offers a superb clear voice with great range as evidenced best in "Muleskinner Blues." Andy Sacher shows the speed and experience on mandolin of a pro who has been making his living at music for the past ten years. When Mahoney left, Sacher deftly took over as stage leader and male vocalist. On acoustic bass and back-up vocals is the steady, reliable Lynn MacSata. "This summer, we got our rhythm section of Nancy, Andy and myself really together to give a solid foundation," Lynn explained. "It's hard to lose band members; it leaves a gap. But it's good to have new people and new ideas; it helps you grow."

In mid-summer, fiddler Gene White departed to form the Birdland Quartet, a jazz-swing emsemble. After a short search, the band found Roy "Chubby" Feldman who was fiddling with Colcannon, a group specializing in folk music of the British Isles. Feldman has been "adapting well" to the bluegrass style and headed into the fall, Dealer's Choice sounds tight and ready to take off.

"We're always looking for new material to create 'The Perfect Repertoire'," says Sacher. Then with a laugh he points a finger, "I want to make it clear that we're not a Gospel Band. We do a few gospel tunes, but we're not into religion." The Dealer's Choice repertoire features a pleasing mix of dancing and listening numbers. Some songs are adapted to bluegrass such as the Rolling Stones' "No Expectations." Others are originals, and some are old standards.

Dealer's Choice plans to stick together and "pursue what we've started." Business is good in the summer with dates at weddings, festivals, and clubs. Winter is the lean time when even a love of music may not see musicians through. Stone smiled and summed it up, "Romance without finance is a nuisance." Sacher has a dream to take the band to England and Ireland. "I hear our kind of music is popular over there," he said. Well Sacher, it's popular here too.

Joe Val and the New England Bluegrass Boys: Staunch Traditionalists With a Slick Style

By Diana Greene

Dressed in black polyester slacks, multi-colored western shirts, and pointed cock-roach killin' boots, Joe Val and his New England Bluegrass boys seemed a little too spiffed-up for the casual gathering at Mt. Greenery Fortunately, Joe and the Boys' slick talent surpassed their outfits by leaps and bounds, because if it hadn't, they really would have looked like four left-overs from the Lawrence Welk Show.

They began their first set with a slow love song that warmed-up the audience with its soft harmonics and lullaby quality, a tasteful beginning. From here they moved right along to the well-known Gallic tune, "The Red Haired Boy," which, incidentally, has received its fame from having over 172 titles.

After these two songs, the bass player felt compelled to explain their uniformed attire to their fans. The bass player, a small man with an outrageous mustache that extended from one side-burn clear across to the other, explained, "We don't usually dress this way. We were just so impressed that we all actually had matching clothes, that we all just had to wear 'em." From left stage the banjo player added, "If you want one of your own, mail away to Sears & Roebuck," "they're cheap," cried another unidentified member. This sense of humor and genuine comaraderie prevailed throughout the concert and definitely added a special touch to their already fine performance.

Joe Val, the oldest member of the band as well as "a nice guy to boot," played his mandolin like the dickens, particularly in the simple-lyriced love song, "Tiny Broken Heart." His mandolin playing was good, but his tenor voice was hot. Not only could Val bring any softy to tears with his puppy dog eyes and touching love songs, he could hoot like a mad man on the run, as he did in the tune "Good-bye Ole' Pal."

The other members of the band weren't all bad either. Mr. Guitar Man himself, Dave Dillon (commonly known as "Dillon") gave a few swift licks over the frets of his acoustic guitar to prove his commanding style. Paul Silvius, the banjo player who looks like a cop, kept his talents in the background until finally he broke loose in the last part of the second set. Eric Anderson, on the stand-up bass, was not only the funny man and MC for the band, but on top of this he could also play a mean bass. Anderson has some of the most flexible fingers this side of the Mississippi; they just bounced on and off the strings with an unnatural amount of ease.

Joe Val and the bluegrass Boys stuck to the traditional bluegrass style playing good ole' time music. The concert was filled with gospel songs like "Back We Shall Rise," some old bluegrass standards like "Fox On The Run," some classics like "Little Birdie," and even a countrified version of the Beatles tune "Paperback Writer." The band featured their newest record "Country Blues," which except for their commercialized promo type version of "Paperback Writer," was excellent. But that tune was something their record company made them do, so they are excused.

They ended the show on a sweet note, closing with "I've Got a Never-ending Love for You," the finishing touch. The crowd instantly stood up and gave this group their well-deserved round of applause. Joe Val and the New England bluegrass scooted right back on stage to share two more tunes, satisfying their already faithful fans.

"The band featured their newest record 'Country Blues,' which, except for their commercialized promo type version of 'Paperback Writer,' was excellent. But that tune was something their record company made them do, so they are excused."

Cookin' With the Faculty Quartet

By S. R. Hammer

Echoes of Haydn Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky hovered about the walks and corridors of Redstone Campus Friday night as the University of Vermont String Quartet treated a sizeable recital hall audience to one and a half hours of Austrian, German, and Russian melodies.

Lulling us all with their sonorous serenades were Thomas "Larry" Read, leading the musicians on first violin, his wife Evelyn following on second violin, Roger Gillim filling in the tenor line on viola and Peter Brown holding it all together on cello.

The quartet began their recital with F. J. Haydn's Quartet in C Major, op. 74, no. 1, written in 1793 near the end of the master's life. The group got off to a slow start in the opening Allegro Moderato, but soon pulled together and presented a firm, controlled Andantino Grazioso. A lifting Menuetto followed, and a concluding Finale demonstrated some of the technique the players are all capable of, particularly in the sixteenth note passages.

After the light and happy Haydn followed a moody, profound Beethoven – in this case, his Quartet in A Major, op. 18, no. 5, a relatively early work written between the years 1798 and 1800. These opus 18 quartets are most known for the way they demonstrate Haydn's influence on motif development, but the net result is, of course, an unmistakable Beethoven. The first movement, Allegro, contained a beautiful folk song – like melody which the ensemble sang right out.

The ensuing Menuetto, with its thematic duet between the two violins and its heavy minor modulation, was executed with vitality and sensitivity. The following Andante Cantabile was as gorgeous as the previous movement, played very convincingly by all. The closing Allegro proved slightly [illegible] but the movement contrasted with the other to produce a lovely Beethoven balance of melodies.

After intermission the quartet concludes with Tchaikowsky's Quartet [illegible] Major, op. 11. Moderato semplice held its own as an introduction to the work, but the big movements were the second and third. Andante Cantabile, together with Larry Read, rendered a great [illegible] chock full of nostalgic and majestic Russian melody. The Allegro non tanto e con fuoco was captivating, using an intriguing first theme that alternated with the others. The final movement, Allegro giusto, wrapped up this unearthly quartet, with the ensemble handling the impressive climactic finish with vigor. Thus the UVM quartet's season premiere was concluded and, as the audience's reaction well attested, it was a concert much worth attending.

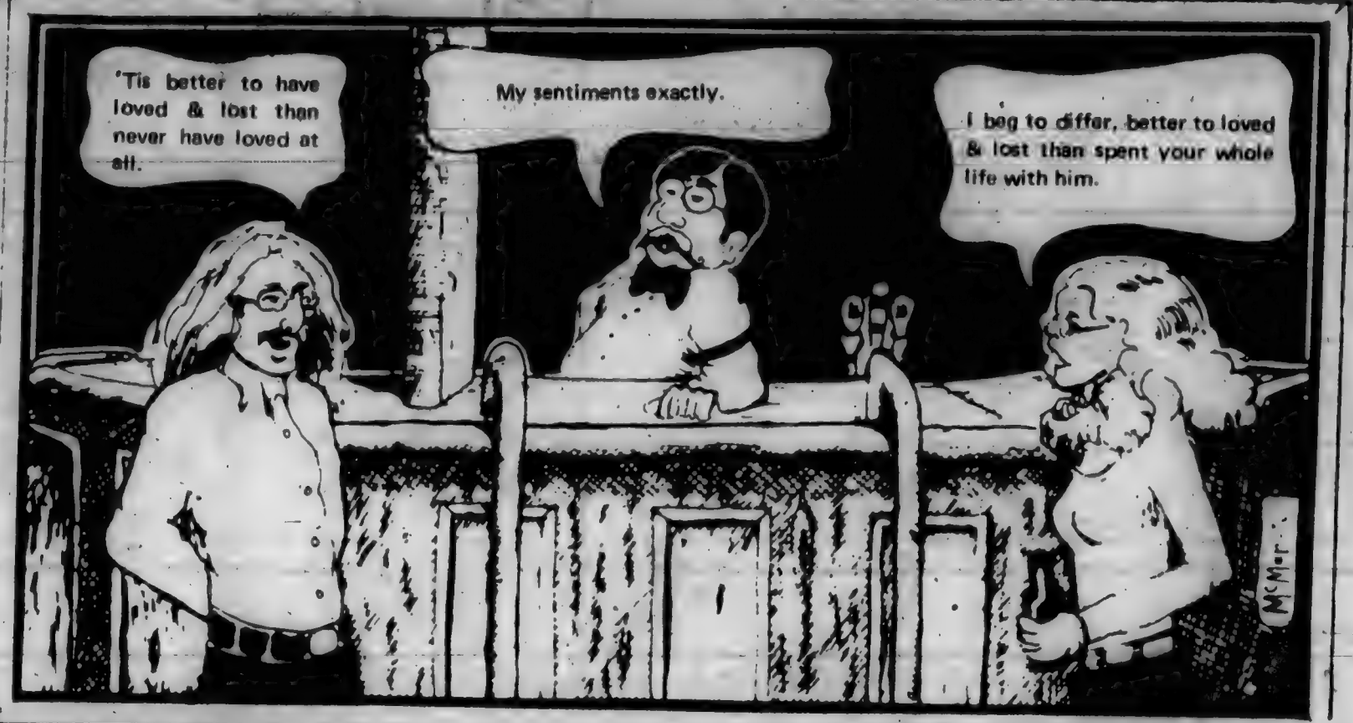
Eugene Fodor to Highlight First Lane Series, V.S.O. Concert

Saturday, September 30, 1978 marks a very special day in Burlington's cultural life, for it is the first joint concert of the Vermont Symphony Orchestra and the George Bishop Lane Series. America's oldest state symphony becomes an integral part of the State of Vermont's finest cultural program when it hosts violinist Eugene Fodor in Memorial Auditorium.

The partnership of the Lane Series and the Vermont Symphony is perhaps the single most important new feature of the 1978-79 Lane Series Season. It marks the joining together of Vermont's two largest and most significant cultural programs in a four concert series that will include performances by UVM's own Elizabeth Metcalfe, Judith Raskin and Charles Bressler in a complete performance of Haydn's The Creation and finally, the first Vermont visit by the man who has been described as "hands down, America's greatest composer," Aaron Copland.

The Vermont Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1934 by Dr. Alan Carter and was designated by the Vermont legislature as the official state orchestra in 1939. Efrain Guigui was chosen to succeed Carter in 1974, coming from the Casals Festival in Puerto Rico where he conducted a series of contemporary music concerts. Guigui (pronounced Gee gee) graduated with high honors from the Municipal Conservatory of Buenos Aires and immediately began to work with such great conductors as Herbert Von Karajan, Wilhelm Furtwangler and the legendary Otto Klemperer.

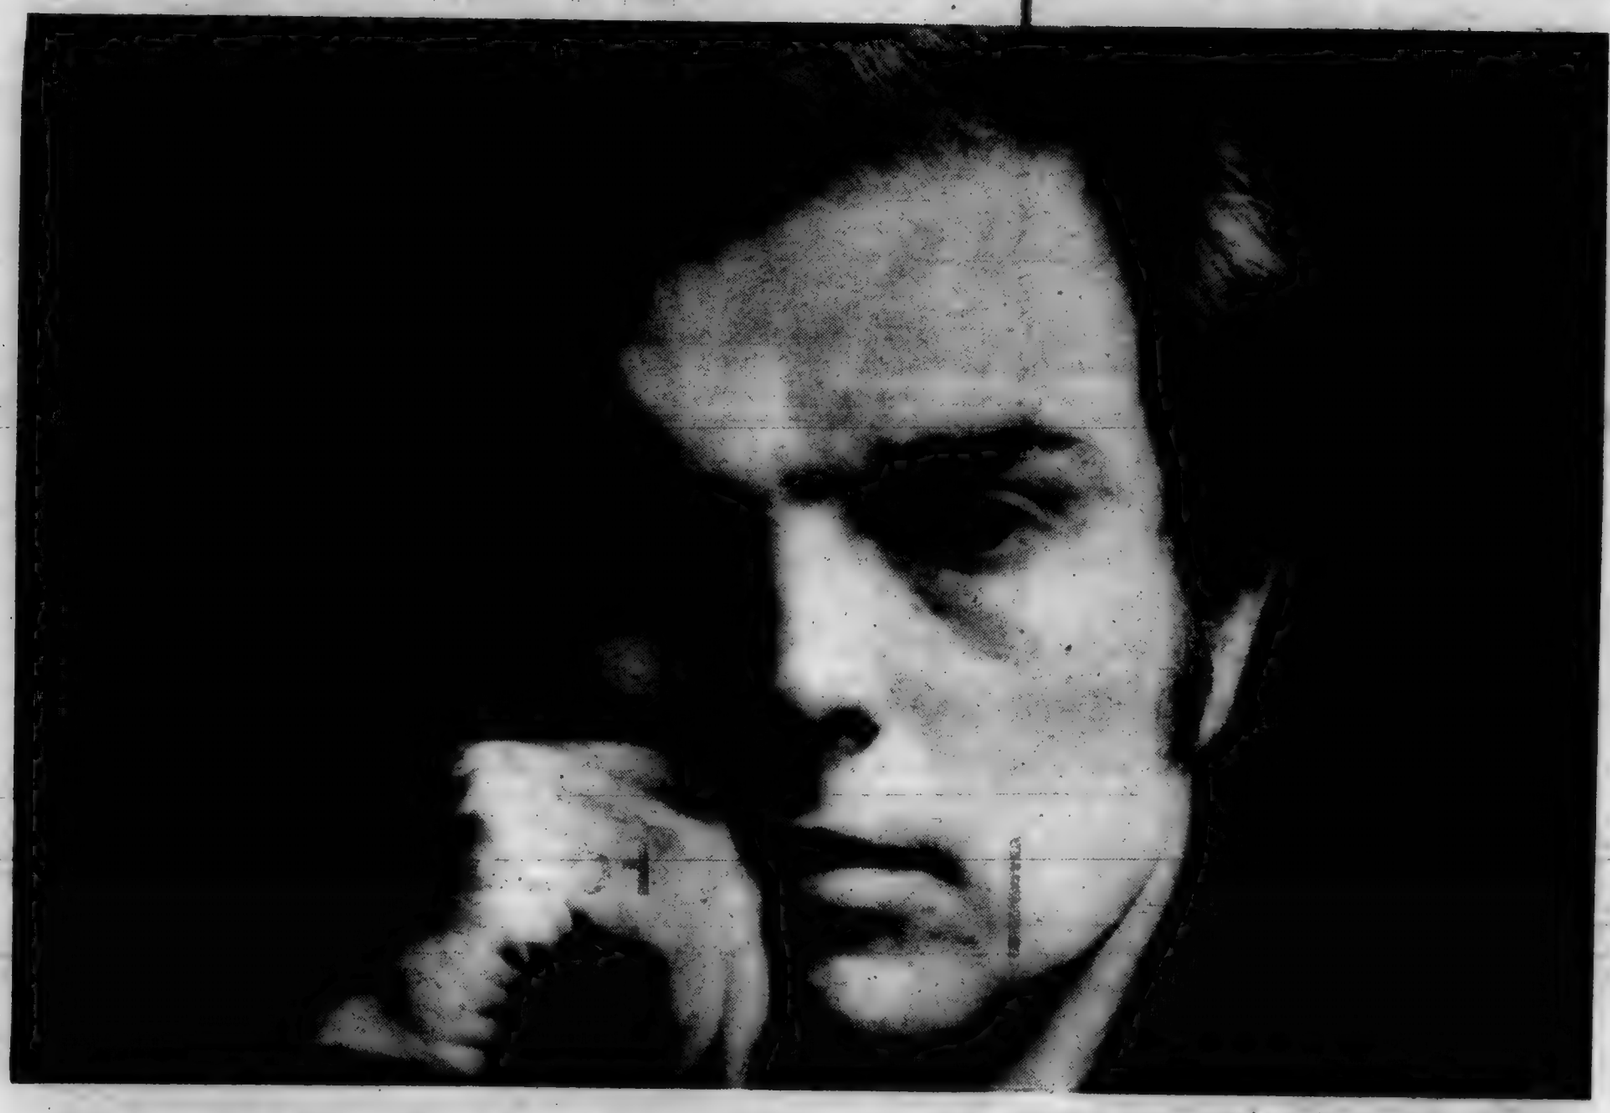
America's most exciting young violinist, Eugene Fodor, began his study of the violin at age seven and at age nine he gave his first solo performance. Two years later he was soloing with the Denver Symphony.



Fodor studied at the Juilliard School with Ivan Galamian and later with the legendary virtuoso Jascha Heifetz. Winning became a regular event for Fodor, as he gathered top honors at the 1967 Merriweather Post Competition in Washington, D.C., the Paganini Competition in Genoa, Italy in 1972, and the much publicized 1974 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow, where he stirred the audience to its feet and made headlines by becoming the first American ever to earn this prize.

Fodor's 1977 Lane Series recital was greeted with standing ovations and a packed hall. In his appearance with the Vermont Symphony, Fodor will play Nicolo Paganini's fiendishly difficult "First Violin Concerto."

The orchestra will play Johannes Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Jean Sibelius' "Second Symphony" in addition to the Paganini.



Tickets for the September 30th concert are on sale at the Lane Series' Grasse Mount Box Office (hours are 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. weekdays) and at the Ticket Store at Park Centre Building, 131 Main Street (hours are 10:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. weekdays and 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. on Saturdays). To call for information or reservations, dial 656-3418. Please note that reservations are only held for 72 hours and the Lane Series cannot reserve tickets to be held at the Box Office the night of a concert.

Science Fiction

By Jim Wright

In the mass of new science fiction published today, there are only a handful of novels with which one can mark time. Such a novel is The White Dragon by Anne McCaffrey (DelRey Books, 497 pp., $8.95). This is the third book in the Dragonriders of Pern series (there are actually five novels dealing with the people of Pern, but two of them were "sidestream" novels and did not concern themselves with the original series). The first two novels in the series, Dragonflight and Dragonquest were published in 1968 and 1971 respectively and have become almost classics in the genre. (Anne McCaffrey, who resembles everyone's favorite aunt, has come to be known as the "Dragon Lady.")

Pern is a planet originally settled by colonists from Earth but has since become cut off from any communication with the parent planet. The colonists were left to fend for themselves and soon the story of how they came to Pern had faded into myth and folklore. The only distinguishing feature about Pern is a sister-planet which orbits around Pern in a wildly erratic elliptical orbit. The colonists paid little, if any, attention to it and the wanderer was soon forgotten. The path which this wanderer follows brings it close to its stepsister once every two hundred (Terran) years at perihelion.

When the conditions permit, the indigenous life of the wanderer attempts to bridge the space gap to the more hospitable Pern.

While battling the silver Threads dropping thru Pern's skies, the colonists developed a highly specialized variety of life-form unique to Pern. These winged, tailed fiery-breathed creatures were named dragons because of the resemblance to the legendary Earth insects. Certain people with some innate telepathic ability were trained as riders of these unusual creatures. It was the job of the dragons and their riders to keep the skies of Pern free of Threads.

The White Dragon deals mainly with the adventures of young Lord Jaxom and his extraordinary white dragon, Ruth. Ruth and Jaxom were both introduced in the earlier books, but we never gleaned more than a passing mention of them until now. Jaxom is a Lord Holder and the first one to have impressed a dragon (dragons are "impressed" by their riders at birth. At that time a bond is formed between dragon and human which lasts the rest of their lives). Ruth was pure white and in some ways a very undragon-like dragon. He was the runt of his litter and almost no one thought that he would amount to anything. But Ruth is certainly a dragon of many talents; not only can he communicate with all the fire-lizards (the animals from which the dragons were developed) and retain in memory things which other dragons can not, but he can also fly back in time to anywhen with unfailing accuracy.

Anne McCaffrey's writing has improved since 1968 when her first book was published. She uses her talents to the fullest in this book to give us a tightly-woven novel with characters so real that you would know them if you saw them walking down the street. In The White Dragon, we learn more about the original settlers of Pern with the discovery of several old sites where the original settlements were — plus the discovery of one of the ships which brought the colonists to Pern.

No Nukes! Festival

I've ever read about... It just doesn't go away — ever... It collects in testicles, generation after generation... One pound of plutonium is enough to give the whole world population a lung cancer..." The audience shifted uncomfortably, consciences prodded by Nagasaki and Hiroshima. Despite the cold water effect of Dr. Cauldicott's speech, the audience was receptive and appreciative. Everyone seemed ready to listen, support the cause, and sign the circulating petitions.

Gracefully, there was a breather between the brutal facts of Dr. Cauldicott's speech and the high point of the day, Carly Simon. There is something about the stage presence of Carly Simon which escapes description.

Dressed in boots, a green fringed skirt and flowing top, all wrapped around by a shawl, Carly appeared warm and relaxed. Her set, interrupted by an errant sound system, included a beautiful rendition of Joan Baez's "Strangers" and her new hit "You Belong to Me." The artistic highpoint of the set occurred when Carly, accompanying herself on a small monotone box called a "drone," sang the flighting "Tera Nova," originally recorded in duet with husband James on his album JT.

For the encore, in a funny nostalgic atmosphere, everybody squeezed on stage for a crowded rendition of "This Land Is Your Land." With a smile, a wave, and a walk that can't be duplicated, Carly Simon exited away into the setting sun which was dropping over home some five miles away.

The Martha's Vineyard No Nuke! Festival was not only a musical success but an organizational triumph as well. There were no hassles, the field was cleaned up by people as they left and the police actually returned marked beer cans that were confiscated at the gates. The Clamshell Alliance is active, alive and well.

Recent Cuts

By Lori Goodman

In contrast to August – perhaps the thinnest month next to January – September is rolling out disc after disc as musicians pile back into the studios from endless summer wipe-out tours. If you don't believe it, just take a look at what jazz and poppers have to choose from on this go-around.

The Ratings

 – Phenomenal
* – Solid
 – When it's on sale
 – Maybe on a rainy day
* – Worthless

Jorge Santana: Jorge Santana (Tomato) ****

Jorge Santana, brother of Carlos, escaped from obscurity last week with his new album, Jorge Santana. Spearheading his former group Malo into popularity, Santana was one of the first to infuse Latin into rock riffs with Malo's hit "Suavecito," written by guitarist Richard Bean. Two other former members of Malo are also featured here: skillful bassist Carlos Roberto and power percussionist Ed "Yogi" Newman on congas, bongos, and timbales. He is also a veteran of a brief stint with Coke Escovedo.

Unfortunately, Santana's arrangements with Fania All-Stars fared better than this new effort. Although the album does have some measured intensity, it often approaches overdubbed disco, complete with silky background, oohs, and aahs. Furthermore, Santana's vocals leave much to be desired. The first side is the better of the two, specifically the last two cuts. "Seychelles" brings Santana's guitar playing to the front, without overshadowing a tight bass and driving percussion. This is by far the best piece here. The percussive feel on the last cut, "We Were There" is enduring, thanks to the sheer strength of Yogi. However, there is little use for jazz that not only abandons theme but disdains melodic development, as does the entire first side. Viewed overall, this is a frank disappointment which proves that Santana, ranked next to his phenomenally talented and successful sibling, still can't pull it off. In the immortal words of Chuck Berry, "beware of middlebrows bearing electric guitars."

L.A.4: Watch What Happens (Concord Jazz) *******

This marks the quartet's third album for Concord Jazz by the L.A.4, bringing forth more solid vintage quality from bassist Ray Brown, acoustic guitar by Lawrence Almeida, alto sax-flutist Bud Shank and drummer Jeff Hamilton, who came out of Woody Herman's Thundering Herd to replace the seasoned Shelly Manne.

Six out of the seven tunes are familiar ones on sight only: Gershwin's "Summertime," Mangione's "Land of Make Believe," "Nuages" by Django Reinhardt and Errol Garner's "Misty" – to say nothing of the Livingston–Evans tune "Mona Lisa," immortalized by the late Nat King Cole. Brown's bass solo on "Mona Lisa" is first-rate; it becomes a lyrical ballad and Brown hasn't lost his touch. The Four's version of "Land of Make Believe" is a snappy bossa nova, smoothly undercutting the sometimes annoying melody. The blending of instruments is nearly flawless, without compensating on the artistic integrity of each member. It is obvious after the initial preview that these are not simply modern versions of old tunes, but are all revised into new forms that are still charming. The only original song, "Williwaw," is an exciting samba piece that sizzles with Bud Shank on sax. The songs are all inspirational pieces, smooth and mellow without being deadbeat. And this challenging task of reworking proves, if nothing else, that this has been and still is a heavyweight group.

Zwol (EMI) ***

Despite the arresting cover photo of a bald Walter Zwol in tin-foil to incognito shades, this album offers no such avant-garde promise. This is basic rock and roll (or rock and Zwol) that rocks out best on the first cut "Don't Care." On keyboards and vocals, Zwol lies somewhere between Rod Stewart on "Use My Love" and Billy Joel on "A Little Bit Crazy." The new hit single "New York City" starts out interestingly but doesn't sustain, and the Big Apple would be in better shape with Howard Cosell as Poet Laureate. The lyrics on "Southern Part of France" are a totally irrelevant spewing of French provinces where the ladies "wear no pants." Your guess is as good as mine.

Trevor Rabin: (Chrysalis) ***

This LP is a case study in adequate hard rock craftsmanship spoiled by soupy harmonic literature. Listening to the first tune "Getting to Know" exemplifies this. Trevor comes through with solid heavy guitar playing but hearing the vocals is like listening to a clone of Queen.

Rabin could be clever but it sounds as if he wants to be Ted Nugent when he grows up, pulling out the cornball arena-rock tactics as if they had something to do with the kind of music he makes. These are all Rabin's songs, and Rabin plays all instruments (so it says) except drums by Kevin Kruger. But all is grounded, unfortunately, not in the great common store of stupid-rock ready makes but in the grade-C Blue Oyster cult moves that his gradual accumulation of instrumental competence has earned him.

Marcio Montarroyos and Stone Alliance: (PM Records) *******

Although virtually unknown in these parts, Marcio Montarroyos is one of the main trumpeteers in the current Brazilian music scene. Montarroyos joins with three American artists – Steve Grossman on tenor and soprano saxes, composer of two pieces entitled "Libra Rising" and "Hey Bicho, Vamos Nessa" Gene Perla on bass and keyboards, and Don Alias with guitar, drums and congas – comprising the Stone Alliance. The splendid array of guest musicians includes Dom Bira. David Sion, Brasto de Hollanda and Vasconcelos on percussion. and Hermeto Pascoal on flute. In addition to trumpet, Marcio plays the flugelhorn, mellophone, piano and moog.

During a visit to the U.S., Montarroyos met the Stone Alliance at one of their concerts. and in that same evening the album idea was conceived. The outcome is top-notch crossover jazz in a fruitful blending of Brazilian and American jazz influences. Marcio's trumpet/flugelhorn in "On the Foot Peg" (an original composition by Marcio) is skillfully controlled through mixed polyrhythms. "The Greeting" is a fiery percussive tune complete with rolling congas, spicy cabasa, surdo. and bells. In short, this collaboration ranks as one of the finer examples of traditional Afro/Latin percussion modes mixed with progressive jazz craftsmanship. The fullness of sound here is matched by inspiring solos in a thoroughly enjoyable album. One wishes to see more of this collective effort across national lines.

Heart: Dog and Butterfly (Portrait) ****

The best tune on this album is the first cut "Cook with Fire," a slow ballad sung attractively by Ann Wilson, who usually boasts the uncompromising macho ambition of the fanatic rock and roller. Her song is, nonetheless, graced with subtle rhapsodic touches that makes rock and roll come alive. Musically, the instrumental on "Mistral Wind" is the only boring cut on the whole album.

The first side is standard Heart, the stuff you all saw on TV in Calif. Jam II. Unfortunately the second side aims to approach second rate Renaissance, with a few nice accents on "Lighter Touch." Yet oddly enough, it lacks momentum – which can be blamed not only on producer Mike Fisher but on a workaday band and road crew that contributes to its lingering confusion. This is another record that is diminished by the printed lyrics that are a reason for its being. Butterflies and dogs and flashing moonlight rising soon ferments into schlocked-up sap. But the sound is peachy-tough Heart.

Debut pomposities having been excised, Heart's new album, like Boston's, is a pure exploration of corporate rock remains. Not only are the guitars perfectly received on what is supposed to be a live Tennessee club, but the lyrical cliches seem specifically selected to make the band seem as credible in the studio as they are on the stage. The only thing that makes me wonder is that sometimes I catch myself enjoying it, which means that some corruption is still at work here. As true formalists, they leave me absolutely cold.

Jack Tempchin: Jack Tempchin (Arista) ****

Composer of the Eagles' classic "Already Gone" and "Slow Dancing," Jack Tempchin writes all songs and sings all vocals (but does he play an instrument? Yes, harmonica). There is good country guitar work from Pete Carr, who produced and arranged this album for Tempchin.

The best song is "Tijuana," co-written by Tom Waits and backed vocally by Jackson Browne, and is about, what else, getting stuck in a skanky Tijuana bar with no money and a bum car. Tempchin might be a second Jesse Winchester, but he doesn't notch up to a Waylon or a Willie Nelson. The album is strewn with colloquialisms and too many songs about cars and cruisin', "Pick Up Truck," "Fifteen Days Under the Hood," and "Skateboard Johnny." The words, however, are knowing and compassionate; the arrangements are postpub understood as a mature language. Although its spare inventiveness flags slightly into mediocrity, on the whole this is a memorable debut album.

Maynard Ferguson: Carnival (Columbia) ****

By Tom Nuccio

The Conquistador of Double High C, trumpeter Maynard Ferguson, has gained tremendous popularity in the 1970's. His big band arrangements of TV/film themes from Rocky, Star-Wars, and Star Trek are used by numerous high school and college stage bands. However, as his popularity has increased, it seems the musical quality of his albums has followed an opposite course.

The latest MF release titled Carnival includes some of the worst charts ever played by the band. "How Ya Doin' Baby" and "Fantasy" (an Earth Wind & Fire original) appear as obnoxious disco-funk tunes which not only hinder Maynard as a soloist but more importantly the band as a whole. What was once a Kenton inspired powerful brass choir has been subdued to a "horn section" confined to short syncopated accentuations and arhythmic blurts.

The album does possess some brighter moments. The band's arrangement of Joe Zawinul's "Birdland" temporarily revives Ferguson's trademark – "The Proud Sound of Brass Power." The trumpets, trombones and sexes are displayed up front, combining in the production of an orchestral sound. "Stella by Starlight," a tune Maynard popularized in the 50's, proves that this band can still play stright jazz. This Slide Hampton arrangement gains tremendous support from Mike Migliore's alto solo and an unaccompanied cadenza chorus by trombonist Phil Gray. Reminiscent of the old MF bands, this tune begins by stating the theme at a slow tempo, breaks into a Latin-flavored section and concludes with a fast-four jazz line. The result – Vintage Ferguson. The remainder of the album makes neither a good nor a bad impression. However, via its mediocrity, it detracts greatly from the disc's overall impact.

Maynard the jazz artist continues to slip further away from the creative excellence achieved by his earlier ensembles. This deviation has led to the birth of a new Ferguson – Maynard the commercial/pop artist, idolized by young trumpeters throughout the country. Although I continuously wish for the reincarnation of the first Ferguson, I cannot blame him for adhering to the wealth and superstardom he presently enjoys.

Local Ski Areas Offer Wide Variety of Student Discounts

By David Greeff

In an era when rampant inflation is taking its toll on all sectors of the economy, the Vermont ski industry is suffering like everyone else. Increased overhead and energy costs have pushed the price of a daily ticket to $16 in most areas, and the result has been that many native Vermonters who once skied regularly can no longer afford a day on the slopes.

Consequently, since the largest percentage of the industry's profit is realized from out-of-state weekend tourists, local areas usually operate at well under capacity during the week.

Over the last few years, in an attempt to stimulate sagging business and to give Vermont residents an affordable skiing alternative, local areas have offered substantial discounts on midweek prices. Response has been so favorable that all areas are now getting into the act which, in turn, is causing increased competition and lower prices.

Over the last few years, in an attempt to stimulate sagging business and to give Vermont residents an affordable skiing alternative, local areas have offered substantial discounts on midweek prices.

So, for the many UVM students who are attracted to the university because of its proximity to quality skiing, there is no cause for alarm, bargains abound. Local ski corporations, including Stowe, Mad River, Smugglers' Notch and Sugarbush, all within an hour's drive, are offering a variety of student passes, ski week programs, and other discounts for students in the Burlington area. Each mountain has its own particular advantages, depending upon the skier's ability, how frequently he or she skis, equipment rentals, payment plans, and several others. Below is all the information necessary to decide which mountain suits your needs.

MAD RIVER

Mad River, located about 50 minutes away in Waitsfield, Vt., has been encouraging student skiers for over five years. Last year they sold over 500 season passes to students understandably attracted to the quiet, friendly atmosphere and challenging skiing.

The popular weekday pass will be offered for a very reasonable $95 if bought before Oct. 15 and $115 thereafter. The passholder is entitled to unlimited free skiing on any weekday throughout the season and a $5 reduction on weekend tickets. The price, up $15 from last year, is intended hopefully to reduce the number of tickets sold. Mad River campus representative, Geoff Liggett, said that "Mad River felt it sold too many passes last year, which resulted in excessive deterioration of popular trails."

In addition to the season pass, Mad River is also offering special student ski weeks in January. These will feature unlimited skiing Monday through Friday for $35, or five days of lifts and lessons for $50. The ski weeks may be a particularly appealing opportunity for the beginner or someone who won't have time to take advantage of the season pass.

Mad River passes and information can be obtained from Liggett at tel. 862-4806 or from any other of the 32 representatives selling around campus.

SMUGGLERS' NOTCH

Smugglers' Notch, located on the reverse side of Mt. Mansfield, is spread over two peaks and offers skiing for all abilities. Not as difficult as Stowe, Mad River or Sugarbush, Smugglers' is probably the most accessible area for the average skier.

In addition to its broad appeal as a mountain, Smugglers' offers more student bargains than any of its competitors. And the policy is apparently a smart one, since Smugglers' reported selling over 3000 various student passes last winter.

The most popular of these is the Bash Badge, which for $12.50 entitles the holder to $7 midweek tickets and $10 weekend tickets — normally $15. Further, the badge holder receives a 15% discount on rentals and lessons. The badge seems to be the ideal option for the beginner who doesn't have equipment or enough desire to make a full-time commitment.

Besides the badge, Smugglers' will be selling two season passes. The first is $100 weekday pass which, like Mad River's, offers unrestricted weekday skiing and weekend tickets for $10. The second is $140 unrestricted 7 day pass for students and local residents. The cost is $165 for non-students over the age of 22.

Also, for those interested in apres-ski indulgence, Smugglers' Black Bear Pub is featuring a special daily happy hour for pass holders, when drinks will be one-half their normal price.

For students unable to produce ready cash, Smugglers' will allow you to pay in installments. Under the payment plan, a student is required only to put down $25 and can pay the remainder in parts provided that the entire balance is settled by the first day of skiing.

Smugglers' tickets and information can be obtained from either the Outing Club, x3439, or one of the 32 campus reps. Smugglers' is located about 50 minutes away in Jeffersonville, Vt. 05464, tel. 644-8851.

STOWE

Stowe, often referred to as the capital of eastern skiing, features the widest variety of lifts and trails for the total beginner to the most accomplished expert. Located on various peaks of Mt. Mansfield, Stowe is, like Smugglers', about a 50 minute drive from UVM. The town, replete with top quality restaurants, and attractive watering holes, also makes Stowe one of the more appealing ski areas around.

Stowe is offering, for the first time, $140 seven day season pass if purchased by December 1 and $155 thereafter. The pass is valid for all regular season days except during the weeks of Christmas and Washington's Birthday. Stowe spokespersons quickly point out that these restrictions amount to only 18 days out of a total season of 139 days. Stowe representative Bill Riley said they also intend to offer ski weeks and mountain tours for advanced skiers, but as yet no specific programs have been drawn up.

A Stowe representative will be on campus October 11, 12, and 13 in Billings. The address is Stowe, Vt 05672, tel. 800-451-3260.

Soccer Cats Dominate but Plattsburg Scores on Fluke in OT

By Hart Van Denburg

Although the University of Vermont soccer team's offense dominated the game with 30 shots on goal, as Coach Reinhardt put it, "they just couldn't put the ball in the net" when UVM suffered an unexpected 1-0 upset at Plattsburgh last Thursday.

Whatever weakness caused their inability to score, it was not evident when it came to ball control. The Cats kept the Plattsburgh defense on their toes by keeping the ball in their half for most of the game, allowing them only eight shots at UVM goalie Bart Farley. Farley, now in his third year on the team, holds the team record for most shutouts by a goalie (6) and the lowest goals against average of .77.

Plattsburgh's one goal came in overtime when Farley, unable to gain control of a backpass, deflected the ball off his body to teammate Greg Bowering. Bowering, in attempting to clear the ball, failed to get it off the field, enabling a waiting Plattsburgh attacker to put the ball in the unattended goal. Farley was out of position from the earlier play.

Reinhardt described the happenings as "unfortunate" and not just because of the loss to a smaller power like Plattsburgh, but also because the aggressiveness needed for scoring was not there. Aggressiveness should be the key to next Friday's game at B.U. Although the Cats twice defeated B.U. 4-2 last year, Reinhardt considers them a force to be reckoned with.

Defensive System Change Pays Off-- Women's Soccer Trounces Middlebury

By Molly McRoberts

Tori Ryder raced past Middlebury's defense to score late in the first half as the University of Vermont women's soccer team triumphed over Middlebury 2-C last Wednesday.

UVM goalie Rachel Lawrence only had to make three saves because of Vermont's superior fullback strength. "All three fullbacks, Alix Manney, Sandi Wood, and Jane Spencer were there to stop the Middlebury offense, and because of them the ball hardly reached goalie territory at all," said Coach Mary-Ellen Rathbone. "We tried a new system defensively against Middlebury. Instead of a 4-3-3 formation in the backfield, we set up in 3-3-4 positioning, and it gave us tremendous results."

In the first two games of this season, freshman Andrea Kanerow was out of action because of injury. Against Middlebury she came back to score a goal, assisted by Nancy Bigelow, insuring a 2-0 win for UVM. "Offensively, there was complication with where people were positioning themselves, but it worked out."

Tuesday UVM travels to Lyndon State, and next Saturday the Cats meet some of their toughest competition at the Champlain Regionals.

Perkins Pulls Off Hat Trick as UVM Field Hockey KO's Maine & Bates

By Steven Larose

Freshman right inner Amy Perkins racked up a three goal total to lead the University of Vermont field hockey team to a 3-1 win over Maine and a 3-0 victory over Bates last Friday and Saturday.

Perkins used a charging drive to break through Maine's defense on Friday and score Vermont's first goal. Linda Peabody followed with two more goals to give the Cats a 3-0 lead at half-time. Lisa Fernandez had 3 assists. Vermont then capitalized on the dominating play of their half-backs to keep the ball between the 25 yard lines and deny Maine a chance at a rally.

Bates College's goalie stonewalled the Vermont offense until 12 minutes into the second half on Saturday when Perkins pierced through and scored two goals, assisted by freshman Diedre Morris. Vermont led 2-0 with 30 seconds left as Fernandez put the icing on the cake with an unassisted shot from the circle.

Coach Janice Lange later remarked that the hustle of the links kept Vermont in both games by reinforcing the front line. Vermont's halfback line of Fernandez, Alison Barber and Sherry Aguirre were also key components in the wins by keeping the pressure on the opposite front line, according to Lange. Goalie Linda Shiffler was also instrumental in the victories, as she had three saves in both games.

Lange also commented "In the Maine game we dominated play in the first half, but Maine played better in the second half, staying spread out more and passing more accurately. However, Vermont was in better condition and the girls were a lot quicker to get to the ball. Maine looked a little tired in the second half."

"The score was not indicative of how close the game with Bates was," Lange continued. "At the end of the first half it could have gone either way. We outshot them 14-3 in the half and had 10 corners but it was a case of Bates having a tough goalie and Vermont not being able to get anything by her. The play of our links, Alice Barry and Lisa Cleverdon, was exceptional. They provided the glue that enabled us to pull together and score. Also our front line, made up of Libby Sharp, Linda Peabody, Amy Perkins and Diedre Morris, provided more attacking and opened up more scoring opportunities. A key difference between this year and last is that we now have five or six forwards that can score, whereas last year we only had one or two."

Vermont now faces Middlebury on Tuesday, October 3rd on the Archie Post Field at 3 p.m.

Mountaineering #2.

SELECTING THE PROPER GEAR

The Busch® label is where it all begins. Note the snowy, craggy peaks affixed thereto. They are the mountains.

You are the mountaineer. And this is an ad. The subject of which is selecting the proper gear for mountaineering. (It all fits together so nicely, doesn't it?)

First and foremost, you'll need to pop the mountain top. For this task, faithful mountaineers use a church key. Secular mountaineers use a bottle opener. Don't be confused by these antics with semantics. Just remember, the opener is your primary tool. Be true to it and it will be true to you.

Second, choose a glass. Here the options become immense. German steins, hand-blown pilseners, old jelly jars, that cute little Mr. Boffo mug you've had since third grade.

(Church key used by faithful mountaineers.)

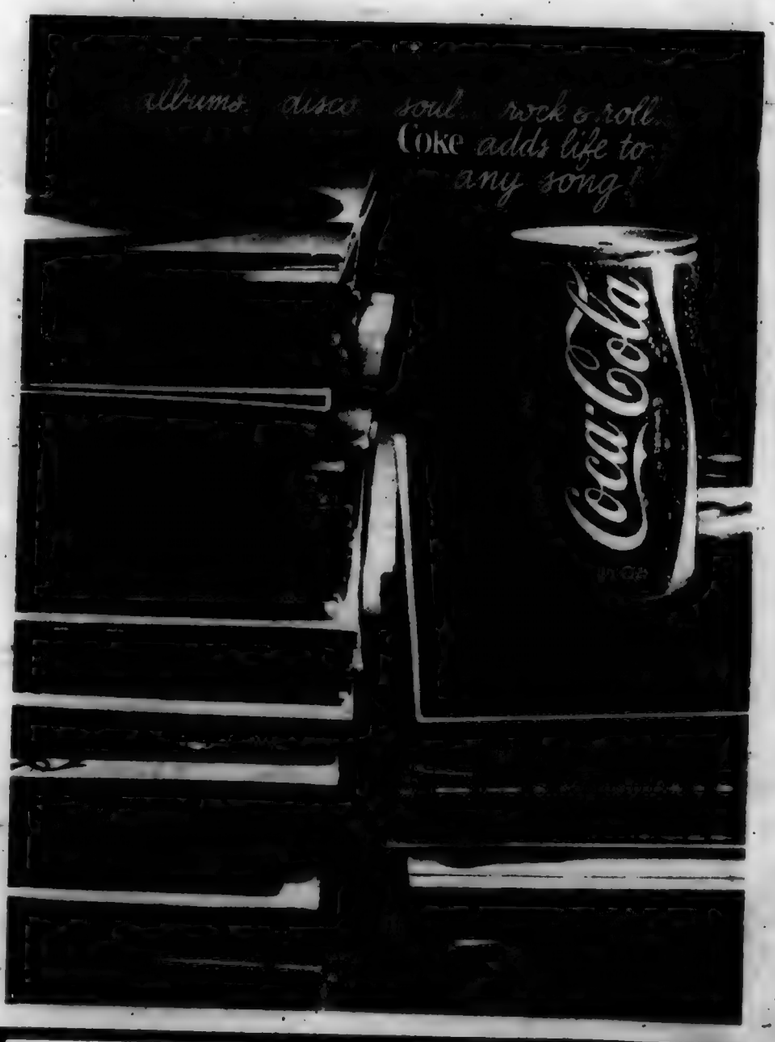
Be adventurous. Experiment. Most mountaineers have a personal preference. You'll develop one too.

Food is next. Proper mountaineering, not to mention proper nutrition, requires a smorgasbord selection of snacks. Some mountaineers have suffered from a potato chip deficiency, a pretzel imbalance or other serious dietary defects. Plan ahead.

Comfort is crucial. If you mountaineer in public, pick a padded bar stool, preferably one that spins (to facilitate admiring the scenery). At home, a comfortable chair or sofa will do. Rule of thumb: if it feels good, and the police don't seem to mind, do it.

Then turn on the tube or spin a tune or crack a good book. The choice is strictly between you and the dominant hemisphere of your brain. Of course, some mountaineers say the smooth, refreshing taste of Busch is entertainment enough. And thank goodness they do, because it's an excellent conclusion.

(Comfort is crucial)



Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Everett & Chipouras Rally UVM Rugby To Demolish Plattsburg

By Dale Gates

Mike Everett and Jay Chipouras bulled in for three trys to allow the University of Vermont Rugby team to rally late in the second half and crush Plattsburgh State 25-17, Saturday at Archie Post Field.

Plattsburgh took early control after converting a penalty kick when Pete Christmen took the ball into the endzone for four points. Plattsburgh again capitalized on UVM mistakes and scored two unanswered trys to boost the score to 11-4.

UVM began to come alive late in the first half when the Vermont scrum rolled downfield to within five yards of the goal line. Roy Sokolowski pierced a Plattsburgh lineout and fell on the ball to bring the Cats within three points of the leaders. Plattsburgh opened the second half with a quick try and a successful two point conversion kick to make the score 17-8.

UVM began its rally as wing Everett bulled in for two trys, putting Vermont within one point of Plattsburgh. Chipouras added another try and fullback Pete Caltaldo scored on a penalty kick to secure the 25-17 victory.

Bob Kaplan, a UVM coach, said, "We were over-confident and made many mistakes that Plattsburgh capitalized on in the first half. We returned in the second half with our usual strong running attack from both the scrum and backfield to post the victory."

The UVM B team also won to bring their record to 2-0.

UVM will try to boost its record to 3-0 next Saturday as Vermont hosts St. Michael's College. Starting time will be 1:00 p.m. at Archie Post Field next to Gutterson.

Vermont's Youth and Inexperience Allows Albany to Crush Racketmen 7-2

By Thomas Cianciolo

Despite wins by Mark Compagnon and Dave Magavern, the UVM tennis team's youth and inexperience enabled Albany State to crush the Catamounts 7-2 last Tuesday afternoon.

Coach Hal Greig praised the Albany team citing their three singles players as being exceptionally strong and well coached.

Albany's strength, coupled with a very poor showing by UVM's No. 1 and No. 2 singles players led to the downfall of Andy Deery and Frank Babbot by scores of 6-0, 6-0, and 6-0, 6-1, respectively. Although Kent Friedman was soundly beaten in third singles competition 6-0, 6-1, coach Greig praised him for playing quite well and stated that "the score of his match was not an accurate indication of Kent's performance." UVM's Mike Fertig also put up a respectable fight before yielding in fourth singles play 6-3, 1-6, 6-0.

Albany's doubles teams also proved to be too tough for the struggling Cats as the Babbott-Follet and Hansen-Dunn combinations were easily overpowered. Ed Bonfigli and Ian De Groot also lacked the ability to secure a victory as they dropped a close 8-6 decision in pro set duo competition.

Coach Greig blamed the loss on "an excess of unnecessary errors due to a lack of concentration." He also stated that "we enjoyed playing such a powerful team. The experience of such a match will certainly help the team in future play."

Greig indicated that Peter Follet showed signs of improvement as he discussed the few bright spots of the match. Greig also inferred that a lineup change can be expected in an attempt to find strong combinations. In spite of the setback he remained very optimistic of the season's outlook.

Vermont did not participate in the ECAC's on Friday – Saturday and Sunday at Rider College of Trenton, N.J. due to the high expense. The need for more practice and lack of an experienced competitive player were also active influences in UVM's decision to withdraw from the tournament.

The Catamounts' next contest is at home Saturday against the Terriers of Boston University.

Schiller Impressed by Volleyball Performance Despite Setbacks

By Molly McRoberts

Despite two Catamount losses to UNH and UMass last Saturday, University of Vermont volleyball coach Cathy Schiller was impressed with her team in competition against what she termed as "the best volleyball that has ever come to UVM."

UMass solidly defeated UNH in two games, and UVM came up next to try to stall New Hampshire, only to be stopped in the first game 15-10. In a second game, UNH again over-powered Vermont, 15-4. Sophomore co-captain Connie Rockefeller hit with authority, leading UVM by scoring seven points. The second highest scorer against UNH was co-captain Kathy Medlock, a junior at UVM.

Massachusetts, with a total of 12 returning players, squashed the bruised Vermont squad in the third and final match, 15-10 in the first game, and 15-8 in the second. Martha Newman provided good back court work for the Cats, who were ineffective against Massachusetts' smashing serves. Sue Cummings displayed reliable set-ups and strong middle blocking. Connie Rockefeller served eight points versus UMass, while Sue Cummings chalked up a total of four points for UVM.

"UMass won on colorful hitting and powerful blocking," according to Coach Schiller. "I thought our team played very well, considering the time we had (only a week and a half) to play together before these games. Right now we're where we were at mid-season last year. Our defensive coordination needs work, and we'll need better passing next Saturday when we go to Williams."

Depth Boosts Cross Country Men to Success at Conn.

By Tom Phillips

Relying on solid bunching and superb individual efforts, the University of Vermont women's cross-country team racked up four wins in two separate contests this past week.

The most recent of the two meets, a tri-meet with Albany State and Southern Connecticut, saw Vermont thoroughly outclass the competition despite the absence of Vermont power Donna Raymond. In that meet, UVM scored a mere 21 points to Southern Connecticut's second-place total of 34. Albany had to be content with a distant third.

Once again, Vermont's depth dominated the meet as Coach Perry Bland's runners claimed five of the top ten spots. Sophomore Judi St. Hilaire streaked to a first-place time of 16:47 for the three mile distance. Close behind was St. Hilaire's sophomore teammate, Amy Bouchard. Sue Shay (18:51), Heather Adams (18:58), and Katy Abrams (20:18) completed the Vermont scoring with fourth, fifth and tenth place finishes, respectively. Maureen Horan, in fourteenth place, and Nancy Dickson, in the sixteenth slot, also were members of Bland's tightly-bunched, seven-runner express.

While Bland was pleased with the results of the meet with Albany State and Southern Connecticut, he remarked, "We really needed to win big in this one. On Tuesday, we lost pretty badly to UConn on their course and that was our first loss of the season. We didn't bring all the girls to that meet since we beat UConn handily in our first meet this year. But, still, it would have been nice to have beaten them without our being at top strength."

The loss Bland alluded to occurred in the Cats' meet just two days before the Albany-So. Conn. triangular meet. On Tuesday, UVM bowed to UConn, 23-36. But, the undermanned Catamount squad managed to put four of its runners in the top ten. Freshman Anne Schiavone sped to a second-place finish, just ten seconds off the pace of UConn's Anderson. UVM runners Robin Snyder, Kristin Wood, and Sue Choiniere supported Schiavone with their respective finishes of fifth, sixth, and 10th.

The girls still seek revenge for the lone loss, though. They will take their 11-1 record into Saturday's prestigious Husky Invitational, a meet that is hosted by none other than UConn. The meet should prove to be a good test for Bland's corps, since a quality field is expected. The Catamounts will be at full strength for the invitational, thus making them pre-meet favorites in the race for the team title.

The Husky Invitational (Sept. 30) will be the last away meet before the October 7th home-opener against Dartmouth.

UVM Runningmen Romp Over Lifeless Plattsburgh

By Tom Phillips

Taking a hint from the successful women's team, the University of Vermont men's cross-country team swept to a spirited 19-44 romp over a lifeless Plattsburgh State squad last Saturday. The UVM victory, growing out of several outstanding individual performances, was the first home opener win for Vermont in several seasons.

In summing up the meet, Coach Bill Nedde found it necessary to describe Vermont's performance in superlatives. "The win simply represented the most impressive group effort Vermont has exhibited all season. We not only laid claim to 12 of the first 15 places, but managed to bunch our first 12 men within a 1:37 time period. It was the type of bunching all cross-country coaches pray for each summer."

Kevin Martell, taking advantage of both the ideal weather conditions and the homecrowd support, came from behind to grab individual honors over Dan McFarlin of Plattsburgh. Martell ran the five-mile course in 27:05 to McFarlin's 27:14.

After Martell, a seemingly endless line of gold Vermont jerseys paraded across the finish line. Mike Landman (3rd in 27:20) led the UVM troops that included respective fifth through 10th place finishers Randy Sightler, Tom Beatini, Mike Myers, Rich Solie, Bill Harvey, John Foster, and Tony Bates. A single Plattsburgh State runner crossed the line before Catamount runners Kent Karns, Jack Hart, and John Novak recorded their 12th-14th place finishes.

Vermont is now concerning itself with Saturday's home contest against Boston University and Middlebury. BU, a team that has a history of being weak, suddenly has emerged as a topflight team. BU Coach David Hemery, himself a 1972 Olympic gold-medalist, had a fine recruiting year, having harvested a superior crop of high school All-Americans. The Boston team should be in command of both UVM and Middlebury. The Middlebury team, however, will have all it can handle with Vermont. The Catamount depth should propel Nedde's corps to a solid second place finish in the three-team meet. The race is slated to take place at 1:00 p.m. on the Archie Post Field

THE PRECISION HAIRCUT EXPLAINED, PRECISELY.

Because your head is unique, the way your hair grows is equally unique.

Precision haircutting is a technique for cutting the hair in harmony with the way it grows. Your hair eventually grows out but it doesn't lose its shape. So your haircut will look as good after five days as it does after five minutes. And because the hair falls naturally into place you won't have to fuss with it. Usually a shake of the head does it.

At Command Performance we shampoo, precision cut and blow dry your hair for twelve dollars. No appointments are necessary.

We also offer permanent waves, coloring, frosting and conditioning. But we really shine with precision. And so will you.

Khachian Breaks Tie; Women's Tennis Slays Panthers

By Rich Chalmers

Stamina and patience proved to be the key factor as number two singles player, Carol Khachian, outlasted Sara McNealus of Middlebury in a three-set battle, breaking a 4-4 team tie and notching another win for UVM women's tennis. The Saturday win puts the team at the 3-0 for the season.

"I had no idea that my match would break the tie until after it was over," commented Khachian. "Sara (McNealus) plays a very steady game. I tried all different game plans out there but all I could do was keep playing. It was tough."

McNealus, captain of the Panthers, won the first set in a tie-breaker, but Khachian's steadiness proved too much for her, as the UVM second singles player won the last two sets 6-3, 7-6. "It was an excellent match," added co-captain Becky Rich. "McNealus hit lob after lob. That's not Carol's style and it must have been difficult for her to play against an opponent like that."

Freshman Pam Hensel, playing number one singles, took a close decision over Middlebury's Lisa Moran 7-6, 7-6, with scores of 5-2 and 5-1 in the tiebreakers. "Pam had a tight match," Coach Marilyn Chase said after the final outcome. "This is Lisa Moran's fourth year on the Middlebury team and she's a strong player. I was impressed with Pam's coolness and her ability to win the big points."

Middlebury won its first match when UVM's Jenny Hynson defaulted after twisting her ankle in the third set. Hynson was behind 4-6, 6-3, 1-4 when she was forced to concede.

Both Alicia Good and Melanie Carbone had what Coach Chase termed quite impressive matches in the number four and five singles position, handing the Panthers 6-1, 6-3 and 6-2, 7-6 losses.

Carol Skukis (UVM) lost to Abby Senel 2-6, 6-7, while playing with a broken left wrist. The fracture severely hindered Skukis' two-fisted backhand, but failed to break her spirit as she came close to defeating her opponent. "I'm expecting a lot from Carol," commented coach Chase. "She has a lot of spirit and as she showed here, a lot of guts. She did well to come so close under the circumstances."

Co-captains Rich and Cathy Stanton made short work of their Panther opponents in one doubles match 6-1, 6-2, but the other Catamount doubles teams fell to Middlebury. In the number two position, Kathy Abbot and Kathy Borda were defeated 6-2, 6-2 and the team of Chris Frisella and Michelle Sonner were handed a 7-5, 3-6, 0-6 defeat.

UVM will engage Colby and UMaine this weekend in an effort to keep its record unblemished. The Cats will re-clash with Middlebury at Lakeside Tennis Club on Monday, Oct. 9. In response to questions concerning how Khachian would react to another duel with McNealus, she commented, "If I play her again, I'll have to stay out there for another three hours. I think I'll have the psychological advantage, though, because that's the second time I've beaten her in three sets. As we left the court Saturday, she mentioned we would probably play again."

Amy Bouchard--
Dedicated Cross Country Runner & Track Athlete

By Randy Briggs

With the increasing emphasis on women's athletics at the University of Vermont, cross country and track star Amy Bouchard's outlook on women's sports is much brighter now than when she first arrived at UVM a year ago. "Women's sports is obviously not built up as much as men's sports," said Bouchard, "but we are getting more recognition than we ever had. For anyone to really take notice we have to perform better than the men's teams."

The road to excellence has not been an easy one for the 1977 New England two mile champion. Bouchard attended Berlin High School in New Hampshire before arriving at Vermont. She explained the problems she had there by commenting, "I participated in two years of track in high school. The program was introduced in my junior year so I was very inexperienced when I arrived at Vermont. As far as cross country goes, last year was my first year."

"It was really strange how I got interested in cross-country. I accidently met the coach while I was running last year and he asked me to try out for the team. I honestly didn't think I could make it as a cross-country runner," she commented.

"Your body has to be in top condition while your mind can tell you what extremes you can go to"

-- Amy Bouchard

Bouchard has been very happy with the way Coach Perry Bland has handled the team. According to Bouchard, his coaching style allowed the women to enjoy a successful season last year. "He has taught us to relax while we run. This allows us to breathe better and it keeps us loose. He wants us to go all out, but he wants us to have a good time running," she said. Bouchard added that with additional depth on this year's squad the cross-country team should improve on last year's performance.

For some individuals running can become a tedious chore, but for Bouchard it is a great challenge. "I run for self-satisfaction. It's a great feeling when you can give all you possibly can. I also love the competition," she explained.

Most athletes love large crowds to spur them on. Bouchard is different in this sense. "It's within myself to run without the help of a large crowd, I'm determined to beat another person whether there are a lot of people cheering or not." Bouchard pointed out that she wants the team to be supported, but individually she is oblivious to the crowd.

Most athletes train year round to stay mentally and physically ready for their upcoming seasons. "This summer I was running up to eight miles a day," said Bouchard. "Although I did this, I stayed away from competitive races. I just wanted to get ready on my own."

Preparation for races is crucial for one's success. The difference between running well and poorly often depends on pre-race exercise and limbering up. "I run to get loose on the day of the race," Bouchard remarked.

There is a big argument among running experts over whether a race is more physical than mental. Bouchard has her own thoughts on this. "I feel there has to be a balance of the two. Your body has to be in top condition, while your mind can tell you what extremes you can go to."

With recruiting wars venturing into the realm of women's athletics, it is a pleasure to see an athlete who makes it into college competition on her own. Bouchard has accomplished this by working hard to improve herself. According to Coach Bland, Bouchard's vast amount of talent will allow her to continue to improve.

As with most athletes Bouchard has a number of individual as well as team goals she hopes to accomplish. "As a team I hope we can place in the top three in New England. The Eastern's are at Vermont this year and I would like to be there. As for track I would like to qualify for the Nationals this year."

Most excellent athletes dream about the Olympics and the possibility of being in the national limelight. As for Bouchard, there are no such thoughts. "I have other goals in life beside running. I'm really not willing to dedicate all my life to one area."

Will Guidry or Rice Win the American League MVP Award?

By Rob Smith

Late September brings an annual state of confusion to the world of professional sports, which either generates increased excitement or causes great perplexity among the fans. It is the time when sports fans are forced to swallow not only the annual Red Sox–Yankee showdown, but also Sunday's battles in pro football as well as early basketball exhibitions and reports from the hockey training camps that clutter the daily sports pages. So, after thoroughly enjoying a weekend in which the Red Sox closed within one game of the Yankees, one question remains unanswered. Who will be the American League MVP this year?

The two most likely choices are Jim Rice of the Boston Red Sox and Ron Guidry of the New York Yankees. Both the New York and Boston media have pleaded their cases. Now let's look at what each individual has accomplished this year.

Jim Rice has been leading American League hitters in practically every department since opening day back in April. As of Sunday Rice was second in batting average (.316), first in home runs (43), first in RBI's (133), first in hits (208), while also leading the league in slugging percentage and total bases. He has hit an astonishing .346 with runners on base and of his 43 home runs, 24 have broken tie ballgames and five have brought the Sox from behind. Put simply, Jim Rice has proven to everyone that he is a clutch hitter with power the American League hasn't witnessed since the days of Mantle, Killebrew and Ted Williams. While the Red Sox have hit a horrible .245 as a team since the All Star break, Rice has hit a respectable .317, keeping the Sox in the pennant race. Some experts have stated that Rice is not a complete player since he rarely plays the outfield, usually resorting to his role of designated hitter. It must be remembered, however, the only reason Jim Rice is not playing left field consistently is because of a fellow named Carl Yaztremski, the best left fielder in the game. Furthermore, when Rice has played the outfield, he has done so superbly, committing only three errors while racking up 13 assists to his credit.

Ron Guidry, the fireballing skinny kid of the Yanks, has easily been the most awesome pitcher in the American League this year. His statistics as of Sunday reflect his total domination over opposing hitters. He has the most wins (23), most strikeouts (226), most shutouts (9) and lowest ERA (1.80). In the midst of a season when no one was sure who would be in Yankee rotation next, Guidry has been the cornerstone of consistency and the glue which has held the Yankees together.

What we have is two superior athletes, each having performed as true superstars throughout the season. Thus, the decision will probably come down to the fact that since Guidry will obviously win the Cy Young award for the best pitcher in the AL, then Rice deserves equal recognition – i.e. the MVP award. But this logic is too simplistic in measuring the contributions of the two individuals. While Guidry has been superb, he has only been valuable every fifth day, whereas Rice has played in every game this year. Moreover, even though Guidry has won 23 games this year, several other pitchers in recent years have accomplished this feat (Steve Carlton, Jim Palmer, Steve Jones, etc.) No one recently except George Foster has demonstrated the ability to hit for average and power like Rice has this year. So, in choosing the MVP this year, I'll go along with the comments of Carlton Fisk: "The Yankees wouldn't be anywhere without Guidry. But it's exactly the same with the Red Sox without Rice. In this case, you have to ask who, day after day, all season, did the most for his team. The answer is Jim Rice."

Angels Outfielder Murdered

California Angels outfielder Lyman Bostock was shot to death while riding in a car last Sunday in Gary, Indiana. Bostock was in the car with his uncle and at least two other persons, one of them the wife of the 31 year old man arrested in connection with the murder.

Leonard Smith, arrested at his residence six blocks from the shooting, was identified by his 26-year-old wife Barbara as the man who shot the gun, police said. She told police her husband had been following her all day. Mrs. Smith, in the process of getting a divorce, also claimed her husband had pulled a gun on her earlier that week but the incident had not been investigated. Police said the two women in the car were longtime friends of Bostock. Having grown up in Gary, Bostock was returning from just having signed autographs for kids in the Gary ghetto.

Eagles Upset Dolphins

Head coach of the Philadelphia Eagles Dick Vermeil savored the biggest victory since taking over as leader of the Eagles three seasons ago, as Philadelphia soundly defeated the Miami Dolphins 17-3 on Sunday. Runningbacks Wilbert Montgomery and Mike Hogan sped past the Miami defense as quarterback Ron Jaworski connected for two touchdown passes. "As far as I'm concerned," Vermeil commented, "collectively, and I mean offense, defense and special teams, this was the best we've played since I've been here." Montgomery added, "I think this proved to us we can line up against any team in the league and be in the game." Philadelphia defeated New Orleans 24-17 last week.

Guidry Connects for 23rd

New York Yankees pitcher Ron Guidry pitched his third two hit shutout in four starts as the Yankees blanked Cleveland 4-0 last Sunday. The win stretched Guidry's record to 23-3 and the shutout, his ninth, ranks his earned run average down to 1.74, the best in the major leagues.

Guidry also lowered the league's batting average against him to .194 by holding the Indians to two hits. The win marked the 14th time in his 23 victories that Guidry has been able to win immediately after a Yankee loss.

Chargettes Disbanded Due to Bunny

The San Diego Chargers disbanded their cheerleading team, the Chargettes, after it was learned that one of its members had posed nude for Playboy Magazine. One of the women now unemployed called the decision "male chauvanism."

Yaz To Play Through 1981

Carl Yastremski, captain of the Boston Red Sox, hopes to continue playing through 1981. Yaz said he made the decision after talking to his wife earlier this week. "I think a big reason," he explained, "is that after 1979, I'll have two children in college and just small kids at home. We both felt if I was in good health, and could make a contribution to the ball club, that I should stay on as a player." Yastremski, 27th on the all-time base-hit list, needs only 140 hits to reach the 3000 mark.

Watson Captures Napa

Tom Watson made the $200,000 NAPA Open his fifth tournament victory of the year by closing with a five-under-par 67 on Sunday. The trophy increased Watson's 1978 money-leading total to $343,429. Watson, who now has 11 tour victories plus two British Open titles since starting out in 1972, now holds the Vardon Trophy lead for the lowest stroke average.

Redskins Crush Jets

The Washington Redskins clobbered the N.Y. Jets 23-3 on Sunday to continue their undefeated streak to four games as Washington quarterback Joe Theisman enjoyed his best day as a pro, connecting for 21 of 30 pass attempts. Theisman, taking advantage of the big holes produced by the deep set up of the Jets' cornerbacks, tallied 209 yards of passing and two touchdown connections.

Washington's defense stopped N.Y. on four key short yardage situations and sacked the Jets' quarterbacks six times. Jet starting quarterback Richard Todd left the game with a fractured left shoulder after the shins sacked him twice in a row. Todd will be sidelines for six to eight weeks.

Kuhn Says No to Women but Judge Says Yes

Baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn's policy of barring female sportswriters from major league clubhouses was overturned by a federal judge in New York, ordering the doors to the New York Yankees stadium locker rooms opened to reporters of both sexes. The order applied to Melissa Ludkte, a Sports Illustrated reporter denied access to the Yankee locker rooms during the 1977 World Series. The Kuhn policy overrode an overwhelming majority team vote in 1976 to admit women.

Women's Health Care

Dreading those awful waits to see the Gyn nurse practitioner? Wanting some information about contraception, but not going because of so much time involved? We've got a good solution this year! Our new Gyn practitioner, Marie Kassakian, has devised an alternate system for the clinic. Now you can call the Health Service (ext. 3350) and, depending on the severity and nature of your problem, will be advised to come in that day as a walk-in patient or be given an appointment for a future date. For the most part, the walk-in times will be reserved specifically for acute problems. This appointment-by-phone system is only for the Gyn clinic. We sincerely hope this will reduce the long waiting lines!

Perhaps you're wondering what kinds of services we offer. Ms. Kassakian, who is a gyn nurse practitioner, will be doing Pap tests; counselling, discussing contraceptive options, and handling a variety of gynecological problems. Any problem that cannot be handled by her will be referred out to a community physician. Ms. Kassakian will follow up on referred problems, thus providing you with continuity of care. Your student health insurance will help with the costs of the off-campus referrals. Your health fee pays for all visits to the UHS Gyn practitioner.

Again, this is an effort to facilitate better health care and communication between you and our clinic. We would really appreciate some feedback on how you feel about this system. Let's work together and make this school year a good one!

Oktoberfest October 21

The date for this year's Oktoberfest is Saturday, October 21, 1978, and will be held on the Redstone Green. The Entertainment Committee is hard at work trying to organize the entertainment festivities for the day. We want this year's entertainment to be exciting, enjoyable and creative, so we are asking any UVM student or group who would be interested in putting together some type of performance as part of the Oktoberfest entertainment to contact either Mayda George (ext. 4332) or Lew Lerman (ext. 2199) as soon as possible.

Environmental Club

The UVM Environmental Club will be having its first meeting Sunday October 1 at 7:00 p.m. in Robinson Hall. All students are welcome to attend. Topics of discussion will be projects for the upcoming year, philosophy and function of the club, energy conservation on campus, and more. Bring your ideas!

New Fiction Contest Announced

New York – Women and men between the ages of 18 and 28, who have not previously published fiction in a magazine with a circulation greater than 25,000 are eligible to enter Redbook's third annual Young Writers' Contest, announced today.

Details of the contest were published in the magazine's current (October) issue where all five winners of last year's contest also appear. First prize winner was 27-year-old Chandler Gilman, of Durham, New Hampshire, who submitted a story entitled "Assumptions." Although Redbook planned to publish only the first-prize story, the magazine's editors found the quality of the entries so high, they elected to publish the runners-up as well.

"There are so few good short story markets available to young and unknown writers, that Redbook is especially pleased to be able to encourage this talent," Contest Editor Jacqueline Johnson commented. In its first two years, Redbook's Young Writers' Contest has drawn nearly 10,000 entries.

The new contest, which offers a first prize of $1500 and publication in a future issue of Redbook, will be judged by a panel of the magazine's editors. Second prize is $300, and there are three third prizes of $100 each.

Entry manuscripts should be typed, double-spaced, on one side of white 8½x11 inch paper, not more than 25 lines to a page. The stories must be no longer than 20 pages, and only one story may be entered per author. Entries, which should be mailed to Redbook's Third Young Writers' Contest, Box 3-F, 230 Park Avenue, New York, NY 10017, must be postmarked no later than December 31, 1978 and received by January 19, 1979.

Student Health Advisory Group

Students interested in how the Student Health Service spends that $34-a-semester health fee and who would like to take an active part in the improvement of UVM's Health Service are urged to attend an organizational meeting for a Student Health Advisory Group on Wednesday, October 4, 1978, Marsh Lounge, 7 to 8 p.m. A Student Health Advisory Committee is needed to review the Health Service's budget and to review and make recommendations about the health service fee and the student health insurance coverage. A Student Health Advisory Committee is also needed to initiate and implement some health education programs on campus, such as running a blood pressure screening program or developing peer sex educators or the conducting of a user survey or developing an effective grievance system for students with complaints about the health service.

Student Health Advisory Committees are functioning on other university campuses. Consumer health advisory groups are functioning in Vermont communities. How about getting an effective consumer group going at UVM?

By the way, for those of you considering careers in health education or health administration, participation in a Student Health Advisory Committee is a great way to gain some hands-on experience in the health field. Check out the opportunities on October 4!

Women's Ice Hockey

To all those interested in playing women's ice hockey, there will be an organizational meeting at 6:30 p.m. October 12 upstairs in Billings. Please bring a pen/pencil as there will be forms to complete. If you can't attend, please contact Pamela 862-0895 or Sarah 656-4254.

Kidder Award

Nominations are now being accepted for the 1979 George V. Kidder Faculty Award. The award is presented to a faculty member who has made significant contributions to the broadening of the student's academic experience and to the enrichment of campus life.

To be eligible, a faculty member must have been part of the University community for not less than five years and be a full-time faculty member.

Selections are made by the DSA Committee of the Alumni Council with the Alumni Director and student representatives from Mortar Board and Boulder Societies acting in a non-voting advisor capacity.

Nominations which are due by Jan. 1 should be in the form of a cover letter and a resume. For further information contact Anne Beaudin at the Alumni Office, 656-2010.

More Movies

SA Films and UVM Art Dept. sponsor Cinema Women with Green Valley Film and Art Center presenting "The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum," Saturday, Sept. 30 at 7:30 p.m. in Cook B-106. $2.00 donation. Childcare provided. Benefit Kristina Berster defense.

Interested in Plain Old Fun?

Don't let the cool autumn nights keep you housebound this fall...

For stimulating lectures on current topics, updates on research at the University, and just plain fun, join Chittenden County Alumni and Parents and UVM community members for the fall edition of the Chittenden County Lecture Series.

George Keyser, Director of the George Aiken Maple Research Center, will lead a tour of the facility on Thursday, October 5, at 7:30 p.m. He will give a presentation on the activities of the Center as well as provide visitors with an opportunity to see the labs where active experiments are being conducted. The Center is located on Spear Street, just before the first underpass heading south.

All alimni, parents, students, and community members are welcome. For more information, please contact the Alumni Office, 86 South Williams Street, 656-2010.

Scholarship

The Acacia Fraternity at the University of Vermont has awarded the Roy F. Stowell Memorial Scholarship to Francis C. Swasey of South Royalton, VT.

The $100 scholarship is awarded annually to a Vermont resident who is an incoming freshman at UVM. Grades, attendance, extra-curricular activities and financial need are all evaluated by Vermont Acacians and Acacian alumni.

Teacher Training Program

The University of Vermont has received a $98,000 Title VII grant from the U.S. Office of Education for an undergraduate teacher training program in bilingual education and Franco-American studies.

VICTORINOX

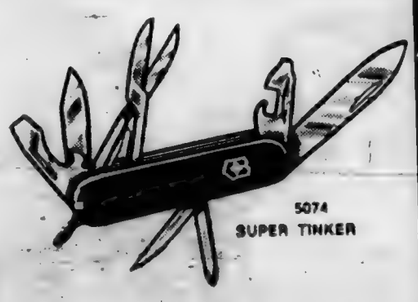
There is only one original Swiss Army Officers' knife, and that is the Victorinox.

Patented in 1897 by Charles Elsener, founder of Victorinox, the original Swiss Army "Offiziersmesser" was made from only the highest quality materials; it contained six blades and operated on only two springs.



Only original Victorinox knives bear the inlaid silver Victorinox shield with the Swiss cross, the symbol of Swiss pride of superior craftsmanship.

Today, Victorinox knives are built in a modern plant utilizing the finest materials available in the world. The Victorinox "Champion" Swiss Army knife requires 348 different operations for manufacture. After each step there is a thorough test of each operation, then the knife is submitted to a severe final test by qualified inspectors who take pride in their work. This is why we can guarantee a Victorinox for life against any possible manufacturing defects. Your Victorinox knife will always work and will withstand the corrosive effects of tropical climates or frozen mountain temperatures.

PRINCIPLES OF WINTERIZING YOUR BODY

1. Insulate - to provide a barrier between skin and air

2. Keep dry - when your body becomes wet, it loses its ability to insulate

3. Overdress - you can always take a garment off, but you can't put it on if you don't have it with you

YOUR HEAD

1. Any hat which is comfortable for you will keep heat from escaping from your head.
2. A hood worn over a hat will keep you dry.

YOUR BODY

Use the layer principle

1. Thermal underwear - waffle-weave creates air pockets to retain heat - 100% cotton lets skin breathe, allows moisture to escape
2. Shirt with high wool or cotton content provides warmth and draws moisture away from body
3. Wool or corduroy pants add another layer of heat
4. A vest or jacket of down or Dacron builds wind resistance and retains heat
5. Raingear keeps body dry, resists wind, prevents escape of heat

YOUR HANDS

1. Gloves or mittens prevent heat loss - make sure wrists are covered (blood vessels are close to the surface) - water repellent if possible

YOUR FEET

1. Properly fitted boots that are well insulated and waterproof - too snug prevents proper circulation
2. Silk socks act as a wick to draw moisture from feet and keep them dry
3. Wool socks "breathe" and create air space to retain warmth

TICKET HOLDER GUIDELINES FOR ALL S.A. CONCERTS

(1) We STRONGLY suggest that holders of reserve tickets arrive and enter Patrick Gym AT LEAST 45 MINUTES prior to show time. This will allow ample time for ushers to assist you in locating and occupying your seats before the lights go down. Persons arriving at the gym shortly before, or after, show time will be held in the lobby until ushers are available to seat them. Again we stress you ARRIVE EARLY!

(2) It is VITAL that all persons entering the gym retain their ticket stubs AT ALL TIMES. Ticket stubs will be needed to locate your seat and will be checked whenever you enter your seating area. ANYONE without a ticket stub, found inside the building, will be removed immediately. THERE WILL BE NO EXCEPTIONS!

(3) No persons will be permitted to stand in the aisles at any time. Security will request that persons take their seats or leave. Any persons continuing to loiter in the aisles will be removed from the building.

(4) For your convenience we have included a seating chart. You will find that there are three separate sections: Obstructed, Floor, and Bleacher/Balcony. It should be understood that persons will be restricted to the lobby and the section where they hold a ticket.

① FOR BALCONY + BLEACHER SEATS ONLY. ② FOR FLOOR SEATS ONLY. ③ FOR OBSTRUCTED VIEW SEATS ONLY.

Connally Assails Deficit Spending

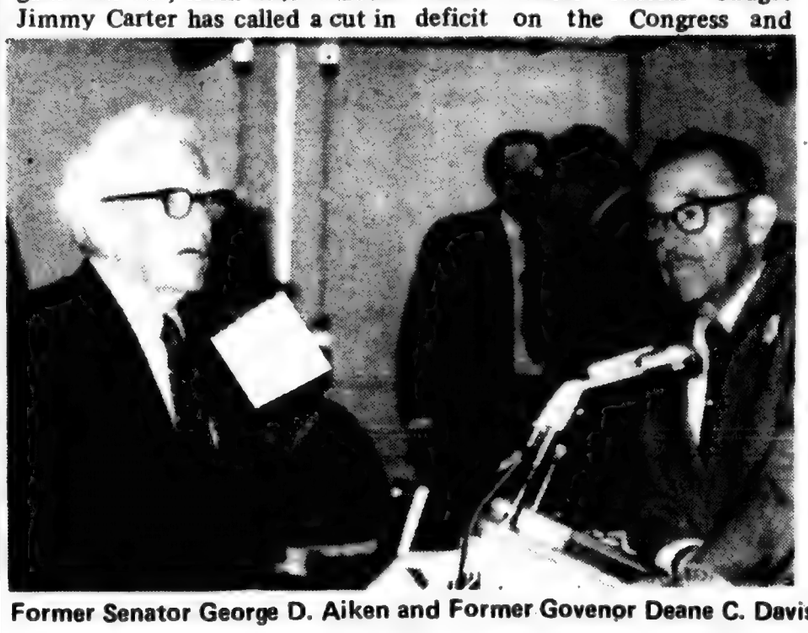
By John Letteri

John Connally, former Governor of Texas and potential candidate for president in 1980, said inflation fueled by a federal government that spends beyond its means is the biggest worry of American people today.

Speaking before over 400 Vermont Republicans, Connally proposed the federal government cut both taxes and spending by $25 billion in the next fiscal year.

The former governor said the spending cut would not seriously hamper the government's operations since it would represent a 5% cut in each federal agency's budget. "When the estimated GSA (General Service Administration) fraud accounts for between $15-50 billion, and HEW's budget is the third largest in the world, the cuts wouldn't be too hard to handle."



He further advocated a capital gains tax cut, from 49% to 25%. Jimmy Carter has called a cut in capital gains tax as something to benefit the rich and not the common person. Connally called this a clear misunderstanding and Carter a demagogue for thinking it.

Connally said that with the capital gains tax cut and a trimming of the bureaucracy, renewed industrial plant construction, stepped-up research, and more jobs would follow. This, combined with a strong effort to regain America's premier standing on the international trade market, would reduce inflation and give the American economy a much needed boost.

He assailed the current Democratic congress for not passing legislation to cut the inflationary spiral, and constantly reappropriating billions of dollars for programs that haven't proven effective. Connally blamed the near 12% inflation rate and the close to 50 billion dollar federal budget deficit on the Congress and present administration.

Former Senator George D. Aiken and Former Govenor Deane C. Davis

Currently, the United States is not treated "fairly" on the international trade market said Connally. The U.S. allows other countries to sell their goods in America, yet the other countries, namely principal trading partners Germany and Japan, do not allow the same flow of American goods into their countries.

Connally proposed that Carter announce to countries trading with the U.S. that at the end of fiscal 1980 (June 30), America will want an "equilibrium in its trade account." Following this announcement, import quotas would be stiffened and import duties raised to prevent such things as the dumping of Japanese steel on the U.S. market.

Connally said "this was possible and should be done" to reassert American trade and bolster America's economy. "All we want is to be treated fairly," he continued.

In a press conference later, Connally said members of the press "should not assume I am running for president, but then again don't assume that I am not." An AP reporter said by appearing in almost one state per day, he certainly looked like he was campaigning. Connally said, however, he was only stumping for local candidates.

> "you should not assume I am running for president, but then again don't assume I am not."

Among the other Republican luminaries at the luncheon were Governor Snelling, former Governor Deane C. Davis, and former Senator George D. Aiken.

Kristina Berster Goes to Trial

By Jim Oakes

Despite a mass of pre-trial misinformation labeling Kristina Berster a terrorist and associate of the notoriously violent Baader-Meinhof gang, it appears that the 28 year old West German woman will go on trial in Burlington for alleged passport violations and conspiracy charges.

Presiding judge Albert Coffrin questioned 17 potential jurors on Tuesday and dismissed seven for excessive partiality, one being Mary Paquette, wife of the Burlington mayor. Defense lawyers filed a pre-trial motion calling for the dismissal of charges on the grounds of excessive and inflammatory pre-trial publicity. Judge Coffrin has reserved judgment on the motion until he has interviewed prospective jurors.

Kristina Berster is wanted by the West German government for failure to show up at her trial stemming from a 1972 arrest for protesting conditions in mental institutions and criminal association, according to the Vermont Vanguard Press. Berster and other co-defendants sent an open letter to the West German court expressing their belief that a fair trial for criminal association was not possible in the repressive West German political climate. The group also announced they would not appear for trial, reported the Vanguard article of Sept. 5. True to her word, Kristina Berster disappeared before her court date and eventually left West Germany.

Traveling and living under an assumed name for five years, Berster was apprehended July 16th while attempting to enter the United States from Canada at the Vermont border with a false Iranian passport. Her bail was originally set at $500,000 then lowered to $100,000. She remains in jail.

The trial of Kristina Berster is a crowded affair. Among the individuals and groups involved have been attorney William Kunstler, a Kristina Berster Defense Committee, a small army of lawyers, the F.B.I., U.S. Immigration, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and West German Intelligence. Even UVM is part of the show.

The S.A. speakers bureau will have Kunstler speak Tuesday at 8:00 p.m. in the Ira Allen Chapel on the topic The Law and the Outlaws. Kunstler politicizes his clients' cases to the maximum degree. This was his tactic at the Chicago Seven conspiracy trial, Wounded Knee and the Joanne Little trials. Kunstler is fond of defending celebrity radicals and should give an informative speech.

Also, the UVM Art dept., working as an unofficial go-between, procured the Angell lecture hall for Orchid Films to

RARE II Comes Under VPIRG Scrutiny

By Ann Seidenberg

In the unending battle for the future of Vermont's national forests fought between preservationists and developers, a new bone of contention has been offered by the federal government. Rare II, the second Roadless Area Review and Evaluation conducted by the U.S. Forest Service, is fostering heated debate which is echoed nationwide. VPIRG is following the RARE II controversy closely.

Each year more and more of Vermont's land is being lost to pavement, subdivision, and related forms of development. As the need for fuel wood increases, there is also the threat of massive clear-cutting in the forests. Those lands specified as wilderness areas are immune to development, clear-cutting, road building, and off-road vehicles such as snowmobiles.

Presently, Vermont has two wilderness areas protected under the National Wilderness Preservation System. They are the Bristol Cliffs and Lye Brook areas of the Green Mountain National Forest. Together these areas comprise 18,300 acres of land, but wilderness proponents feel this is inadequate, as it is only 3/1000 of the total land area of Vermont.

The Forest Service and the Vermont Wilderness Association have compromised on four additional areas in the Green Mountain National Forest suitable for wilderness designation, totalling 55,720 acres. The Forest Service has reviewed these areas and prepared an analysis of them in terms of social concerns, resource values, and wilderness attributes. Proponents argue that the analysis is biased against wilderness on the basis of inaccurate information and subjective assessments.

Wilderness opponents argue, among other things, that it is wrong to prohibit snowmobiles and other mechanical equipment in the areas. Proponents counter by saying that many people want to experience outdoor recreation without the sight and sound of vehicles and chain saws.

Another strong argument of wilderness opponents is that the Vermont economy needs to harvest the timber from these areas. The Vermont Wilderness Association contends that the proposed wilderness areas are hard to reach and are of low productivity. Also, the easy-to-reach timber lands are not presently being harvested at their highest capacity.

The Vermont Wilderness Association believes it is necessary to preserve Vermont wilderness in order to preserve its diversity and heritage. They are urging concerned Vermonters to write to their Congressmen in Washington supporting Vermont wilderness.

Pope John Paul I's Passing a Shock

By Sarah Bailey

After a reign of only 34 days, Pope John Paul I died of an apparent heart attack on September 28 at the age of 65.

His unexpected death makes his reign the shortest of any modern-day pope. He was installed as pontiff on September 3 with relatively little of the pomp and ceremony normally associated with the event.

The Roman Catholic Church is once again being temporarily run by Cardinal Jean Villot, premier of the Vatican state. He will remain in charge until the second conclave of cardinals meets to elect a new Pope. The conclave must be held within 20 days of the pope's death, according to a decree by Pope Paul VI.

The pope was a man purportedly loved by all he touched. He was often called "the smiling pope" and was known as a happy and loveable man. His death came as a surprise to those who knew him. He was a man of frail health, and some cardinals felt the weight of the pontificate may have been too much for him.

Bishop Thomas Kelley, secretary of the United States Catholic Conference and national bishop's organization, said the Roman Catholic Church will be looking for a successor who will be "much the same type" as the late John Paul I. He expressed his disappointment that the world would not get to realize the full benefits of Pope John Paul I's reign. He said he did not "foresee any real problems" for the church while a new pope was being elected, or from the blow of John Paul I's early and sudden death.

These thoughts were echoed by Bishop John Marshall, head of the Roman Catholic Dioceses of Burlington, who said John

Burlington's Housing Crisis: The Case for Rent Control

News Analysis

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

At the beginning of the new fiscal year, the housing situation had not improved, with the rents remaining high and apartments becoming scarce.

Many landlords owning large apartments were converting to smaller ones, which made it impossible for people with families to find living quarters. With the continual growth in the area this is becoming an acute situation with no improvement seen in the immediate future.

This office feels that some sort of rent control is needed, along with low rent housing to ease the housing shortage that exists in the city.

This office is still of the opinion that landlords should request an inspection of their properties as they become vacant, to assure new tenants that minimum housing standards are met before renting these units. This would protect both the landlord and tenant.

Progress is being made by this office in trying to prevent areas of the city from becoming blighted.

Minimum Housing Report
Burlington Annual Report, 1975

The Burlington Minimum Housing Inspector's reports for the years 1973, 74, and 1975 advocate rent control as a necessary means of easing the financial crunch on the city's tenant population.

In the five years since the first mention of housing in the City Annual Report, the situation has seen many rhetorical ups and downs. It has seen the rise of both a tenant's and a landlord's association. The tenant's association, the Burlington Tenant's Organizing Committee (BTOC), has from its inception been a strong advocate of low-income housing and rent control. The Landlord's Association has staunchly held the line on the other side of the fence.

In 1976-7, however, the Minimum Housing Inspector's reports have been conspicuously rosier. They no longer mention "crisis" or "rent control." They mention instead landlord cooperation, and conditions which "continue to be upgraded."

This year has seen 200 tenants led by the BTOC pack an alderman's meeting demanding rent control, and recommendations from the Mayor's Housing Task Force that a committee be set up to study the feasibility of rent freezes, and rent and eviction control.

To date no committee has been set up.

Mayor Gordon Paquette has called BTOC rent control proposals "unconstitutional." While conceding that a problem exists, he has stated that rent control is not the answer.

Steve Petersen, director of residential life, and a former member of the Mayor's Housing Task Force, conceded that students living off-campus are a significant factor in the city's housing problems. However, he dismissed BTOC proposals that UVM build more on-campus housing as being "not in the interests of the university." He cited demographic studies which indicated that the university's traditional enrollment of 18-20 year olds will have dropped "significantly" by the mid-1980's. While he did not expect the university's enrollment to drop, he said that he expected the gap to be filled by older students returning to

BTOC Reorganizes

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

Incorporating a broad spectrum of community support and initiating an aggressive organizing campaign to carry on the fight for "decent, affordable housing" were the themes of last week's Burlington Tenant's Organizing Committee (BTOC) meeting.

Members of the North Street community group People Acting for Change Together (PACT), which has in the past sponsored and financially supported the BTOC, said the "time was ripe" for a new phase of action. They called on the BTOC to broaden its base in the community, and infuse new life into its leadership.

The meeting at St. Joseph's Parish Hall was attended by more than two dozen tenants. They cited high rents, sub-standard conditions, eviction without cause and harrassment, among their reasons for attending.

Echoing the mood of the meeting, a Handy Court tenant said, "If we had said two years ago 'you can't fight city hall,' then we wouldn't have a Handy Court today. We won that battle, but they raised my rent 150%, so I guess we lost the war. Now, it's time for another battle."

Handy Court was at one time under consideration as a site for a Medical Center Hospital parking complex. The project was abandoned in the face of outspoken opposition by area residents.

Little was in evidence at the meeting of the BTOC's grass-roots support, which marshalled 200 tenants, and 2700 signatures in support of rent control to a city aldermanic meeting in June of this year.

At that time, the aldermen claimed that they had no authority to consider rent control. They passed a resolution directing the BTOC to address themselves to

109 North Avenue:

A Case in Point

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

Two red and white signs are tacked by the doors of a five unit apartment building at 109 North Avenue in Burlington. They are clearly visible to commuters from Burlington's suburban north end who congest the avenue with inbound traffic in the morning, and outbound traffic in the early afternoon. They distinguish it from the many sub-standard apartment buildings which surround it. The signs read, "Danger: This Dwelling Unfit for Occupancy." At the bottom is the scrawled signature of Raymond Wheel, Building Inspector, City of Burlington.

What is taking place at 109 North Avenue tells of the worst aspects of the Queen City's severe housing crisis. Tenants of the building have been coping for years with its disrepair. There are large holes in the roof which have long facilitated the indoor forecasting of rain. The plumbing is antiquated, inadequate, and also in need of repair. The anachronistic wiring has long threatened to send the building up in the billows of smoke which several weeks ago destroyed a neighboring apartment building. The tenants of that building are fortunate to have escaped with their lives; they lost all else that they had.

It was, eventually, the wiring which induced the city to take action against the building's owner, to protect the lives of its tenants.

Yet, in spite of the danger to their health and safety posed by the building, the tenants were far from happy with the action that the city chose to take. They have been told to move.

When they are able to find another apartment, a Herculean task for low-income tenants caught in the crunch of the city-wide housing shortage, they can expect to face higher rents, possibly more cramped quarters, and, at best, a marginally safer environment in which to raise their children. And, although they may not be able to afford it, to engage in the illusory pursuit of happiness.

The building has not yet been condemned. The outcome of the city's suit against Gabriel Gagnon, the building's owner, will decide whether the building will be renovated or condemned, according to Raymond Wheel, the City's housing inspector.

Although the building has not been officially condemned, Wheel said that the tenants had been advised to find new housing, to protect against the contingency of being summarily evicted in the event the building is condemned. However, he said "they are free to stay pending the outcome of the suit."

Three of the five units have already been vacated.

"He just told us to get out, find another place, and get out," said a former tenant, when pressed to comment. She denied having been told that she was free to stay until the city's suit was decided, but said she was not given a deadline, either. She refused further comment and asked that she not be identified.

No provisions were made by the city to relocate the displaced tenants.

The Burlington Minimum Housing Code contains a provision for relocation of "any person or business displaced by enforcement" of the code. It states that it "shall be the duty of the building inspector" to insure that all parties are "effectively assisted in locating other suitable housing..."

Not fit for human occupancy

Although the building was in violation of the Minimum Code, Wheel pointed out that he had declared it unfit for occupancy under a different section of the city building code. He took the action under the city building and construction code, which makes no provision for displacement or relocation.

He admitted, however, that despite the relocation section of the Minimum Code, there is no procedure, no apparatus, and no appropriation for the relocation of tenants displaced by its enforcement. "All we have is the BHA (Burlington Housing Authority), if they have any vacancies," he said.

Burlington Tenant's Organizing Committee spokesperson Barry Levine called the city's actions "questionable, at best." He claimed that the building's tenants had been filing complaints of Minimum Code violations with the city for "more than two years."

"What they are doing is no help to tenants," said Levine. "The tenants are thrown out into the street. Now there are five less units available to us."

school to continue their educations. These students would not be expected to live on campus, but would be drawn from the local community.

In terms of the projected mid-1980's enrollment, Petersen termed present campus living facilities "about right."

It is important to keep two things in mind here. First, the university has a longstanding history of under-estimating both its enrollment and its student housing needs. Secondly, the university administration considers the housing shortage strictly a city problem. Petersen is undoubtedly correct in assuming that more dorm space would not attract off-campus apartment dwellers back to the campus. But alternative solutions to the problem have not been explored in depth. For example, the university might construct semi-autonomous apartment complexes for upper-classmen on campus.

Petersen's participation in the Mayor's Housing Task Force was, he said, the first instance of the city's inclusion of the university in an attempt to deal with housing problems. He expressed hope that it would serve to establish a precedent.

The Mayor's Housing Task Force was set up last year with the specific purpose of protecting the residential quality of Burlington's King Street waterfront neighborhood. It addressed the concern of King St. area residents that the neighborhood, which includes numerous national historic sites, would be adversely affected by city plans for commercial development of its waterfront area.

Under the Task Force's plan, a non-profit corporation will be set up to administer federal Housing and Urban Development (HUD) funds for the renovation of King St. area rental housing. Improvement mortgages will be made available to landlords and property owners in the area. HUD guidelines would then be used to establish fair profit rents. Low income families would be expected to pay one quarter of their incomes in rent. The difference between the 25% figure and the HUD established rent would be subsidized by HUD.

Barbara McConnell of the Church Street Center's Consumer Education and Access Project, a member of the Task Force, said it was expected that the project would create approximately 120 new units, and rehabilitate over 300 existing units.

The Task Force also made recommendations concerning the city's broader housing problems. The recommendations included zoning stipulations that any commercial development not result in a net loss of housing units, and that the city look into the possibilities of tax and re-assessment freezes, that committees be set up to study rent and eviction controls, and to draw up plans for development of low-income housing.

The city has taken no action on any of the committee's recommendations not specifically related to the King St. area.

BTOC spokesperson Barry Levin called the project "very important to the King St. area. But he was quick to point out that the scope of the project was grossly out of proportion with the real needs of the city. The immediate needs of the city's tenants called for a minimum of three thousand units, he said, and a net gain of 120 units in the King St. area is barely a drop in the bucket.

Earlier this year the Consumer Education and Access Project conducted workshops on tenant problems and rent control. Kathy Gannett and Mark Goldowitz, a research team from Boston, a city which already has rent control, prepared a working paper for the workshops. The paper outlined the means by which rent control could be expected to deal with Burlington's specific housing problems:

(1) High rents: eliminates rent gouging while allowing landlords a reasonable return, by requiring proof of actual cost increases to justify rent increases.

(2) Evictions: requires landlord to prove just cause for eviction, thereby eliminating arbitrary evictions.

(3) Conditions: creates significant sanctions for landlord failure to make repairs, including denial of rent increases & evictions and imposition of rent decreases; since tenants are protected against arbitrary evictions, they are more willing and able to press landlords to make necessary repairs.

(4) Preserved low income housing stock by curbing profiteering, speculation, and unnecessary luxury development.

(5) Better system to resolve housing disputes: Local rent boards are less formal, costly and intimidating, and more accessible and sensitive to community housing needs than are the courts where landlord/tenant disputes are now resolved.

(6) Information: makes accessible to tenants, the public, and the government important information about landlord and housing market finances and operation.

Rent control remains an extremely emotional issue. It is an extremely political issue, as well, for it alters the basic relationship of landlord and tenant. It assumes as its underlying principle that all people have a right to "decent,

Rubin Speaks of 60's as Precursor to 70's

By John Letteri

The goal of the counter cultural revolution of the 1960's was the destruction of the many antiquated myths American people believed about themselves and their country, and to replace these myths with a new American consciousness, said Jerry Rubin last Thursday at the Ira Allen Chapel.

Speaking before a near capacity crowd, Rubin said this new consciousness would include the realization that America was no longer the only country with the best possible philosophy of government, that the Viet Nam war was wrong, and that our political system and leaders were corrupt and in need of change.

From this, the myths of the Pentagon's almighty superiority, that American people should be standing behind soldiers in Viet Nam, and the American myth of "my country right or wrong" should be dispelled.

The 60's movement accomplished this and much more, Rubin said. "We won! But we were so successful in the 60's that we convinced people things were so awful... that they believe today there is really nothing we can do about it." Rubin attributed the apolitical, apathetic attitude of most college students today to this general feeling.

"Yet, many positive changes came from the 60's as well. Two presidents, unworthy of office, Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon, were deposed. People realized after the Viet Nam war that those who were opposed to the war were the real patriots, and those who prolonged the war were the "real betrayers of American ideals," Rubin continued.

In addition, Rubin said that the 70's atmosphere of sensitivity, honesty and openness were also born out of the 60's movement. Rather than the externalized, confrontive nature of the 60's movement, the people of the 70's look to change the system from within and look into themselves for any enemies to be destroyed.

Rubin attributed the birth of the women's movement to the openness of the 70's that the 60's had created. "Hey, free blacks, free Indians, what about the woman?"

Even with the death of the 60's movement, Rubin explained that new realizations about America were born. For example, while Rubin was being taken from San Quentin to Chicago to stand trial in 1968, an FBI agent told him, "We'll let you play for awhile, we'll let you have your demonstrations, but if this thing ever gets serious, if it ever looks as if you can really do something, we'll take every one of you, put you in concentration camps and do to you exactly what Hitler did to the Jews, one by one, and we won't even think a second thought about it."

Rubin said he realized "there was definitely a facist network fully prepared to do that in this country."

The shootings at Kent State also contributed to the downfall of the movement, and to another realization. "Somebody had to tell the guard when to start shooting," and how far up in the government that order goes has yet to be determined.

"... we convinced people things were so awful... that they believe today there is really nothing they can do about it ..."

Perhaps the root of the individualistic, apathetic atmosphere of the 70's lies in the paradox of the 60's philosophy. While rejecting the system, the members of the movement were participating in it. "We were our own contradiction," said Rubin.

For example, Rubin noted the competitiveness of different radical groups for attention, the pointing to women first at meetings to take notes, and the "don't trust anybody over 30" idea all were born from societal conditions imposed on members by existing American ideals.

From this contradiction, Rubin said, the idea that the structure of society should be changed fell through. He said "We must change and thus adapt to society and effect change from within, this being the exact route many former revolutionaries and current movement leaders are taking."

After Rubin completed his talk, he opened up the floor for a question and answer period. One woman asked if Rubin would donate part of his salary to the Kristina Berster defense fund. He flatly said "No." This spurred a flurry of commentary from several disappointed people who felt Rubin was betraying his Yippie heritage by not taking part in something that was radical. But one man got up and said, "Jerry's been taking a lot from people about this and that, but these two ladies (indicating the women who asked for Berster money) have been gabbing all night, and the only time they spoke, or paid attention was when it was their turn to beg for money."

Others made short speeches on the nature of the individual in the 70's, the nuclear power movement, and the disadvantages of having Meldrim Thomson as a governor. Rubin said he does not feel the anti-nuclear movement can develop into anything as radical as the movement in the 60's because there isn't the same "passion" involved.

Although many people came to the speech with preconceived notions and opinions of what Rubin was like and what he stood for, the entire audience was captured when he spoke of his own sexual inhibitions and fears. In response to a question about his own sexuality, Rubin explained sex for him in the 60's was a very "macho thing." He said he had no real conception of love, and was constantly in fear of not performing well during sex.

When Rubin had "called it a night," Paul Schnabel, a night watchman from Marlboro College, suddenly came up behind him and smashed a pie in his face. Although Rubin called after him to "stop and talk about it," Schnabel continued out a side door in Ira Allen.

While rejecting the system, the members of the movement were participating in it. "We were our own contradiction."

Many UVM students expressed their displeasure at the way the pie-throwing incident was blown out of proportion in the local media. One said, "The speech and the intensity of the entire evening were lost to the 'gross misrepresentation' of the pie-throwing incident."

The local daily featured four pictures of Rubin with pie in his affordable housing."

Nor is rent control the whole solution, for there will still exist a need for more government subsidized low-income housing, before all Burlington residents can be decently housed.

Perhaps the time has come to take seriously the views the Minimum Housing Inspector held five years ago, as the city official closest to the conditions of rental housing in the city. The 1973 report concludes: "Some kind of rent control is as badly needed as low rent housing, and should go hand in hand with the acute housing shortage in the city."

The politics of the situation have remained strictly rhetorical. The city has refused to address itself to the problem, which has been since the 1960's, and remains today, a city-wide crisis with no relief in sight.

Rental housing remains difficult to find, with a vacancy rate well below one percent. Families with young children are crowded into sub-divided units, which, although clearly inadequate, are still far more expensive than low income tenants can afford.

Landlords can evict tenants for any cause they deem reasonable, even for purely arbitrary ones. More evictions are being contested, not because the tenants have any legal grounds on which to contest them but because they find that there simply are no available apartments to move to.

Rents have not remained at the artificially high levels of 1973, but instead have soared steadily upward. Today, rents of $250-300 for two bedroom apartments are not uncommon, and one can figure on another $100 as a not unreasonable incremental cost of additional bedrooms.

Sub-standard dwellings have remained a problem in many sections of the city. Yet many tenants, fearful of antagonizing their landlords, or of an increase in the rent, feel that they cannot afford to complain. This is especially true of those on fixed incomes, who most fear rental increases, and of families, well aware of the difficulty of finding a new apartment.

Student housing remains a multi-faceted problem unaddressed by either the city or the university. "Because of the continual growth of colleges in the area, students are leasing apartments year around, which results in a shortage of apartments for our own people," reads the Minimum Housing Inspector's Report for 1972. The past six years have only intensified the conflict. Students not only contribute to the shortage of rental units, but constitute a main factor in rental inflation, due to their willingness and ability to pay a higher proportion of their income for shelter.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, is the economic environment in which the housing shortage is taking place. Wages are relatively low, prices are relatively high.

The average weekly wage of Vermonters is $35 below the national average. At the same time food costs are some of the highest in the nation. Heating costs are high, as well as unpredictable. All of these factors intensify the hardship caused by some of the highest rents in the country.

There are no easy answers, no panaceas offering a quick solution.

Burlington's legislative delegation, claiming that the city needs state enabling legislation before it can enact rent control ordinances. The BTOC contests that claim.

Maurice Mahoney, brother of state representative J. Daniel Mahoney, said that his brother plans to introduce that legislation if re-elected.

Mahoney suggested that the group involve themselves in ward politics and consider bringing pressure to bear on the university administration to house some of the approximately 3000 students who presently live off-campus. He cited students as the decisive element in the housing squeeze, and in rental inflation. He estimated that over 15% of the city's rental units are now being occupied by students "foisted upon the community."

Speaking up in support of the students, Varian Schmokel suggested UVM build apartment units for student housing. She said many students are living in sub-standard housing and are forced to pay "rip-off" rents. She attributed the problem to piece-meal code enforcement on the part of the city, and the avariciousness of "many" landlords.

Katrine Hughes of PACT called for a three point program: (1) to protect all existing housing; (2) to facilitate the renovation of sub-standard units; (3) to support rent and eviction control.

Hughes cited past accomplishments of the BTOC as bringing the housing crisis to the status of a city issue. In addition, the BTOC took credit for thwarting an attempt to rezone North Street as a commercial district, a proposal which would have displaced rental units in favor of commercial development, for putting pressure on the mayor which resulted in the Mayor's Housing Task Force, and the King Street Project.

The BTOC plans to hold "tenant workshops" in the near future.

Winooski Hydro Dam May Cause Sewage Problem

By Morris Earle, Jr.

A proposed hydro dam in Winooski may help to create a sewage problem in the Winooski River in the next decade, according to Richard Czaplinski, chief water resources planner for the state of Vermont.

Speaking last Monday in Memorial lounge, Czaplinski talked about sewage disposal in the lower Winooski river, as part of the Vermont Seminar series on Rural Options. He said that a conflict is arising over future use of the river between the power company that wants it to generate electricity, the towns that are dumping sewage into it, and the "recreational users," that want it to remain clean.

Czaplinski said that hardly any problem exists now and that the river is much cleaner than it was 15 to 20 years ago, when towns were dumping raw sewage into it. He explained that seven towns and one industry (IBM) dump wastes into the lower 20 miles of the river, but all have primary or secondary sewage treatment facilities. The treatment is supposed to break down the effluent to a point where aerobic bacteria in the river can finish the job and do so without using up all the dissolved oxygen essential for the survival of the fish. He said that trout need seven mg/litre of dissolved oxygen to spawn, and six mg/litre to sustain their normal habitat. In tests made last year, these levels were met 98% of the time.

In answer to questions from the audience, Mr. Czaplinski: the proposed dam will add the problem because it n sometimes limit (or even stop) the flow of the river during off-peak hours when the electricity isn't needed. There are already two little hydro dams on the river, which, he said after his speech, limited the river's flow to below the ideal minimum roughly ten times last year. The final say on the construction of the new dam rests with the Agency of Environmental Protection.

New dam or not, however, Mr. Czaplinski said that population growth will require towns on the river to have tertiary sewage treatment by the late 1980's, a process that will cost local taxpayers $6,000,000 in the next 20 years, or $25/person/year. The alternative, he said, will be to accept a polluted river. The cost of treatment, he explained, is easy to calculate, but the "cost" of pollution is not.

Mr. Czaplinski, who has degrees in electrical engineering, water resources, and urban planning, has worked for the Agency of Environmental Conservation since 1972.

Career Spectrum Returns to UVM

Once again the Career Spectrum series returns to the UVM campus. Each year the UVM Alumni Association and the Office of Career Planning and Placement co-sponsor a series of panel discussions concerning various areas of employment.

This is the series' third year, and the topics are again widely varied. At the beginning of each school year, a group of students, alumni and people from the Office of Career Planning and Placement get together to decide on the topics for the coming year. The most important consideration is what types of questions the student population asked the Career Planning and Placement Office. The Student-Alumni group then selects the topics from a list of careers of current interest.

The first in this year's series is a look at career options in the fields of Public Relations and Advertising. A very popular spectrum two years ago, it is one that still ranks high in student interest at the Career Planning and Placement Office. This year's spectrum will be held at the Alumni House, 86 South Williams Street, from 4–6 p.m., on Monday, October 2nd. This year's moderator is Sidney Hults, Career Counselor at Career Planning and Placement. The panelists are: Pat Brink, Director, Discovery Museum; Bill Keeshan '57, Vice President, Della Famina, Travisano and Partners, Inc.; Cindy Kent '68, Director, UVM Alumni Fund; Bill Wheeler '60, President, Wheeler, Wood & MacLeod, Inc.

These people represent the areas of Corporate Advertising, Fund-raising for Non-profit organizations, University Public Relations, and Promotion. The panelists are familiar with the problems of public image in the achievement of their goals, and they are all knowledgeable of the qualifications for landing the jobs that they have.

Debate Focuses on Merits of Nuclear Energy

By John Letteri

The uncertainty of the future of the United States' energy needs and from what sources these needs will be fulfilled were the focal points of a debate on the merits of nuclear power held at Shelburne Middle School Tuesday.

Sponsored by the Shelburne Jaycees, the meeting featured Montpelier attorney Scott Skinner arguing the anti-nuclear idea and Arthur Doty of the Vermont Electric Association representing the proponents of nuclear powered generating plants.

Skinner said the unanswered questions about safety, the unsolved problem of proper waste storage, and the frequent cost overruns associated with nuclear plants as the biggest drawbacks to the feasibility of implementing nuclear power on a wide scale.

Doty, and Tom Keenean, a representative of Vermont Yankee, argued the only answer to the tremendous upsurge in demand for electricity in New England and throughout the country was nuclear power, as far as cost and availability are concerned. They said that through the use of nuclear power, the United States would limit its dependence on foreign countries for energy because uranium was readily available in the United States.

Further, Doty and Keeman said although the uncertainties connected with nuclear power needed more work, the state of technological advance within the next twenty years is uncertain as well. Perhaps by that time, the U.S. will possess the know-how necessary to make nuclear power a much more viable energy alternative than it is today.

Skinner said the hidden costs of nuclear power also hindered its widescale development. For example, some utilities are charging their ratepayers now to help defray the cost of a nuclear power plant that hasn't even been built yet.

He said the one billion dollars a year the U.S. spends on nuclear research ultimately comes out of "our pockets" and when the massive borrowing goes on to finance the building of a nuclear plant, interest rates and capital flow is tightened up for everyone else.

Doty rebutted by saying, "Granted, these things go on," but challenged Skinner to name a viable replacement to the nuclear power that would be missing to supply an ever-increasing demand for electricity.

But Skinner brought up the enormous cost of decommissioning a nuclear power plant. He said the decommissioning of Vermont Yankee would run upwards of $100 million. In addition, the safety involved with decommissioning is also a problem.

Doty and Keenan said the $100 million figure was wrong, and that in 1978 dollars the cost would be $27 million and the $100 million figure was projected for 2007 when Vermont Yankee's license expires.

New Student Judiciary Accepting Members

By John Letteri

Students accused of vandalism or other wrongdoings in residence halls will now have the option of having their case heard before a judiciary committee entirely staffed by students.

Initiated by Charlie Clark, former president of the Inter Residence Association and current president of the SA, the judiciary committee will have the same power as that of an area campus coordinator. They will be able to verbally reprimand a student or expel him/her from the residence system. But they will not be able to expel the student from the university because of the legal ramifications of such an action.

Prior to the judiciary committee's inception, students formally accused of wrongdoing by a hall advisor, RA, or another student, could only go before an area co-ordinator, whose decision was usually adhered to by the director of Residential Life. The student has the option of appealing to the president of the university, the dean of students, or the Board of Trustees.

Current IRA President John Allen said applications for students who wish to sit on the committee are now being accepted. Allen said nine students will be chosen, and the deadline for submitting applications is October 13.

Allen said he is looking for students who are objective, able to maintain confidentiality and holders of a cum of 2.4 or above. He said applications are open to all students living in dorms, including freshmen.

The IRA Judicial Committee will review the written applications and hold interviews with qualified students before making their selections. Allen said training sessions will be held for those selected and will probably be under the direction of Stephen Peterson, director of Residential Life.

Clark said in an interview last year that the committee will have equal representation on the basis of sex, and according to each campus in IRA.

The hope is the council's presence will spur incident reports and curtail vandalism and other violations. Last year, $81,000 of unassigned dormitory damage were incurred costing students $21.00 apiece to defray the cost.

A report may be filed with the committee for any violation of university or residence hall regulations by students, hall advisors, RA's or security. The Judicial Council will inform any person who makes a report of the outcome of the hearing with due consideration for the rights and the privacy of the students accused.

Petersen said his past experiences with judiciary councils indicate students will increase the number of incidence reports simply because "the students felt that the incident would be dealt with by a student judiciary."

> "last year $81,000 of unassigned damages were incurred costing the students $21 to defray it"

John Paul I

Paul I's death "came as a shock to the entire Catholic world, here in Vermone as elsewhere." Bishop Marshall said even though Pope John Paul I is gone, his "simplicity of life, even in a month's time, did much to lift the minds and hearts of many Catholics."

Bishop Marshall said he was "deeply saddened" and the world should pray for the repose of Pope John Paul I's soul, and the Catholic Church during the time a new Pope is selected.

Father Thomas Sullivan, Communications Director for the Roman Catholic Dioceses of Burlington, does not expect the Church will experience any real difficulties after the death of Pope John Paul I. He pointed out that one pope in 753 A.D. reigned from March 16-19. He said the Catholic Church is a strong church and can survive such blows.

Trustees Meet October 5-7

By Rob Smith

S.A. Senate Elections

A record high of 84 students passed in nomination papers last week to run for S.A. Senatorial Elections to be held October 3-5. With only 37 students to be elected to the Senate, the competition to get votes appears to be more intense than ever this year. S.A. President Charlie Clark commented on the record number of candidates, "I hope that the interest demonstrated by the candidates carries over to the rest of the student body. We're looking for a record voter turnout this year and the fact that so many candidates are running can only help to spread the word concerning elections." Both Clark and V.P. Missy Burke are confident that the enthusiasm expressed by this year's candidates will result in a productive and hard working Senate.

Board of Trustees – Oct. 5-7

The following is the agenda for this week's Board of Trustees meeting:

Thursday, October 5 – 4:00–5:15, Buildings and Grounds Committee in Memorial Lounge.

The fiscal years 1980 and 1981 capital appropriation request from the Vermont State Legislature will be discussed. The request of $4,052,000 includes an allocation of $1,273,000 to renovate the Fleming Museum and $700,000 to be used for energy conservation measures throughout the campus.

Thursday, October 5 7:30, Audit Committee in Memorial Lounge.

Topics to be discussed include the appointment of an audit firm for student aid compliance audits and the Internal Auditor's work plan.

Friday, October 6 – 7:30–8:45 a.m., ETV Committee in President's Dining Room.

A main agenda item is the discussion of a $1,551,100 budget request for fiscal years 1980 and 1981 from the Vermont State Legislature.

9:00–12 noon, Finance and Budget Committee in Faculty Dining Room, Waterman. The 1980–81 fiscal year legislative appropriation will be the main topic at this meeting. Also, increases in both in-state and out-of-state tuition will be brought up at this time.

1:00–2:00 p.m., Investment Committee in Faculty Dining Room. Topics to be discussed include confirmation of purchases and sales and the report on temporary investments.

2:00–3:00 p.m., Educational Policy Committee in Memorial Lounge. Faculty appointments, approval of degrees and a review of self-study and an accreditation visit will be discussed at this meeting.

3:00–4:00, Alumni, Development and External Affairs Committee in Memorial Lounge.

4:00–5:00, Health Education Committee in Memorial Lounge. Discussion from the August 18th meeting concerning containment of health care costs will be continued.

show a benefit film for Kristina Berster. The movie The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum drew approximately 100 people and netted $200 which was turned over to the Kristina Berster Defense Committee.

Besides Kunstler, Berster is defended by Burlington lawyer William Kittel, who teaches Business Law at the university, Burlington attorney Christopher Davis, Albany lawyer Dennis Schlenter and New York City attorney William Waterman.

Berster's trial for passport violations is only the first of her legal problems and probably of less consequence than her legal battle to fight extradition back to West Germany.

Kristina Berster is presently seeking asylum in the United States, claiming she is a refugee from an oppressive West German government. To be granted asylum, Berster must prove her life will be in danger should she be returned to West German authorities.

Can Kristina Berster get a fair trial in Burlington, Vermont for her alleged passport violations after being stigmatized with 'terrorist,' and subsequently attracting a formidable roster of interested parties? This is the question Judge Albert Coffrin must wrestle with as he tries to select a jury whom he believes have maintained open and impartial minds despite the violatile circumstances which have continually surrounded Kristina Berster since her arrest.

Sadat Praises, Invites Carter to Treaty Signing

In a major address to parliament, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat cited President Jimmy Carter as a man "who changed the face of the world."

Sadat also said Carter had agreed to the Egyptian President's request for him to come to Cairo and put his signature on an Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.

The White House has also made a reciprocal invitation for the Egyptians and Israelis to send delegations to Washington next week to begin negotiations to reach just such a treaty.

Sadat said of Carter, "History will place him in the forefront of leaders who changed the face of the world to bring love instead of hatred and peace instead of war."

Pope John Paul Given a Simple Funeral

Pope John Paul I was laid to rest Wednesday, six days after suffering a fatal heart attack only 34 days into his papacy.

The celebrated Mass was presided over by 85-year-old Italian Cardinal Carlo Confalonieri, the dean of the College of Cardinals, who also led the funeral service for Pope Paul.

As of Tuesday, tens of thousands of mourners stood in line in pouring rain for a chance to view the pope's body, lying in state on a catafalque before the main alter in the basilica of St. Peters Cathedral.

Marathon Swimmer Fails on Second Attempt

For the second time in less than two months, marathon swimmer Stella Taylor failed in her bid to be the first person to swim from the Bahamas to Florida. She immediately announced she would try again, only this time reversing her path and swimming from Florida to the Bahamas.

With her body badly sunburned and swollen from salt water and jellyfish stings, Miss Taylor was lifted from the water exactly 51 hours after entering it at Orange Cav, a small island in the Bimini chain of the Bahamas.

"I hate to lose," Miss Taylor said at a hurried dockside meeting with reporters. "I worked hard. If you can do five miles an hour, it's possible."

Towards the end of the attempt, Miss Taylor's crew was still hoping that a change in the tide would help push her toward shore. The opposite proved to be the case as the tide began taking her back out to sea.

More On PSA Crash

Tapes of the conversation between the pilot of the Pacific Southwest Airlines Boeing 727 and air traffic controllers shortly before the crash which killed 144 persons, were released on Monday.

In a professional tone, void of any sign of urgency, the pilot said, "Tower, we're going down, this is PSA."

The crash, which was this country's worst air disaster, occurred after the jet was struck in the wing by a small private plane being flown by a student and his instructor.

There were no survivors of the 135 persons aboard. The two men in the Cessna and 7 persons on the ground were also killed.

An investigation is underway but a report is not expected for several months.

Red Clothespins to Keep Coming

President Carter has rejected a recommendation from the International Trade Commission that import quotas be imposed for five years on wooden clothespins produced in the Peoples' Republic of China.

In a statement released by the office of special trade representative Robert Strauss, Carter said, "such sanctions would not be in the national economic interest." Carter further suggested that all countries be investigated, not just Communist China.

The ITC recommendation was the result of complaints filed by the four leading U.S. clothespin manufacturers. The leading manufacturers, three from Maine and one from Vermont, complained of laggard sales due to the influx of lower priced Communist imports.

Civil War Flares Again in Lebanon

The heaviest fighting since the end of the civil war in 1975 has rocked Lebanon for the past week. President Elias Sarkis openly voiced fears that the state was on the verge of collapse.

Christian positions in East Beirut were pounded by Syrian tanks and heavy artillery. The Christian militia responded with attacks on Syrian positions in the city and the mountains. The shelling also hit mostly Moslem West Beirut in another flare-up of tensions which Christian leaders have maintained will not end until the largely Syrian Arab peace-keeping force leaves the country.

Although there are no reliable figures most estimates indicate at least 300 persons have died or been wounded in this latest round of fighting.

Progress in Newspaper Strike

A striking pressmen's union and the city's two major morning newspapers suspended talks Monday to await action on a tentative contract agreement with the afternoon New York Post. The 1550 member Printing Pressmen's Union No. 2 had resumed negotiations at noon with the New York Times and the Daily News, with the two morning papers under pressure to reach a settlement so that the Post would not get too much of a newsstand jump.

Botha Awakens Hope in West

In , his first conciliatory gesture to the West, South Africa's new Prime Minister Pieter Botha said on Tuesday that the door was open for further negotiations to break the impasse over the future of South West Africa. Botha presided at his first cabinet meeting since election as premier last week and said in a statement that an early South African organized election did not rule out the implementation of the United Nations proposals for transition to independence.

Billy Graham Reported by Outraged Mother

A Swedish mother of four children has reported American evangelist Billy Graham to a children's association in Stockholm. The woman, who was not identified, told the mass circulation newspaper Aftonbladet that young children, some only seven or eight years old, collapsed in tears over threats of being doomed to death as a result of exhortations. Graham, who starts a tour of Poland on Friday, was pelted with tomatoes in Sweden last week.

Callaghan's Leadership Threatened

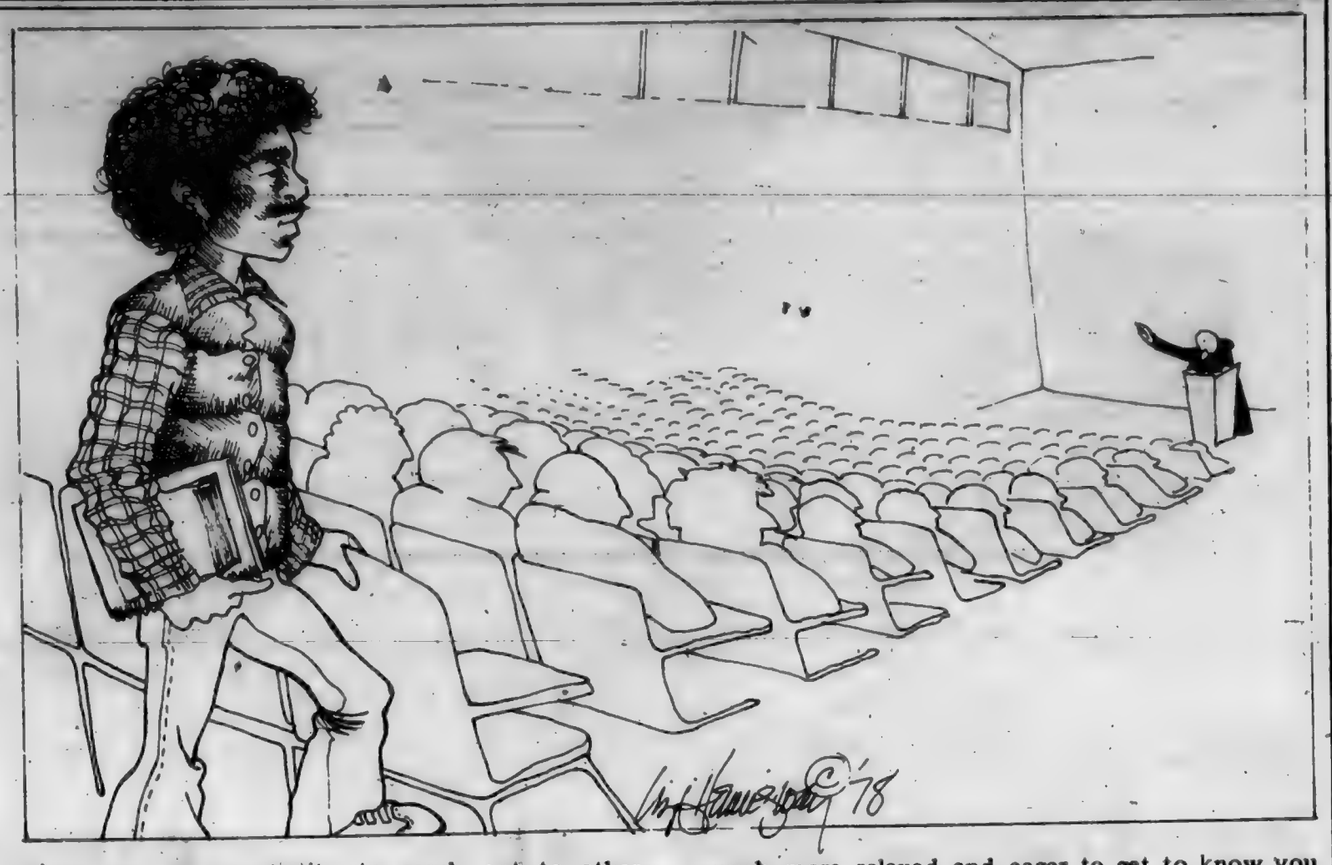
British Prime Minister James Callaghan suffered a major setback earlier this week when the Labor Party rejected his anti-inflation wage-restraint policy.



The revolt against Callaghan was spearheaded by angry trade unions, upset by three years of wage restraint.

This challenge was seen by many officials as the biggest threat to Callaghan's leadership since he became prime minister in 1976.

Callaghan's plan set a limit on wage increases to 5 percent during the next 10 months.

On Sunday Callaghan had issued a statement saying, "I am not going to be in the business of presiding over the affairs of the country if we are committed to a policy which would increase inflation again, back perhaps as far as 25 percent."

Walking Into the Unknown

By Leon W. Heyward

Being a freshman at UVM is difficult because in many cases it is a student's first shot at freedom. For many it is the first time they are truly independent of their parents and forced to make decisions completely alone. Having to make new friends all over again after saying good-bye to old ones isn't what one would call a bundle of joy. So in a sense it's like coming in as a relief quarterback with third and long yardage to make that first down. But suppose you are black, Spanish, Chinese, or any other member of society that is distinguished as a minority group. What other elements would you be facing that would make your life here at UVM tougher, that would make long yardage seem even longer.

First of all how would you feel if you walked into your first lecture class of 300 students and were the only black (Spanish or Chinese) student there? Believe me, it's quite a harrowing experience. When I set this question to some minority students here on campus I received such responses as "Weird," "Pressured," "as though I was in a spotlight," "stunned" and "excited." Personally, I have experienced every one of these feelings, simply because I was completely unprepared to be in that type of situation. When the class is smaller (20-30 students), and I'm the only minority student attending I'm more comfortable because most of my high school classes were similar to this. A small class gives me an opportunity to reach out to other students (those that will allow me to) and get to know them on a more intimate level.

The problem is complicated when you come from a big city where blacks (and other minority groups) aren't used to communicating extensively with whites. In a society where skin color is a distinguishing factor, having a darker skin pigment automatically opens you up to many stereotypes to which you are continually exposed by people ignorant of the truth. The same thing occurs at UVM. You come in contact with people that maybe have never taken the time to think of what they are saying or how they are saying it. Admittedly, however, communication here at the university between minority students and white students is vastly more productive when compared to the city I grew up in.

To begin with, the environment is different. This is a learning institution void of most of the hustle and bustle common in large urban areas. Students are much more relaxed and eager to get to know you because you are here for the very same reason they are. No one is separated from others on the basis of income; we are all held captive. This is the major difference, the key to communication. Because we are forced (in a sense) to live together, we share our everyday routines with each other. We are able to recognize that there is no real difference between us. Once that barrier is reached, we are able to work side by side in a process of enrichment.

UVM is not only an institution for learning, one that will prepare you to go out into the world and use what you have learned to make a living, but also one where you can learn more about the people and human relationships. UVM gives you the chance to understand the people that you will be working with so past experiences will make the task much easier. So, maybe it is third down, long yardage and you are relief quaterback. But if the team works together, you will get the first down!

Minorities Are a Rare Sight at UVM

By Jesse Andre Gadson

Today in America, Blacks, Hispanics and other minorities are common sights on college campuses across the country. But this fact is hardly evident at UVM. The university has about 130 minority students out of a total enrollment of 7400. Fifty-four new minority students arrived on campus this semester, more than any other year; still, in real terms, the numbers are low.

Unquestionably, the admission office is taking an active and aggressive role in seeking minority enrollment for UVM. A lot of people don't realize the difficulty a place like UVM has in recruiting minorities. According to Kathie Weibust, assistant director of admissions, "probably the largest reason is that less than 1% of the people in this state are minorities, so we don't have a minority population in the state to draw from. The universities in New York and New Jersey have a lot of minorities in the states, so they are going to be able to attract more students."

The university has committed itself in the last two or three years to compensate for the lack of minority population in the state. Wiebust explained, "We are involved in a College Board search. We give College Board (the people who administer the S.A.T.'s) our criteria. This criteria includes what type of student we want to see, the range the S.A.T.'s should be in, and what type of grades they should have in high school. All these factors are plugged into a computer and College Board then generates a list of names and addresses that fit into this criteria. This year that list generated the names of 2493 minority students. We'll be writing letters to each of those students telling them about the university and then sending them an application." The university is definitely going all out, but the admissions office still maintains its integrity. They do not use quotas, nor do they lower their standard of admissions just to increase their minority enrollment. As Ms. Weibust articulated, "That wouldn't be fair to minority students. We do not want to bring students here who are going to flunk out. If we don't think any student, whether it be a minority student, a Vermonter, or out-of-state can survive here academically, we're not going to bring them in."

One must realize that while the university goes all out in this process with the College Board, they receive few applications in return. Last year less than 5% of the applications were returned from this process. While every year the minority admissions percentage is expanding and trying new ideas, they have to reach so many just to get so few.

"An important question must be asked now; can this campus meet the needs of the average minority student?"

Why is it that after the admissions office does all this, they still have so few minorities? Some people might say they are really not trying hard enough. This writer disagrees. The admissions office commitment is there. An important question must be asked now; can this campus meet the needs of the average minority student? After all, most black and Hispanic students at UVM are from urban areas. Ms. Weibust feels that UVM life can be conducive to most minorities. "It depends on the type of student, this is true of minorities and non-minorities. We have a fantastic environment. We have the blend of very rural and the urban. Burlington is a sophisticated city, it's got a lot of culture and a lot of things going on. But then again it's not New York City. But there are no doubts about Burlington for the minority students that are independent enough and feel comfortable in an environment that isn't predominantly minority. For the minority student who wants to get out of huge fast cities and go to something a little slower paced, I think Burlington can meet the needs. But it's not going to meet the needs of everybody."

There is one question that still looms large. If the university is actually seeking minority students, which it is, and they feel that campus life is conducive to the average minority student, what is the problem? In order to answer this question, it is necessary to look elsewhere than the admissions office. You have to look at the faculty and the curriculum. This school has no black studies and no Latin American programs. They have very few black faculty. How can UVM realistically ever hope to have any sizeable amount of minority students without minority programs?

Ms. Weibust believes that the administration faces some of the same problems as admissions does when they recruit minority faculty and staff. The lack of minorities in the state and the environment itself is not always what a minority person is seeking. But the reality of the situation is that unless the admissions office and the administration get together to overcome this major hurdle, the university will never be one with any sizeable minority population.

Now that you have an engineering degree, we would like to offer you an engineering career. Our business is exclusively professional engineering with specialization in projects for the electric power industry. The opportunities in this field for the graduate who truly wants an engineering career are significant.

The power industry is the world's most important energy producing medium, and is a primary source for solving serious environmental problems. The magnitude of contemporary power generation and transmission depends on engineering excellence and advanced design techniques to fulfill its requirements. For the imaginative and energetic engineer ours is a viable atmosphere in which to work.

We have a continuous need for graduates with bachelor and advanced degrees in each of the mechanical, electrical, structural and nuclear disciplines.

If an engineering career is your plan, we would like to talk with you. Please make an appointment through your placement office to interview with us.

...but whether they are old or young, friendly or hostile, interested in nature or naturally apathetic, all tourists have one thing in common--the risk of having a lousy time.

By Randy McMullen

This year's Fall Festival of Colors – the weekend in which the Fall foliage and its subsequent tourist attraction peak simultaneously – began for me with a young woman from Massachusetts pulling out of the Campus Kitchen and hitting the right side of my car. She was one of the thousands that visit Vermont annually to see the Green Mountains deviate from the placid state their name suggests into a fiery spectacle of bleeding reds and yellows.

Ironically enough, her newly painted Trans Am suffered not a scratch, while my '71 Pontiac stood recuperating from a sizeable wound above its right rear tire.

This girl was very nervous when we met, almost to the point of crying. "I'm sorry," she gasped, "there are so many damned cars, and the leaves are so pretty..."

"You ought to try looking at the leaves after you stop the car," I offered. "It's much safer."

"I know! I know!" she wailed, "but it's so hard. I don't like being a tourist. It's too hard to relax."

The miraculous thing about this woman – other than the fact that she had picked me out of thousands of motorists to ram into – was that she epitomized the psychological phenomenon that underscores tourism. A tourist can't feel at home because he isn't home, and the environmental clashes that stem from this lend themselves to all sorts of phobias and foul tempers.

A tourist, by the very nature of his actions, is taking a risk. He is leaving the safe confines of his home to take on a new experience. He is exploring, trying to get away from it all. And of course the basic denominator of all this is enjoyment. The tourist wants most of all to have a nice weekend.

AND IF HE DOESN'T?

And if he doesn't? Then there are serious implications involved. Materialistically, he has wasted money, gas, and time: the dependable round of golf he might have played, the ballgames missed, the lawn neglected. On a more personal level, a frustrated tourist may be rubbing off fragments of his own sanity. He might say to himself: "What's wrong with me? A weekend away from Baltimore in the "lovely mountains of Vermont" and I am thoroughly bored. Maybe my lifestyle has screwed me up. Maybe I ought to go out to San Francisco, write poetry, and collect welfare for a while."

Relationships are also tested when tourism is the unifying factor. A family that travels together better have a good time together, or there won't be a hell of a lot to talk about when the home movies are shown on the Christmas of '83.

BETTER GIVE THAN TAKE

In short, Vermont's tourist trade is a lot more consistent on the receiving end than on the giving end. Vermont does well with its tourists. So well, in fact, that it was stated recently in the Burlington Free Press that traveler expenditures in this state from 1972-77 could have supplied every Vermonter with $530.

But does all that money represent relaxation and merriment on the tourists part? How much of that money was spent on aspirin after a long day with junior throwing up in the back seat? How much of it was spent on car repairs or speeding tickets? ("No, dear, there isn't any speed limit in Vermont. All you have to do is keep an eye out for stray cows.") And how much of that money represents a night in the Misery Hotel because every place else is booked up for the weekend?

STALKING THE WILD TOURIST

With these sort of questions in mind, I ventured this past weekend to stalk the tourist in all his candid splendor. At first I was interested in discovering the aspirations and pet-peeves of the perfectly stereotypical tourist couple: the bulging man with a khaki shirt, a cheap Kodak camera, and a map smudged with mayonnaise and mustard, and his wife, a frail woman with high-heeled shoes and red bell bottoms, waiting cautiously for all hell to break loose.

But to my surprise, this type of tourist scenario was all but extinct. It was as if this rather negative ideal had become widely pervasive, and was consciously avoided. Perhaps everyone reads Vermont Life before coming here, to find out what to wear.

The most common types of tourist I found could be grouped into two categories: elderly people, most of whom were traveling along the east coast, and Canadian citizens, most of whom were seeking inebriation of some kind.

The elderly, to me, were the most beautiful. They seemed to have no hurries or hangups; they just wanted to settle gracefully into their declining years and watch the rest of the world decline with them.

One couple I met was from Memphis, Tennessee. They had been travelling for nearly five months and seemed perfectly posed for it, two pairs of hazel eyes and smiling faces glued onto their respective bodies, arm in arm.

"We've been treated very well everywhere," said the elderly gentleman, "and we're very glad that we decided to travel." His wife nodded, tightening a broad smile even broader. I instinctively wondered how many college journalists had heard the same thing from these two people.

Another senior citizen, a retired salesman from Connecticut, rambled on to me about his old duck hunting days of wading through bogs and marches and often returning home with nothing, except maybe a cold. But he had given it up, he said, "because my old bones just won't take it any longer." Score one for the ducks.

The Canadian tourists were almost a perfect dichotomy to the elderly. They seemed very hard-pressed to make the most of their free time and, by and large, they succeeded. Most were equipped with a truck load of smiles, and about twice as much Bradeurs beer. With so much nervous energy being spent on pure, physical fun, most of these people didn't have time to be tourists.

THE GOOD, THE BAD, AND THE ABSENT-MINDED

One family from Ohio had lost their only set of car keys, and were frantically overturning rocks and up-rooting plants as if nature had swallowed them whole. I was convinced for a short while to help, but all of us could sense that it was a lost cause.

"I can't remember losing something like this before..." said the husband. "Well, maybe I did... yes. I remember leaving my wedding ring in Yellowstone, though I haven't the foggiest how." From the looks of his wife and children, I figured he would lose them too if he continued his pathetic babbling.

Another case in point was a much more melancholy one. This fellow was hiking alone, trying to forget a recent break-up with his fiance (apparently, she had done most of the breaking up). "My heart's not in this," he said, "it's beautiful, but all I can see is her, you know. I didn't think you had to be so emotionally up to be a good tourist."

He didn't mind me quoting him, but he did request that I send a copy of the article to his estranged lover.

Some people were generally unfond of their roles as tourists. They seemed edgy and tense, and less than overjoyed at my appearance. These were the ones I wanted to push a little. I challenged them with questions like "How does it feel to be one of Vermont's leading industries?" and "How is it being almost as financially significant to this state as IBM?"

Not surprisingly, many were irritated by these questions, and retorted with comments like "get out of here! It's hard enough to get away from the crowds without you scavengers around looking for a scoop!" For all I know, the man who bellowed that to me may work for IBM.

One woman was quite serious, and suggested that Vermont "cut down on tourism and invest heavily in agri-business."

The author as antagonist: You drove how far to see the leaves?

SUNNY RAINY SUNDAY

Because of the rain, Sunday was a perfect day to bring out the pits in tourism. It was also the day that my photographer was available, originally aspiring to snap shots of people basking in the golden yellow of the sun and leaves (and it's not easy with black and white film).

The rain seemed to induce a heightened awareness that all tourists take a risk. Each splattered puddle asked the perennial question: "What do you do when you travel 3,000 miles to get rained on?" Some went home, some emmigrated to the "quaint" little shops scattered through Vermont selling antiques or novelties, and a good many around here went to the Shelburne Museum. I must admit, however, that a good many would have been there on Sunday despite the weather. License plates from across the country can be seen there, and busloads of youth groups are not uncommon.

Some, however, were there to wash away their frustrations, and like all of the unhappy tourists I met this weekend, they were not anxious to face me or their problems.

"Where did you come from?" I asked one couple.

"Wisconsin."

"How far of a drive is that?"

"About 12 hours."

"Are you having a nice weekend?"

"Oh, Go Away."

I was more than happy to leave, and I assumed they would eventually as well, but it doesn't erase the fact that tourism is a risky field of entertainment. You might get rained on, you might get lost or stranded, you might even get your traveler's checks ripped off. But, on the other hand, I suppose that it is better than a weekend in Baltimore. (I went there once... It was closed.)

Mop And Flow

The Hamilton Co-op is rowdy, clean, and offers a nice rebate. So far, residents say, there are no problems

By Joshua Reynolds

What do kegs, students and Comet cleanser have in common? What is every cleaning lady's delight? Where do Mr. Clean, the Mop & Glow Lady and a lot of fun-loving UVM students get together?

If you answered Hamilton to all of the above you can go to the head of the class. Last year, when the idea of a cooperative dorm was discussed, people scoffed. But it's hard to be skeptical now. Hamilton is more successful than almost anyone imagined. By working together to maintain the dorm people in Hamilton have developed a strong feeling of cooperation. "The common bond of being in a cooperative" commented Hall president Charlie Bunting "has turned out to be very rewarding and fun." Freshman Amy Calter added; "You get to meet people when you work, there's great community spirit."

Hall Advisor Tom Niemi explained the philosophy of a coop. "Working here can be a chore or a way of getting together with a bunch of people." Everyone in Hamilton has taken the second outlook. Coop member Buzz Aken summed up the students' feelings effectively, "People often get the wrong impression when they hear I'm from the coop. They think that since we work, we can't have fun. We do work, but we still have a good time. We still play hall sports and get rowdy, it just doesn't lead to vandalism. We realize that we're responsible for our dorm." Last week, when the hall floors needed waxing, the dorm bought a keg and had a waxing party. When the party ended, instead of having to deal with spilt beer, the dorm had freshly waxed floors and smiles on their faces.

The amount of work is small; no more than 30-45 minutes per week, but everybody gets together and has a good time. Sophomores John Most and Doug Heath emphasized, "you don't notice the work, everybody does a little every day so it doesn't build up, in fact you don't feel like a part of the dorm when you don't work." The cooperation is so successful that cleaning up and having a good time have become synonymous. "People are more eager to help than expected," continued Niemi. "When we had a waterfight on Redstone, one of the students had organized a cleanup by the time the fight finished. People tend to live up to expectations," he concluded, "the higher the expectations the higher the quality of work." Undoubtedly, Hamilton, a coop designed with cooperation and responsibility as its main goals, has lived up to expectations.

In a modified coop, students are responsible for maintenance of the building. This involves keeping public areas clean and removing trash, etc. The money saved by not having a housekeeper is paid back to the students. The founders of the coop and the RA's devised a rotating schedule so that no one repeats a job until everyone else has done it. Each person averages about 30 minutes of work per week. As resident John Babyak commented, "Jobs don't take much time, but everybody gets together and has fun, so it takes longer." Working to keep the halls in shape provides an opportunity to get together so people hang around even when they aren't working. Every coop member signed a contract before he or she began school stating that they would do what was required or risk being transferred, but no one has challenged that contract yet. Babyak attributed this to a healthy potential peer pressure within the dorm, "If a person doesn't do the work everyone will get on his case, so the job always gets done." The RA's are there to help with organization and potential problems but, as Niemi noted, "No major problems have cropped up."

Much of the credit for the foundation of the coop goes to Peter Corbett, a devoted and idealistic senior who envisioned and helped to bring about its founding last year. He seemed more than eager to discuss his work and hopes. "The idea of a coop started for personal reasons," he began. "I had moved off campus, but I was wondering how to improve the dorms. I wanted to instill an outward focus on people's attitudes, get them to work together." Corbett wrote an editorial for the Cynic outlining his hopes. Steve Petersen, the director of Residential Life, was considering a similar form of coop or alternative dorm housing, so they joined forces. Residential Life's goal has been "to provide as many forms of alternate housing patterns as possible." They were very receptive to Corbett's idea. Next, sufficient interest and the right dorm had to be found. A significant percentage of the school population was polled and found receptive to the idea. Hamilton was chosen because of its manageable size, its good structural condition and the fact that it was previously an unexceptional dorm. "Then," stated Petersen, "we had to find students who honestly wanted to join the coop and weed out those who didn't." Presently, there are waiting lists of people who want to get in.

Corbett would like to see the cooperative continued and applied to new fields. "I'm sure the idea could be expanded. The benefits which Hamilton enjoys could certainly be applied to many facets of campus life. I have in mind a coop-run bookstore or a student managed food service, in addition to other dorms." Were there sufficient interest, these goals could become a reality, although presently Residential Life must assess the effectiveness of Hamilton on a year-long basis. Hall advisor Niemi answered "Right now, everything is running without a flaw, but we're just beginning. Finals and winter are yet to be seen." When asked about possible expansion Petersen explained, "we have only discussed expansion briefly. Our goal now is to see whether students sign up again next year. It is important that we check it out for a full year first." In the spring RL will assess the coop, looking for cleanliness, a continued sense of community and contentedness on behalf of the residents.

The coop was started to develop a sense of community among the members. It has accomplished much more. People from different facets of this university community who might never share common goals are working together. "What pleases me the most," concluded Petersen with zeal, "is the cooperative effort between the administrative office and the students." Now it has been shown that, in Niemi's words, "people's ideas can be channelled." The hopes of students can benefit the whole school if people get involved. Interest is the best way of rating success and student input is the key to achieving it.

The Architect's model: How many others would like to see Church Street without cars?

By Henry Chamberlain

The city of Burlington has the chance to change its face and become a leading, unique shopping attraction in this part of North America. How? Through an ambitious downtown construction project in the works which, if implemented, would alter Church Street into an above and below ground pedestrian mall. The plan is ambitious and its chance of success high. The only obstacle now is final approval on funding from a battery of federal agencies and from the citizens of Burlington.

People wonder how could Burlington support a large increase in the number of commercial enterprises competing for revenue. A completed pedestrian mall, as designed by Alexander & Truex Inc., would increase the square footage of downtown businesses by about one hundred square feet. An answer relates back to the characteristics of Burlington, Chittenden County, and the surrounding area.

Burlington proper is a city of forty thousand year-round residents. This figure excludes all of the college students and other "part-time" residents who number some thirty thousand. If you take the whole county, you are talking about one hundred and ten thousand people. But even this isn't all, as the economic base of Burlington is upwards of two hundred and ten thousand people. This is a considerable number of people to draw to a mall.

Among the unique features of Burlington are the Burlington International Airport which is the third most active airport in New England, and the medical center which is the fourth largest in New England. Besides these, the city, with its magnificent location by Lake Champlain and the mountains, make it a natural attraction.

Actual construction and implementation of the downtown plan will involve many things including an innovative transit loop around the area, and a large steam heat generating plant which the Federal Department of Energy is interested in. The story of how this project has approached reality is interesting.

Initial funding for a study and possible plan for the downtown section of Burlington came from funds out of the city's bicentennial funds. The initial sum was $10,000. From the start, the designers for the Church Street project have been the firm of Alexander & Truex Inc. Once the initial idea of a mall for Church Street had been explored, more financing was needed to further planning.

A grant was then sought and received from the National Endowment for the Arts for $50,000 to specifically study a pedestrian mall. The project was beginning to take on substance. Mr. William Truex of Alexander & Truex Inc. had presented a plan for a pedestrian mall on Church Street which received support from th ard of Aldermen.

Still, more money was needed to fully develop a program which would bring the project somewhere close to construction readiness. In late 1975, the project entered a national competition for funding of further work by the National Urban Transportation group. The city's project called for an "experiment for pedestrianization of downtown." Burlington competed against sixty other cities for the available funds.

From the competition came mixed results. Indeed, the proposed plan was selected along with four others to receive funding of $1,000,000. However, the other four projects were at least a year away from being able to utilize the funds. Who wanted to wait?

Instead of delaying for a year, the project turned to the Urban Mass Transportation Agency for aid. It received $200,000 to help complete the design phase of the project. These funds were easier to acquire as Burlington already had an excellent transportation reputation. In 1975, Burlington Transit won the Department of Transportation's award for best service in a small metropolitan area.

Of interest to the Urban Mass Transportation Agency was that the plans of the mall called for a transit loop to be created to ervice shoppers. The loop would go west towards Lake Champlain down College Street to Battery Street and then east up Cherry Street. The loop will give shoppers more mobility while removing the need for automobiles. By utilizing one of the parking garages, the shopper will be able to either walk through the mall or take a ride around the whole development area.

Further plans call for two apartment towers to be constructed just north of the Radisson Hotel. A twenty-five hundred seat civic center with parking garage has also been proposed. Additionally, another large department store is being considered for the same area between Church and Battery Streets.

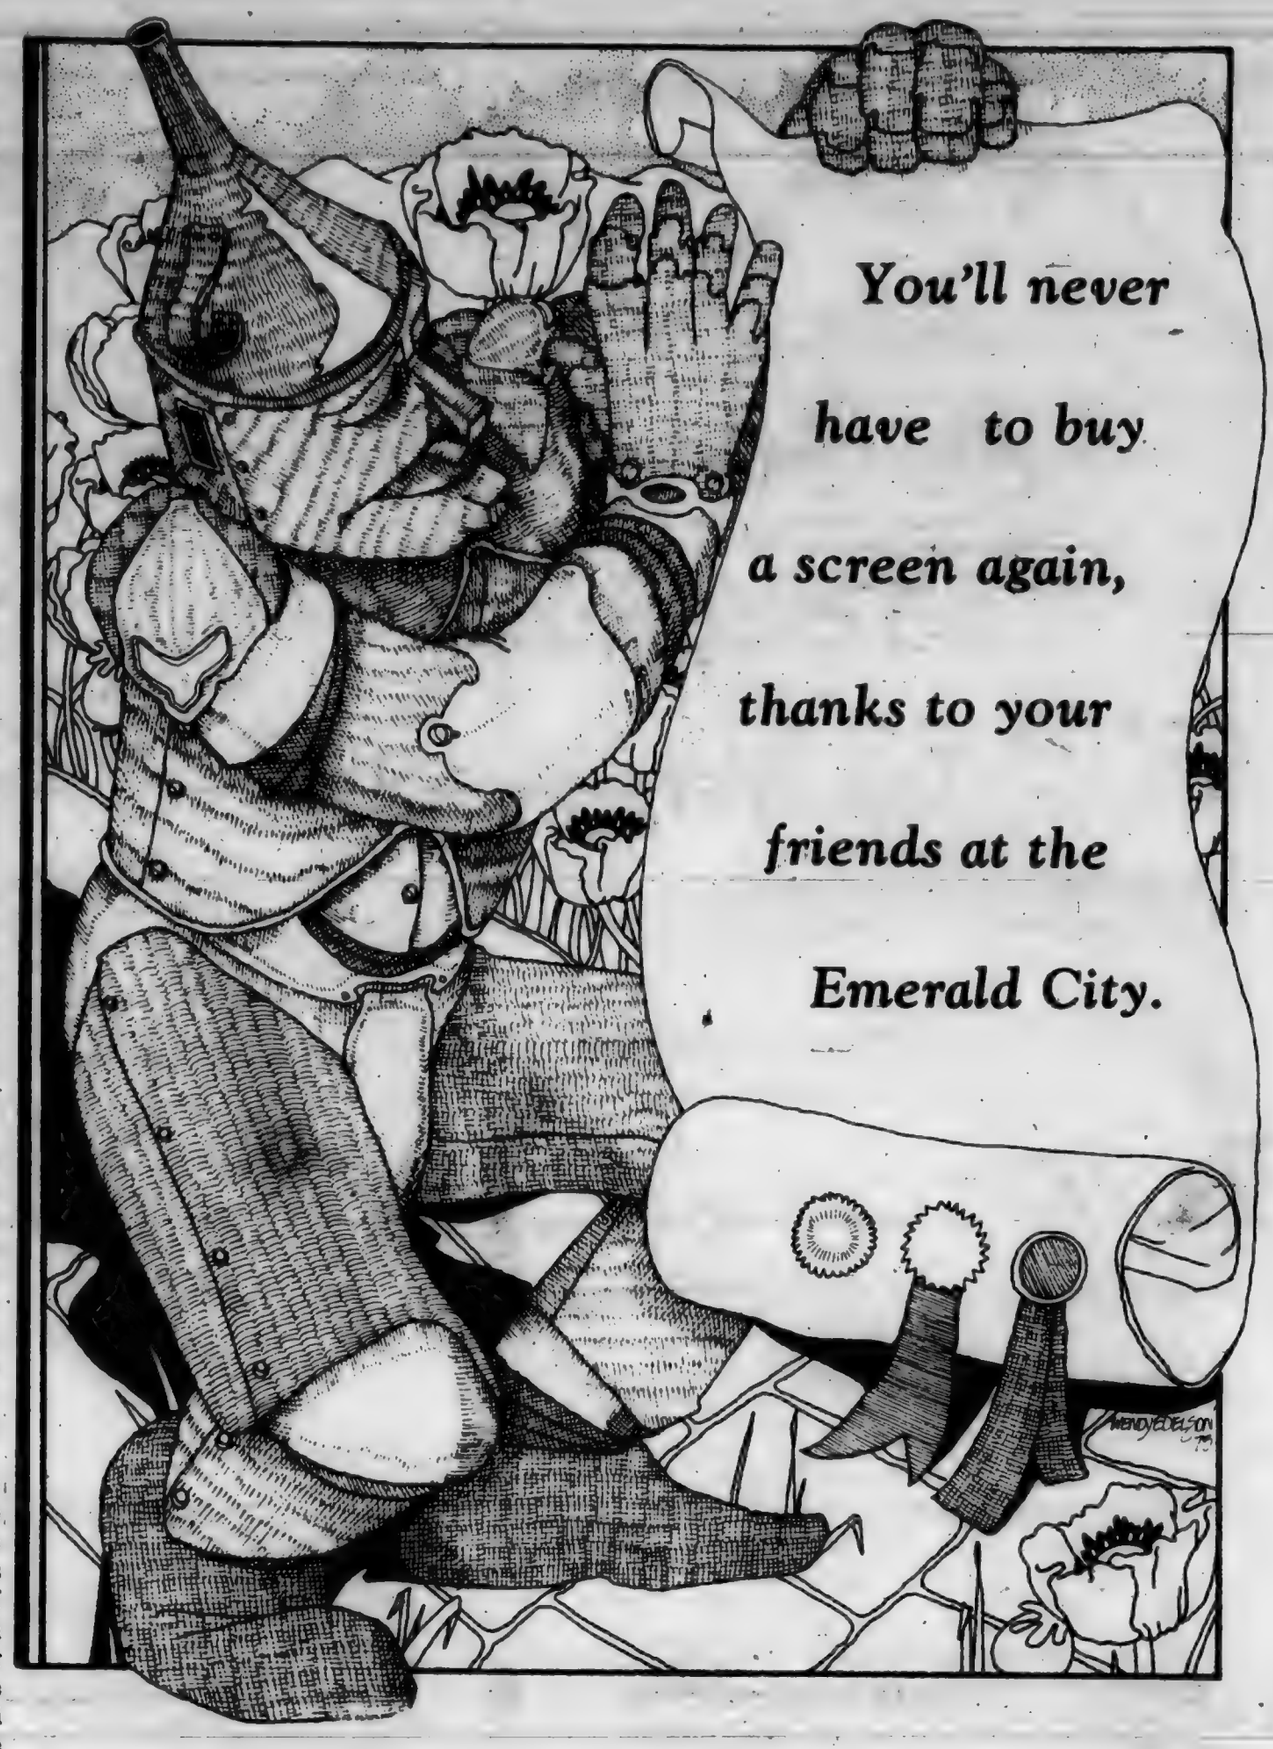
Other contributors to the project include five of the major banks in town: the Chittenden, Howard, Merchant, Burlington Savings, and Vermont Federal Savings and Loan. All five banks put money in to help explain the goals and purposes of the mall. Also, the Eva Gebhardt Foundation of Woodstock, Vermont, gave money to explore possibilities for the enhancement of Church Street while preserving the historic sites.

Whether the City should go with a full pedestrian mall or not was explored in depth. Several scales of downtown development are in practice in scattered cities. In Ottawa there is a pedestrian mall for shoppers' pleasures on Spark Street. Portland, Maine opted for a semi-mall, which is also present in Raleigh, North Carolina, where sidewalks are enlarged and some trees are planted for the shopper's benefit. Another alternative is the transit mall which is a reality in Portland, Oregon. There, shoppers are taken around a commercial area by buses to do their shopping.

This could all go down under... Photos by Bob Gale

For the Church Street project, Alexander & Truex Inc. have come up with a most innovative plan. The project, as it is currently proposed, calls for an underground mall to compliment an above ground mall. To put in such a project is creative enough, but the final product is even more impressive.

What is most fascinating about the project is the inter-relationship between the levels which has been strived for and obtained. The mall above with the concourse below combine to make a whole; they are not separate entities. At each block are spacious openings between the two allowing for stairs, escalators, or even elevators. Also, there will also be ramps for service vehicles. All of this will open the underground mall to public view while allowing easy access for the handicapped. Another feature of the underground concourse will be the glass areas which enclose it, allowing for heating and cooling of the area. The effect of this inter-use of space will be dazzling.



An aspect of the whole project which cannot be overlooked is the actual construction. It is to be carried off in such a way as not to interfere with the normal flow of traffic or commerce. That is a tall order indeed, when you are going to completely tear up a road which is the extremely busy heart of the city.

This is not only going to be accomplished, but will also attract interested shoppers to see it being done. The scheme is as follows. First, a section of sidewalk will be torn up on both sides of the street. Whatever electrical lines that will be needed will be put in with a wider sidewalk laid over it. While the sidewalk is out, bridges will be constructed to the shops affected, a fairly unique process.

Traffic will then be routed onto the sidewalks to allow the excavation of the center of the street down to the concourse level. Here, whatever pipes, including sewage, will be laid before the underground concourse is built. The area will be dug out, also encompassing the hollowing out of the area under the sidewalks.

Part of the beauty of the plan is that the basements of the present merchants, which currently act primarily as storage, will be tapped for store space of eighty thousand square feet, to be dealt with by landlords as they deem fit. Thus, already available but untapped space will be put to use by the underground concourse. The space of the center of the concourse itself, twenty thousand square feet, will be

Foam And Leering At FADC

By Joan Hocky

It has been a rough week. A week of remembering about a Tuesday morning exam on a Tuesday morning. A week of munching on honey and peanut butter because that is the only food in the room, being too broke from buying the necessities (beer, clothes, gas, miscellaneous). Josh has come and gone, and 48 people have died of boredom in the process.

Finally, it is Friday. The day that's really marked in on my calendar. Friday surpasses peanut butter crunch ice cream and Woody Allen on my list of favorite things.

Now, the question is (for those of you who have been all work and no play during the week), how to lie back, relax, and blow away what is left of your mind. One way is Lambda Iota's Friday Afternoon Drinking Club (FADC).

Photos by Rick Ames

Going to FADC with a notebook and pen in hand is quite an unusual experience. I think I would have gotten less attention had I come disguised as Napoleon. Still, I did manage to scribble a few notes in my book, despite having my pen run out and being too afraid to ask somebody for a new one. It wasn't until after my third cup of Morning Thunder on Saturday morning that I realized the true limitations of simultaneously drinking and writing.

FADC is well attended by "regulars," many of whom are proud of their amiable consistency. "We are proud to be part of a UVM tradition," said one fan, who was attempting to bring eight cups of beer to his friends outside, having already spilled three of them entirely onto a myriad of SA senate election campaign posters. It was difficult finding any more intelligent form of conversation.

Then I spotted a religion major reading the last rites over a girl who had passed out in the corner. Asking him what the mortality rate was there, I was told that there have as yet been no deaths reported.

Next, I sat back and watched a red-eyed Labrador try furiously to get his paws up on the bar. Bringing in the equal rights issue, I asked someone if all the canines roaming around were drinking and was told that "if a dog can see over the bar he can get served."

I saw friends become walking "before and after" ads. And how about the bartenders – what do they think of watching people slowly degenerate into oblivion as they come back, again and again? As one bartender prophetically put it, "if people want to get drunk, sure... we'll let them get toasted."

"Chizzie's always ripped to the gill..." "Could you switch places with me so I can have a good look at that kid with the blond hair?"... "Let's order a couple of pizzas, I haven't eaten anything in the past two days... honest." Taking a break from interviewing, I sat back to listen to this stimulating conversation. Of course, there are people who dislike F.A.D.C., and big fraternity parties in general. They see all the games being played and bullshit being shoveled. To quote one dissatisfied upperclassman: "I liked FADC as a Freshman and Sophomore, but I've had my fill of it. It's still a good place to go and get drunk, but just occasionally."

But, there are also the faithfuls, who come back and totally enjoy themselves every week. This is probably the most popular "club" on campus. I was told that it was "an excellent way to wind up the week"... "a great place to get a buzz" and "a necessary part of the week."

But, whether one looks forward to the weekly party, or shuns the event, FADC is here to stay. To quote Ralph Waldo Emerson, a former member of Lamda Iota, "What is matter? Where is it? And whereto?"

Food Tales

By Barry Gustin

"Once upon a time, in a hollow not so far from here, there dwelt a woman and a man and their lovely children. Each morning as the first rays of light danced across the fields the family would gather and rejoice the new day. The youngsters would milk the cows and feed the animals while the father chopped wood for the fire. Mornings were becoming brisker, the days shorter. From the cabin came the sound of grain being crushed between stone. The dough left overnight was already sour and had been put in the oven. From the yard, the children could smell the tantalizing aroma as it drifted by with the breeze. The mother had an enviable task. With the touch of her hand, she would transform the earth's abundance into wholesome and delicious meals. There was the hot wheat porridge, rich and creamy — the fresh milk and the still warm bread.

Hers was the chore of life. Even in the clatter of midday, she was free from the shackles of monotonous daily routine. To her, the time of business did not differ from the time of prayer, and in the noise of her kitchen she was steady and strong as the mountains."

To most, this is just a fantasy — a glimpse of the days gone by — but to a few this is a kindled dream, a hope. The home in the belly of the woods is gone; the clay ovens are only a vague remembrance, but to some, the deep significance of this way of life remains. Humans in touch with their food supply: the summer garden — the harvest and preservation, the wondrous smell of whole grain bread baking on Sunday morning — these are age-old human activities.

Today, our generation is witnessing a near total demise of these traditional values. The food corporations have begun to dominate and have set the trend for the future. Family farming has been overshadowed and in its place has appeared grandiose agri-business farms whose supreme goal is mass production and high profits. In realizing this end, quality has been sacrificed.

Tomatoes, for example, are now genetically modified so that their shape and constitution have been altered. They are no longer picked vine-ripened but are harvested long before due and are ripened artificially with ethylene gas. The tomatoes appear red and wholesome yet are tasteless and only have a fraction of the nutritional value of vine-ripened tomatoes.

Peaches, a long-time favorite of many, are now defuzzed and coated with a wax containing fungicide so as to increase shelf life and "appearance."

The production of livestock is fraught with injustice and cruelty. Much of what goes on in this industry is behind closed doors. What the eye doesn't see, the consumer doesn't grieve: a styrofoam carton of impeccable eggs and neatly trimmed meat in plastic wrappers does not tell the story. Some of us still have an image of the small family farm with its contented, free-ranging chickens, and cattle grazing peacefully in green pastures. This vision is mere reverie. Most chickens and cattle grown on corporate farms never see the light of day. They live in overcrowded stalls in nearly total darkness and eat only for the two or three hours when lights are switched on. The animal feed is laced with arsenic and other appetite stimulants as well as growth-promoting hormones such as the strongly carcinogenic (cancer causing) diethylstilbesterol (DES).

Antibiotics are used routinely to counter the infections caused by overcrowding and increased stress. Scientists have suggested that this could lead to bacterial resistance to drugs in both humans and animals. Pesticides, herbicides, and nitrate fertilizers contaminate feed and are stored in the animals' fat and internal organs or are concentrated and excreted in milk and are then ingested by humans. Although most of these substances are carcinogenic, their use is often justified on the ground that they help reduce production cost.

Using twentieth century technology that has placed a man on the moon, the food manufacturers have created hundreds of space-age products. The industry claims that these products have been developed in the "best interests of consumers" yet how many consumers would walk into a supermarket and demand "pink cornflakes" in strikingly colored boxes or imitation cheese that only looks like the real thing? The true motive behind this food fabrication is profit and the unsuspecting consumers are forced to pick up the tab.

All of the above changes would be abhorrent only for sentimental and nostalgic reasons if it were not for the resulting deterioration in food quality. Refined is the tune of the times: refined flour, refined sugar, refined potatoes, refined rice, and so on. We have allowed the advertisers to dictate our likes and dislikes by playing up an endless series of "foods" which look good or taste good or even sound good, but which unfortunately have little food value.

Food should be nourishing. This is the basic principle of good nutrition. When foods are processed and refined, most of what is worthwhile is lost. In turn, the producers fortify with a few nutrients, but on top of this, they add a generous ration of fat, salt, or sugar, and a thousand-fold list of chemicals which would find a more fitting home in a chemist's lab than in our food supply are warranted if they themselves are benign but these comprise only a small portion of the total. There are emulsifiers, stabilizers, conditioners, softeners, flavors and colorings — in fact, some products are novel creations and bear little resemblance to any whole food. In his book Panic in the Pantry, Dr. Fred Stare, a Harvard nutritionist, declares that "food additives are good for you... They should be eaten and enjoyed." And yet for some of these chemicals which are not inherent to our environment, there are no natural, inherited degradation or metabolic pathways by which they may be neutralized or detoxified. No one can disregard the possible consequences of this.

If we could only remember that foods should be eaten for their nutritive value, we will have gone a long way towards better health through healthier eating. There is no need to sacrifice flavor. Whole unprocessed food is the earth's finest. What could be more refreshing than a juicy fruit or a sweet carrot, or as satisfying as a slice of freshly baked rye bread? We need to re-educate our tastes and rethink many of our old eating habits if we are to enjoy genuine well-being in body and mind. The days of the "cabin in the woods" are probably gone but the values that went with it need not be. Sound familiar?

Mountaineering #4.

THE OPTIMUM MOMENT.

Mountaineering[1] is a skill of timing as well as technique. The wrong moment, like the wrong method, marks the gap between amateur and aficionado. So the key to successful mountaineering is to choose the occasions wisely and well. When, then, is it appropriate to slowly quaff the smooth, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer?

Celebrations, of course, are both expected and excellent opportunities to test your mountaineering mettle. Indeed, on major holidays it is virtually mandatory to do so. Imagine ushering in the fiscal new year or commemorating Calvin C. Coolidge's birthday or throwing caution to the wind during Take-A-Sorghum-To-Lunch-Week without the benefit of Busch. A disturbing prospect at best.

On the other hand, not every event need be as significant as those outlined above. Small victories like exams passed, papers completed or classes attended are equally acceptable. Remember the mountaineer's motto: matriculation is celebration.

Interpersonal relationships are also meaningful times. There are few things finer than taking your companion in hand and heading for the mountains, transcending the ho-hum and hum-drum in favor of a romantic R & R. Naturally, couples who share the pleasures of mountaineering run the risk of being labeled social climbers. But such cheap shots are to be ignored. They are the work of cynics, nay-sayers and chronic malcontents.

Similarly, the ambience of an athletic afternoon (e.g. The Big Game) is another ideal moment. Downing the mountains elevates the morale of the fan and, hence, the team. Therefore, if you care at all about the outcome, it is your duty to mountaineer.

When should one not enjoy the invigoration of the mountains? Here, you'll be happy to learn, the list is much briefer.

Mountaineering is considered declassé with dessert, improper during judicial proceedings and just plain foolish while crop dusting around power lines. Otherwise, as the hot-heads of the sixties used to say, "Seize the time!"

[1] Mountaineering is the science and art of drinking Busch. The term originates due to the snowy, icy peaks sported by the label outside and perpetuates due to the cold, naturally refreshing taste inside. (cf. lessons 1, 2 and 3.)

Is Bigger Better?

Picture a group of concerned students gathering on their own time to discuss issues they all feel strongly about. Decisions are reached by consensus, and the process is painstaking but fruitful, as every member contributes and no one dominates. Meetings sometimes last 2½ hours as concepts are thrashed out and ideas solidified. After a lengthy debate on wording, a petition is drafted, circulated and presented to the administration, which begins to make curriculum changes that will potentially affect all students of the college.

Sound like the sixties? A crazed idealist's hallucination? For the last several weeks, University of Vermont students concerned with educational priorities in the College of Agriculture have been airing their grievances, analyzing problems and working on potential solutions which they feel should be integrated into the university curriculum. The students feel that the College of Agriculture should devote more courses and classroom time to the needs of small-scale, diversified and energy efficient farming, rather than the traditionally-taught "bigger is better" approach. By organizing popular support (via a petition outlining basic objectives) and by combining the documentation of current inadequacies in the curriculum with potential alternatives, the students believe that important changes can be made.

The SPADE project (Students for Progressive Agricultural Development) came together through the efforts of Jim Mansfield and John Hammer, both senior agriculture majors. "Many students we've talked with feel that they've been presented with a largely one-sided perspective in their courses" said Mansfield. "Students get the agri-business 'more chemicals are better' line from the beginning, and although many don't agree with this, they don't have much choice." "It seems that student frustration has given way to action," added Hammer "because even though we only put up a few signs, thirty-seven people came to our first meeting."

Initially, things went slowly because, as one member put it, "Everyone knew something was wrong, but no one knew quite where to start." Gradually though, broad scale issues and problems were whittled down to specific needs for improvement, and a petition was drafted to elicit wider support. Meanwhile SPADE is compiling a support statement to accompany the petition, in which existing problems in agriculture and their relevance to the university will be documented.

The historical background behind a handful of people petitioning for a new educational direction is perhaps too enormous to convey briefly, but a few statistics do serve to illustrate the point. In 1945, there were 30,000 farms in Vermont, now there are just 3,000. In the United States, farms continue to disappear at a rate of 2,000 per week, while the number of large scale corporate farms rises steadily. In the corn belt, farmers are applying twice as much fertilizer and five times the amount of pesticides as they did just twelve years ago, and the American agricultural chemicals bill is $8 billion annually. "Undoubtedly, the highly-capital and energy intensive nature of current farm practices has a lot to do with why so many farmers are getting out – they just can't afford it," said one SPADE member. "Yet, Ag school students have few options to take courses that would teach them skills in small scale, organic and more self-reliant farming techniques. We'd like to change that."

Petitions are currently circulating through classes and SPADE members have been petitioning at tables in Billings. "We're trying to bring the issue out to students," said Jim Mansfield. "We strongly urge students to write comments and come to our meetings on Tuesdays at 6:30 in the Fireplace Lounge of Living/Learning. The only way things will happen is if people get involved."

Ultimately, much work needs

Banks

They've Got Us By The Bills

By Randy McMullen

Consider the following situations your bank may put you into

SITUATION A

It's 5:30 on a Friday afternoon and you have just spent your last 75 cents on a rum and coke at the undeniable Friday Afternoon Drinking Club (FADC). It's a nice day and a nice drink, and you enjoy watching the remaining drinkers float, around the grounds, looking for commitments, parties, rolling papers, or wherever they placed their notebooks when arriving. They all seem numb, and you seem numb, and the world seems numb from drinking, and you really just don't care...

Until you remember that the reason your rum and coke exhausted your money supply: you had forgotten to get to the bank, Church Street. It seems like continents away from where your near-rubbery legs are holding you up, but unless you make it there you will have no money for the weekend. No money?How the hell can anybody exist for an entire weekend without money?The very idea of it seems absurd, but in approximately 20 minutes it will become a reality. It can happen.

You scramble for sobriety. You try hitching, but everyone driving downtown on a Friday afternoon is either going to the liquor store or to the bars, and could not be bothered with anyone who seems to be in a hurry.

Nonetheless, you make it to the bank in what feels to be a fairly short time. But with your head pounding and lungs feeling like they're about to lay an egg, you make the futile grab for the door – already noting with dispair that the inside is as dark and empty as a tomb. Locked. An excrutiating bummer and the ultimate paradox: having put your money in a place of security you find it proudly locked while you are outside left to stare.

SITUATION B

It's almost time for your midterm exam in calculus, but you decide to first make a quick run to the bank which will enable you later to proceed from your exam directly to Hannibul's.

There is not a single parking space to be had near the bank, but about two blocks away you discover an opening with the sign "Mayor Only" in front of it. Laughing, you pull the car immediately into the space.

As you enter the bank, you notice to your amazement a single booth without a line. You hustle into place.

"I'd like to withdraw $15 please."

The girl greets you with such a blank stare that you realize you might just as well have told her that you are a Quebec architect looking for a spot to build a miniature Kremlin. You also realize why there was no line at the booth; the teller is an obvious beginner who doesn't know a bank from Ben and Jerry's ice cream parlor. You'll be lucky if you make your exam or Hannibul's before nightfall.

Meanwhile, a Burlington police officer has just approached your automobile and is wondering if he ever remembers seeing Mayor Paquette drive a 1958 Rambler with license plates reading WASTED and a hookah in the front seat. He starts to write you a parking ticket, but decides instead to have the car towed.

And, of course, your teller is moving right along. Having fed your bank book to some terminal, broken a cash register, she finds herself still in need of assistance.

"Martia, what do I do when the red light starts blinking twice as fast, and the green light stops blinking completely? Your bank book comes back to you looking more like an outhouse for gerbiles, but you finally get your money and sprint to your former parking space to find that the mayor had been returned his deserved spot. Ironically, the $15 you have just withdrawn will exactly cover the towing charges.

In short, banks have us by the balls. Money is such a valuable item that we go through all kinds of hell to keep it.

And what we don't keep, we spend, which is of course a whole different ball game. There is a thrill involved with throwing away your hard-earned dollars, and banks have responded by incorporating many styles for you to do so. Nobody writes checks anymore, they write personalized checks (series A: Vermont woodland scene; series B: stained oak; series C: UVM trustees lunching at B.T. McQuires with Don Rickles).

There is also the newest fad: automatic tellers. This allows you to bleed yourself dry any time of day. Automatic tellers promote even more reckless irresponsibility than do checking accounts. It's fun to bounce a check, but even more challenging to see if you can trick the machine into giving you money you don't own. But the one undesirable aspect of these machines is their closing melody: BEEP-BEEP-BEEP! Who knows how many bums and thieves sit around the corner from an automatic teller at night, waiting for the sound that tips them off to a newly endowed victim.

Someday, we'll probably be able to get our money simply by dialing for it. It seems unfortunate, because the more sophisticated banking becomes, the more costly it will be. And when we have to pay through the nose to get our own money, there is something to be feared.

Is Bigger Better?

to be done if the College of Agriculture is to change its educational priorities and objectives in the future. Any institution that has been in existence since 1862 is not likely to change overnight, but that does not prevent some SPADE members from being cautiously optimistic. "There are probably as many potential solutions as there are individuals in the group" said one student. "The major unifying factor in Students for Progressive Agricultural Development is not a common answer, but the common question — 'Isn't it about time?'."

Underground Mall

controlled by the city of Burlington. Revenue arising from its use will be used primarily for promotion of the downtown area.

Other groups concerned with the construction of the project other than Alexander & Truex Inc. follow. Le Messurier Assoc., the firm who worked on the National Air and Space Museum in the District of Columbia for one, will be the structural engineers for the projects. Gary Vanderweil Inc., a company used a lot by the state, will be the mechanical engineer in charge of heating and cooling. Also, Carol R. Johnson Assoc. will be the landscape architects, McPhail Assoc. the soil engineers, with Dubois and King Inc., the civil engineers. Finally, Pizzagalli Construction of Burlington will be in charge of the construction of this project.

This all sounds great, but there is still one obstacle left, a cost for the project has been placed at between 15.8 and 17.8 million dollars — realistically 17.8 million dollars. The bulk (90%) of this money would come from the federal government. Here is where a real problem may occur.

Involved in the financing for this project are a battery of federal agencies including: the Urban Mass Transit Association, the Department of Energy, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Economic Development Agency, and the Heritage Conservation Recreation Service. The problem is that in the past it has been virtually impossible to get different government agencies to cooperate and put projects together.

President Carter has put emphasis on creating this inter-departmental cooperation during his administration. Jack Watson is an advisor to President Carter who is chiefly responsible for inter-agency coordination. He is up on this project, both its needs and prospects. With the good reception the project has received from the federal government, prospects are good.

Finally, roughly ten percent of the project is to be paid for by the city of Burlington, namely the taxpayers. Prospects for approval are good. This leaves us with a project which may begin to appear late next summer or early next fall. Whatever, construction is expected to take two years to complete once started. In the future, Burlington may be thought of as a unique shopping experience. One that is memorable to visit, fun to walk through, and even a good place to shop. It will also be an easy area to travel around without having to worry about a car. With the pedestrian concourse, Burlington may become a primary marketplace in New England, and be recognized and praised by other cities in the area.

A Case of Media Irresponsibility

Perhaps the most valuable lesson gleaned from Jerry Rubin's lecture last Thursday evening came not from the speaker, but in the shameful reporting of the event by the local media. The Free Press' coverage, and later that of the Vanguard and Boston Globe exemplified the power of the press to manipulate circumstances in such a way as to totally obscure their original meaning. While the Rubin episode may seem trivial to some, its implications on a broader scale raise serious questions on media responsibility in society.

Mr. Rubin concluded the evening's discussion, and most of the audience had left Ira Allen Chapel when the now-famous pie throwing incident occurred. Rubin's face was covered with meringue, and press cameramen, like vultures descending on carrion, moved in for a better shot. When one photographer was later berated for what many viewed as a serious breach of journalistic etiquette, he responded, "Look, I think the man (Rubin) is a pig." Clearly, such an attitude cannot make for balanced reporting.

The subsequent newspaper pictures of Rubin a la creme and headlines stating "Pie Interrupts Rubin's Lecture" enraged many who attended the event. The greatest insult, though, was not to the intelligence of the audience, but to the countless citizens who did not attend the lecture and were led to believe that the pie throwing incident was the most significant occurrence of the evening. By emphasizing a minor item in its coverage of the event, the local press abdicated its inherent responsibility to the public. His past triumphs and failures notwithstanding, Jerry Rubin held several hundred persons' attention for nearly three hours, and opened thought-provoking discussion on a variety of topics. This fact, the true news story of the evening, was insidiously buried in meringue.

Biased journalism is bad enough, but when the press awards itself the right to instigate news, a basic code of media ethics has been broken. A substantial body of evidence suggests that the local press was involved in the planning and execution of the pie-throwing incident. A Free Press photographer arrived at Ira Allen, was informed of an "event" that would occur towards the end of the evening, and left the lecture. A short while later he was back, this time equipped with cameras suitable for shooting a high speed photographic sequence which he did not use until the pie throwing occurrence. Paul Schnabel, the individual who creamed Rubin, whatever his ulterior motives, was also paid for his labors.

When those who are ostensibly involved in reporting history set themselves to the task of creating it via distorted or subjective coverage, a fundamental democratic principle is violated. Whether at a local, national or global level, created news is not news, it is propaganda. As Mr. Rubin persuasively argued, much of American culture is built upon a series of myths, euphemistic interpretations and outright falsifications of history. Rubin's point, particularly in the light of media coverage surrounding his lecture, is well-taken.

Excuse the College Semantics

To the Editor:

Tell me folks.

Tell me what your conception of Jerry Rubin is, after the Burlington Free Joke has mounted him, complete with pie, across the front page of the state and local section. (Mass media is responsible?)

And tell me a few more things.

Did we have our ears closed when a man, directly involved in anti-war activism and liberating our pagan society was relating his tale?

Would any of us drop our college education to march in some silly demonstrations? Or, are our own achievements above the well-being of others? Do we all know enough about sex to walk out when a man comes out open-faced?

Rubin simply had too much on his shoulders for most of us.

...And excuse the college semantics, but, may the dirty bastard who threw the pie hang by his balls in hell.

Sincerely,
Alan L. Marshall

Well, the Field Looks Good

To the Editor:

I am so pleased to see the ugly football goalposts at Centennial Soccer Field finally taken down. The area is now a first-class soccer facility, and the UVM athletic dept. deserves credit for their action. With an important Yankee Conference game against UMass coming up this weekend, Centennial now looks good — let's hope that the Catamounts can continue their winning ways!

Sincerely,
Fred C. Berger

Surprise, Surprise

To the Editor:

I was immensely surprised when I opened last week's Cynic and found one of my poems on p. 12. Sometime last year I believe I gave that poem (entitled "Language") to the editor of The News and the Weather. I certainly never gave the Cynic permission to use it, and the Features Editor or whoever is responsible for its inclusion should recognize that using a poem without the author's permission is both discourteous and illegal.

On further scrutiny of p. 12 I noticed that above my poem is a poem entitled "Journey." This poem has no author's name under it. The editor of "Poetry License" apparently believes "Journey" to be mine and so coupled it with "Language." I have never seen it before.

When I read through my poem, I noticed that the word "drank" in the last stanza has replaced the word I originally put there — "drinks." The verbs throughout the stanza should all be in the present tense, and the sudden appearance of the past tense ruins the momentum and intended effect.

I believe all of this is relevant to an unfortunate attitude prevalent among non-professional editors. These editors would never think of publishing an article without the permission of the author, but they have a distinctly different attitude, a much sloppier attitude, toward poetry. It might be summed up as "We don't have to be too careful since poetry isn't real writing and poets are probably happy just getting themselves into print." Obviously the "license" taken by such an editor is anything but "poetic."

I hope whoever is editing the "Poetic License" section of the Cynic will act with more professionalism in the future by (1) first obtaining the permission of each author and (2) attempting to discover which author wrote which poems.

Sincerely,
David Lloyd

Jerry Rubin: The Mythical Hero

To the Editor:

Accounts of Rubin's speech at Ira Allen generally fail to mention that the crowd was spellbound and amused for the most part, the part starring the Jerry Rubin of 1968. His rhetoric no less incitative when recalling what is now water under the bridge, Rubin pulled the appropriate laughs and jeers from his audience as he recalled instances of foiling the established powers of the Sixties. Oddly enough, when he began to speak about his present activities, which by his own admission are more personally significant than any of his past revolutionist triumphs, the audience was cold at best; at worst they rejected him outright. It was a calculated risk, and Rubin lost.

He stated prior to his historical survey of his radical career that he would speak of the Sixties because he finds resistance whenever he expounds his views of the significant forces now shaping our lives and times. Clearly, Thursday's crowd was no different. It wouldn't let him change and be the human being he felt he had become.

(1) The pie was poetic justice, though it curiously reminded us of the type of disrespect those ostensibly committed to respecting the goal of universal respect for the quality of human life sometimes bestow upon those who disagree with their rhetoric and methods, even though agreeing with their ideals. The type of stunt a yippie might have pulled on a politician. It recalls other contradictions in Rubin's philosophy. That by exhorting us to "kill the pigs," he himself instantly became the biggest pig. Or that he was aghast that Judge Julius Hoffman could imply that a co-defendant's sense of humor was a factor in determining his sentence. That remark to the question of why Rubin was served with a larger penalty for contempt of court in the Chicago 7 trial than was fellow-yippie Abbie Hoffman surely achieves yippie-like status for the judge. Rubin, the myth-destroyer, couldn't accept Hoffman pre-empting him by ignoring the myth that judges cannot display wit. It's perhaps fitting that now as he speaks soberly about important changes he's made, Rubin is literally splattered with ridicule. But it's no less unfortunate.

(2) Yippies weren't concerned so much with substantive political arguments as they were with theatrically inducing emotional reactions. They made it possible for one to be against the war and the government on an apolitical, extra-rational basis. It wasn't necessary to be an avowed Marxist to partake of the strong wave of discomfort washing the nation's value system. Yippie antics exposed the questionable assumptions within those values. If they didn't seem to provide attractive alternatives, they at least forced the questions. Thus, it became possible for one to listen to Rubin in complete disagreement with his politics and yet feel great personal empathy for the man. It became possible to totally oppose the actions of the U.S. government in Vietnam and yet to feel great love for that government's ideals and for the people of the country. Rubin is still breaking down myths.

(3) It's surely laudable that a former proponent of the annihilation of law enforcement personnel should now declare that "the enemy is within" and advocate programs which aim to increase one's physical, emotional and spiritual health. Even if one disapproves of such activities, they are certainly safer for society, particularly policemen. And Rubin hasn't really changed as much as may appear. He moves in the same direction as before, although perhaps on a lonelier, less-visible path. Still out to destroy the prevailing myths, he tells us his greatest accomplishment isn't the radicalism he engendered a decade ago, but a book in progress on male sexuality, the purpose of which is to diffuse masculinity myths and foster greater communication and emotional rapport among American men. Having perhaps become a bit less Marxist and a bit more Socratic, he chips away at the deeper, more obstinate boundaries which keep us from making the world work for universal benefit.

As a comment on the crowd's acceptance of the new Rubin, we might recall that when Dylan stopped chanting protest songs and began making music he felt more fully expressed his artistic visions, he gained worldwide ingratitude and defamation. Now that he's successfully broken the social-activist mold, he's allowed to play the music he wants to play. At least part of the crowd listening to Jerry Rubin last week wanted to keep him in his Sixties role: the myth of the radical hero. That would be one too many myths to destroy, even if it was by Rubin's own decisions to choose his own directions in life. Jerry Rubin for the most part escaped the bonds of society for his politically treasonous acts. It is hoped with equal cleverness he will elude the shackles of his past.

Sincerely,
Paul Reese

The Retrospective 60's

Myth and Reality

by David Greeff

Many in the audience who listened to Jerry Rubin last Thursday were profoundly disappointed with what they viewed as a radically negative reversal of his political rhetoric. The once inflammatory, Marxist, Yippie radical of the activist 60's had suddenly turned, by his own admission, into a "humanistic capitalist" in the halcyon 70's. Rubin, once the personal embodiment of revolutionary activism, and a staunch advocate of capitalism's overthrow, now wants to make a million dollars.

It is quite understandable that Rubin's contemporary idealogy is viewed — and justifiably so — as a "capitalist cop-out." Even those who tired of demonstrations and revolutionary ideals and feel that the proper road for political change in the 70's is from within the power structure, have to be at least somewhat suspicious of an ex-radical who now holds that wealth can be tantamount to the advancement of positive social change. Reality shows that many start out with admirable goals like these, but before long find themselves irretrievably sucked into the web of exploitation intimately associated with continuous U.S. economic growth.

Essentially, Rubin disillusioned those with preconceived notions of his political creed and lifestyle. One student expressed dismay upon hearing that Rubin, when in Burlington, ate dinner at the fashionable Ice House restaurant, as compared to a more inexpensive spot where the "proletariat" might dine. They forget easily that almost no man avoids increased conservatism with age and that Jerry Rubin is no different than the next guy.

Rubin, like many of his peers in the Yippie movement, became lethargic of totally devoting himself to a cause, and now desires to turn inward and seek individual spiritual enrichment. After all, in his view, the movement rallied to a successful conclusion, and the peaceful 70's are a logical and positive consequence of that success.

Regardless of Rubin's personal convictions, he offered much insightful and thought provoking commentary on the 60's and its youth movement in which he played an integral part.

His central theme was that the movement was one largely dedicated to dispelling the myths surrounding American society. The myths were quite simply that the honorable concepts promulgated by our forefathers in the Declaration of Independence and Constitution were absent as guidelines for government policy making. Vietnam was the most striking example and thus became the focal point of criticism. We theoretically supported democracy and free political choice, but we knowingly prevented Vietnamese elections in 1956 because Ho-Chi-Minh, openly inimical to the U.S., was obviously going to win. And this fundamental contradiction seems insignificant when placed next to the horrible military atrocities and war crimes inflicted on innocent Vietnamese civilians. The people were shocked to find out that such contradictions existed and refused to let them continue without protest. The country soon became divided over the issue like no other since secessionism in the Civil War.

One interesting point made by Rubin was on the egotism central to much of the movement's showmanship. Even though such continued and widespread action had to find its roots in ideology indigenous to the new youth culture, the most dramatic events were staged by individuals seeking attention. The implication is not that events were staged without proper political conviction, but rather that defying authority became itself a central goal, and not always because those defying knew why such authority was inherently evil. Furthermore, powerful peer pressure was exerted on the politically apathetic to get involved because it was the right thing to do. So, those who partook in many of the offshoots of the youth culture like long hair, rock music and others became automatically associated with that culture's political consensus — if, in fact, a consensus did exist.

Retrospectively, it is interesting that Rubin viewed the movement as such a success. He cites as examples the eventual American withdrawal from Vietnam, the demise of Lyndon Johnson, Watergate and the subsequent resignation of Richard Nixon. He refers to a new consciousness which was the compelling force behind these events. Moreover, this new consciousness has shown itself, in Rubin's view, to be aware of the damaging inconsistencies between action and ideas. But, unfortunately while this new awareness might exist, it has had little effect in ushering a new period of enlightened foreign policy. The U.S. still supports dictatorships which have little or no respect for human rights. The governments of the Shah of Iran and General Videla of Argentina are two obvious examples.

The 60's was the most tumultuous and important decade in the recent history of the U.S. The ensuing complacency of the 70's is almost acting as a censure to the new social ideals put forth less than nine years ago. The 60's are a time which require more extensive analysis and evaluation. For the critical issues of environmental pollution, wealth distribution, and the military-industrial complex among others, are gaining in importance daily. Let us reawaken sleeping ideas from the decade past and apply them with appropriate caution to the status quo. There is still much to learn.

A Crisis of Communication

By Eric Kilburn

In an academic community severely afflicted with the "publish or perish" mentality, it is inevitable that some research is done with survival motives in mind, despite the fact that such research may have little or no scientific value. In Hard Tomatoes, Hard Times author Jim Hightower cites instances where University research has resulted in the esoteric discoveries that "the major cause of rural poverty is lack of income," "working women spend less time in the home than non-working women" and "small deformation forces (light squeezes) are more useful in determining grapefruit quality than large deformation forces (hard squeezes). "Despite the transparent absurdity of the previous statements, similarly-useless research still continues, as this press release smuggled out of the UVM psychology department clearly attests."

Is a person capable of literally talking for hours without saying anything? Can students really go about their daily lives participating in normal conversations on everyday occurrences while communicating virtually nothing? If one is to believe a report published recently by a team of psychologists and linguists from the University of Vermont, occurrences of the phenomenon are far from unique, and in fact may be the harbingers of a social trend.

According to project coordinator Dr. Henry T. Grossmund, the carefully-controlled experiment was designed to examine the two primary aspects of communication. "We wanted to explore both superficial and post-superficial conversational contents without arousing suspicions or inhibitions in the test subjects," said Dr. Grossmund. "Therefore, we used specially-designed tape recorders that were concealed in the students' backpacks, and screened all test applicants to insure that none of the experimental subjects experienced discomfort during shallow communication. Fortunately, we didn't have to weed out too many applicants," added Dr. Grossmund.

Preliminary test results indicated several noteworthy tendencies in person to person exchanges. "Based on data from 413 subjects involved in over 2,000 hours of conversation, we found that nearly 61% of all communication falls in the 'superficial' category," said Dr. Grossmund. A significant percentage of topics in this category included references to the past such as "How was your summer," "How was your weekend," or "How was your semester," with the most common response being "Good," "Great," or "Okay." An equally large fraction dealt with future occurrences with "what are you doing this summer?" and "What are you doing this weekend?" predominating.

Not satisfied with these results, the research team subjected the data to several weeks of painstaking computer analysis, which provided further insight into the complex subject. "It was found that people tended to ask questions like "How was your weekend?" on Mondays and Tuesdays, and "How was your summer?" in September," said Dr. Grossmund. "Interestingly, the reverse was true for questions like "What are you doing this weekend?" and "What are you doing this summer?" which tended to be asked on Thursdays and Fridays or in April and May, respectively."

The past-superficial communication category, which comprised the remaining thirty percent of the data, also yielded much previously unknown information. "We learned that college students of today devote 90% of their post-superficial conversation time to the subjects of sports, sex, drugs and grades," related Dr. Grossmund. "In many cases, students demonstrated a clear ability to combine two or more categories; for example, we heard numerous remarks to the effect that "if the team wins I'm going to get bombed," or "if the team loses I'm going to get bombed."

Other post-superficial conversation topics included money (7%), Zen Meditation (2%), politics, music and all other categories (1%).

Several test persons suffered mild schizophrenic side-effects, apparently from being unable to separate their experimental roles as superficial conversationalists from their outside lives. One subject interrupted a November meeting of his forensic scatology class to excitedly ask the professor, "How was your summer?" Fortunately the professor knew of the experiment and replied earnestly, "It was great — I had a real good time," whereupon the student calmed down. In another instance, a business student responded to the question "How does one maximize the net after-tax profit?" with "That's easy — just do bongs, man." Details and eyewitness reports of the incidents are still being analyzed by the research team.

The Vermont study results are considerably higher than data from previous experiments, leading some researchers to speculate on superficiality's significance as a social trend. One scientist predicted that by 1990 "probably 85% of all student conversations will be about weekends, summers, vacations, and the weather." While other members of the research team were more moderate in their estimates, there was no disagreement that lack of substance in communication is the wave of the future. As D.R. Grossmund stated, "There is very little an individual can do about trends; we've just got to live with them. By the way, are you going to Delta Psi this weekend?"

Erratum

Last week the CYNIC erroneously reported that UVM has only 62 minority students out of a total enrollment of 7700. The true figure is 130 ;this year there were a record 62 new minority students accepted into a freshman class of 1920.

Little Feat Wails!

"I feel that in due time I will get my just reward, and if my just reward is just doing this until I die, I'll be very happy."

By Pablo Conrad

Non-stop and tight enough to snap, Little Feat rocked Patrick Gymnasium for close to two hours last Friday night before the rowdy and near capacity crowd let them off the stage.

The festival atmosphere that provided a warm welcome for Eric Kaz and Craig Fuller's opening set, erupted with cheers of recognition as the Feat walked onstage and kicked off the S.A. concert season with their Rock and Roll Doctor. Keeping the packed gym on its feet and crowding toward the stage, the band burned through one song after another, barely pausing to catch a breath or say hello before bursting back into the lights.

Without a lot of showy antics and costumes, Little Feat was one of the most visually exciting bands to play at Patrick in a long time. Lowell George, grim and imposing in great white overalls, stretched out his unique slide guitar style on every song, leaning and snarling into the microphone on openers like "Time Loves A Hero" and "Spanish Moon." Above him and to the side, Sam Clayton, in a blue satin jumpsuit, played congas and percussion, head tilted back and grinning sidelong at drummer Richie Hayward. Across the stage, Bill Payne kept busy within a semi-circle of electric piano and synthesizer keyboards, always on his feet. With Lowell George handling so much of the singing and playing, there wouldn't seem to be need for a second guitarist. Paul Barrere, besides working on top of Feat's earthy rhythm section to keep Lowell's playing in context, provided a lot of his own lead guitar and sang wolfishly through "Old Folks Boogie" and "Keeping Up With the Jones."

The program was very similar to that of the recent Waiting For Columbus LP, featuring mostly newer songs, but including a fresh version of their Texas Rose Cafe. Keeping their excitement (and volume) at a consistently high level throughout, the real Little Feat feeling came in the middle of the concert, during Lowell George's "Spanish Moon." As Kenny Gradney carried out the song with a chunking bass solo, the others quietly put down their instruments and walked off-stage, and finally even Gradney walked off, leaving the stage dark and silent. Suddenly, from the wall of speakers on each side came crashing chords from Bill Payne's keyboards. All alone onstage, ringed with equipment, Payne built up a long improvised solo, isolated on the dark stage by a single spotlight. Just as his playing began to sound more like a real song, the rest of the band, except for Lowell George, slipped on and exploded into a fast jam, pushing it harder and harder. Paul Barrere and Bill Payne took turns at spurring each other on to take the tune farther and farther out, only to drop back and let Kenny Gradney and Richie Hayward's bass and drums come striding out of the soaring voice of Payne's synthesizer. This was Little Feat music, the players turning their backs on the audience to face each other while jamming and exchanging grins of delight over what they played.

The Little Feat sound is a combination of rawness and perfection, from the melodramatic "Willin'" to the urgency of Feat's "Don't Fail Me Now." Vocals shine as much as the playing, with five out of the six alternating between close harmony and Lowell George's hoarse, emotional singing. At Patrick Gym, the band supported itself easily, allowing each member's playing to stand out.

Credited with most of Little Feat's song writing and production work, as well as guitar and vocals, Lowell would appear to be the mastermind behind the band. Watching them play however, and later when I speak with Kenny Gradney, it becomes clear that Little Feat's music is very much a collective effort. Gradney said that "The band has its own strong influence on each one of us... nobody's headstrong about it."

Certainly, influences work strongly onstage, shaping the music of each song depending on each member's contributions. In "Rocket In My Pocket," the influence was very much Lowell's, his slide guitar moaning obscenely behind the suggestive lyrics, and his expression of dazed determination offsetting his hollering blues vocals. On the next song the focus might be entirely on the persistent drive of the rhythm section, Kenny Gradney in front this time, glancing mischievously around the gym while remaining entirely in synch with the drums and percussion behind him.

If there are songs that tend to show up the influences of one member more than the others, the best and most exciting playing must be on those tunes which feature each member equally. Certainly those are the songs which Little Feat shared completely with the Patrick Gym audience on Friday night. Dixie Chicken had the whole crowd singing along on the chorus while Kenny and Lowell did a brief dance step in unison. Dixie Chicken climaxed that set, and Little Feat hardly concealed the pleasure they got out of it, with Bill Payne applauding delightedly at Lowell's screeching guitar, and Lowell pulling out a harmonica and wailing out the last raucous notes before leaving the stage.

Back on for an encore, Little Feat was joined by Pure Prairie League's John David Call who played pedal steel with Craig Fuller and Eric Kaz. With Lowell on acoustic guitar and Call's steel crying away, they worked through "Willin'," the evening's most subdued song.

By the end of it, Little Feat was more playful than ever, bantering through their introductions. Paul Barrere introduced Lowell George as the "Pillsbury Doughboy of Rock and Roll," as Lowell struck up

The Greening of the Vermont Symphony

By Tom Daniels

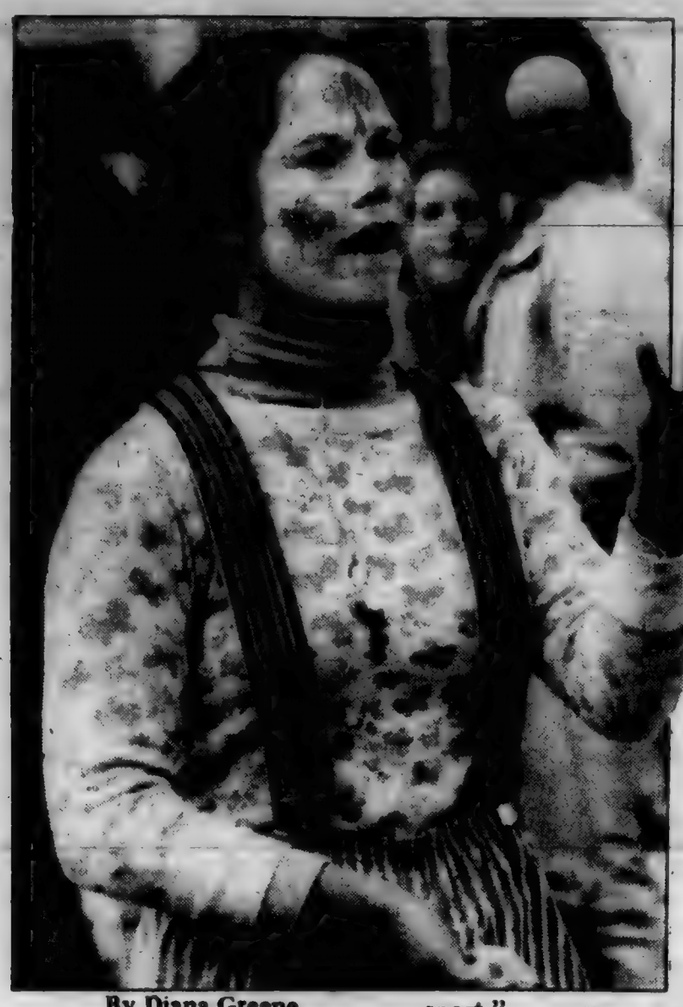
Virtuoso violinist Eugene Fodor returned to Burlington Saturday night to spark the promising new season of the Vermont Symphony Orchestra. Fodor, who played to an enthusiastic crowd at Ira Allen Chapel two years ago, displayed remarkable dexterity in performing Paganini's difficult Violin Concerto Number 1, Opus 6.

Winner of several prestigious awards including the Merriwether Post Competition, Paganini Competition in Genoa, and the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow, Fodor has been called "America's most exciting young violinist," and Saturday's audience was far from disappointed. The 28-year-old star from Turkey Creek, Colorado claimed he had an "off-night" Saturday, but his rapid, precise repertoire of complex runs, jumping octaves, and finger plucking earned him three standing ovations.

But Fodor was not the sole praise-worthy event of the evening. The Vermont Symphony Orchestra played with good spirit and determination, and held the audience throughout. The concert marked the return of the VSO to the Lane Series bill after an absence of 22 years. The Symphony used to be a mainly amateur group, but since Argentine-born conductor Efrain Guigui joined in 1974, the Symphony has developed a professional polish. Guigui, who stands less than five feet tall, is a dynamo of energy and his passionate gestures are as entertaining to watch as the entire orchestra! All the orchestra members praise Guigui as "marvelous," and Fodor added, "Guigui is one of the finest conductors in the East."

The Saturday concert opened with a well-chosen piece Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn. Though something of a standard, the Brahms interwove several melodies into an overall pleasant work. After a slow start, the orchestra picked up and finished with confidence. The appearance of Fodor brought the orchestra into top form and they provided a solid background for Fodor's incredible solos.

The final piece was a sensitive, well-played experiment: the Second Symphony of Finnish composer Jean Sibelius. At times, the VSO has been criticized for not performing lesser known works. But the Sibelius proved that the orchestra can deftly handle variety and successfully present an unusual composition. From the soft, pastoral first movement to the bravado of the finale, the orchestra performed admirably. The audience responded warmly as if to say, "It is a rare treat to attend the Symphony in Burlington."



The Symphony is a marvel in itself. The musicians congregate from all corners of Vermont and throughout New England. Rehearsal time is limited because of the high cost of renting space and most musicians are free only on weekends. The orchestra met in Burlington on Friday, practiced for four hours Friday night, and three on Saturday afternoon. Under the pressures of travel and cramped rehearsals, it is doubly impressive that the orchestra performed so well.

Unfortunately, few students attended the concert. Many were probably recovering from the Little Feat concert the night before. Once again, the town that thinks it's a city had too much culture planned on one weekend.

The next VSO–Lane Series concert is on December 2 and features UVM's own Elizabeth Metcalfe on piano. In February, the Symphony will perform Haydn's Creation with the UVM Choral Union and soprano Judith Raskin and famed tenor Charles Bressler. The series reaches a peak in April with a rare appearance by America's greatest living composer Aaron Copland. This event has special significance because Copland brought VSO conductor Guigui to the United States to work with him at Tanglewood.

A Word on Memorial Auditorium

The VSO and Lane Series are making every effort to improve the sound quality at Memorial Auditorium. The VSO recently acquired a portable acoustical shell which gives the orchestra reliable sound. UVM sound engineers and the Lane Series are working to upgrade the acoustics by installing risers to elevate 60% of the audience in six inch increments so that no three rows will be on the same level. This should greatly increase the viewing quality as well as the sound. The Lane Series is also planning to purchase cushions to make the seats more comfortable.

Fall Down '78

A Fanciful Festival at College and St. Paul Streets

By Diana Greene

With the wind whipping off Lake Champlain and pianist Don Rosso pounding out a boogie woogie tune, both contestants and spectators gathered around the graveled stone in front of Ben & Jerry's last Saturday awaiting the start of Fall Down 78 — a festival of fun and games.

Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, owners of Ben and Jerry's Homemade Ice Cream and Crepes, decided a month ago that they would someday sponsor an ice cream eating contest. Two weeks ago the activities began with the elimination round of the ice cream eating contest. The contestants, ranging in age from 10-35, attempted to wolf down a quart of their favorite flavor to qualify for the finals. Since only the three fastest times would move on to the finals, the pressure to inhale was on. Bruce Kohorn, with his cool professional style, stuffed down a quart of carob chip in record time — three minutes and 38 seconds for a safe first. Second was Bruce Veilmetti — man of a million faces; close behind were Brian Walsh and Greg Simmons who tied for third with the time of five minutes 40 seconds.

Dr. Harley Walter Kidder, the official referee, dressed in a black and white striped jersey and leather baseball cap, blew his whistle madly and the winners marched off for a two-hour rest before the finals when they would attempt to break the world record. One philosophical loser, still eating his honey and cinnamon, had this to say, "Ben and Jerry's ice cream is made for art, not for sport."

The frogs, imported from Mallett's Bay, were then brought out and the spectators gathered around the frog jumping arena. The range in talent was wide; there was everything from paraplegics to super speedsters. After a few false starts, not to mention several no-starts, the two winners from the preliminary heats, after some coaching from their respective owners, lined up for the three-leap final. The starter yelled "GO" but the frogs refused to move (maybe it was his tone of voice). After one long minute of anticipation Mike Kenausis's frog "Gandolf" took charge and hopped to the winning measure of 50½ inches.

Later in an interview with Kenausis, he claimed no responsibility for his frog's tremendous victory. He explained, "Gandolf is named after the wizard in The Hobbit because he had to have some power to win the contest." Kenausis was awarded a $25 gift certificate to Emerald City of Oz.

The ever so popular sounds of Saturday Night Fever began thumping out the tune "Burn" in preparation for Jerry Greenfield's fire eating act. Greenfield, generally regarded as a soft-spoken kinda guy, took this opportunity to expound his philosophies on the creation of fire and its effect on society through myth and legend. The crowd listened attentively to the horse-voiced tyrant as he ranted and raved with the conviction of a politician pleading innocent.

Greenfield, the fearless fire swallower, was assisted by a lovely young lady dressed in a red leotard with "FIRE" spelled across her chest in shimmering sequins, proving there was nothing small time about this act. He proceeded to swallow not only one or two but three balls of fire and extinguished them in one effortless huff.

Leaving no time for the audience to regroup from Greenfield's wizardry, Habenni Ben Coheen was delivered on his throne to center stage. Dressed in an Indian turban, Coheen perched his feet on one chair and his head on another while his body lay suspended in thin air.

Coheen lay still, slightly blushing, as he entered a transcendental state — a must for any true mystic. There was silence save for the occasional sounds of Coheen's chanting. With merely two whacks of a sledgehammer, the ten pound cinderblock was demolished into a million pieces. The audience responded with an equal amount of amazement and amusement.

The next event was the apple-eating contest — a fitting event for any authentic autumn festival. The contestants, pocket knives in hand, were eager to test their talents. There were fifteen minutes in which to peel the longest skin possible (which unless you've tried it is a lot trickier than it sounds). The time was up and the judge began the tedious task of measuring over fifteen apple peels.

John Campbell, a whiddler for many years, came in first with an extended peel of 86 inches. Kent Pattent, whose red-haired daughter so encouragingly told

Morrison's Moderate Pop

By Lori Goodman

Van Morrison, Wavelength (Warner Bros.)

Regarding none of the four albums recorded since Veedon Fleece – as fit for public consumption (including one with the Crusaders), Van Morrison comes back into recent attention with his new release Wavelength. However, the well-circulated belief that Morrison possesses the patent on the hypercritical approach, a perfectionist who sets exceedingly rigorous standards for himself is not evinced here, except perhaps in the album's production and the first rate line-up of relatively unknown back-up musicians. Morrison is here again with his usual lively but tamed pieces, yet he seriously lacks a diverse synthesis of material.

It is hard to avoid the necessity for invidious comparisons, but this album shows no new maturity for Morrison in lyrical writing. In fact, most of the songs are brought into significance through various solos, graced by the artistry of his guests. The first song "Kingdom Hall" is a pleasant piece about dancing with your sweetheart, but is marred by Morrison's banal and abundant use of non-sensical "las" and "liley'lows." The best portion of the song features a skillful synthesizer solo by Garth Hudson of The Band.

"Wavelength," the title cut, stars Morrison on shrill whining vocals, but, again, is saved by a superb guitar solo from Bobby Tench. Instead of recalling the consistence of mood from say his 1968 album Astral Weeks, Morrison's latest is moderate pop that occasionally rocks electric. Lost now is the brass/acoustic-folk base of his previous albums, notably St. Dominic's Preview (1972), the successful live double It's Too Late to Stop Now (1974) and Moondance (1970) – all goals and some corner shots but never a hit and miss like this. Also missing are the older woodwind ingredients that laced Morrison's sound with jazz impressionism, and if you're still looking for a brief sparkle of Morrison's Irish romanticism, well then you'd be in better shape to go back and learn the lindy for the high school prom. Not to entirely discredit Morrison, his best riff is "Listen to the Music Inside" off Lifetimes at the end of the first side.

Recalling the splendid array of material that is Morrison's repertoire, it is difficult to visualize any of these songs emerging as live gig favorites, especially as it pertains to his coming engagement later this month. For someone who loves Van Morrison, you'll enjoy this album because it's got Morrison's trademark, his distinctive phrasing. But if his stuff doesn't hit you one way or another, I doubt you'll be impressed.

Tull Busts Out

Jethro Tull, Busting Out (Chrysalis)

After a venerable history of eleven albums and two world tours, Tull busts out of semi-retirement with this latest double-live compilation of their most celebrated hits. This is far superior to their two previous live LP's Living in the Past and M.U. – The Best of Jethro Tull. Sure, it's the same material, but here the tunes are more expansive and finally welcome.

One brief sampling of these new renditions will surprise you; Tull is well-rehearsed and for a live album it's got an amazingly tight arrangement.

The first song "No Lullaby," rocks out with first-rate acoustic and electric work. Tull's new bass player, David Palmer, who does the strings for them, finally appears here, as well as superb augmentations on keyboards by John Evans (not to mention the Portative Pipe Organ). All the songs are exciting; each is strong on melody lines and ripe with lyrical wit, as evidenced on "Jack in the Green," an earthy medieval piece about furtive and articulate trolls. Jethro Tull manages to dig back into the archives with "A New Day Yesterday" from their second album Stand Up. It's a fresh release of their distinctive jazz/blues hybrid, illustrating to the world that they will always be unique in rock circles.

Busting Out possesses none of the pretentious bombasticism of Aqualung, and captures the group's early magic. Ian Anderson is still the adorable eccentric frontman on flute, not the tramp-as-rock-star sort who makes up for his lack of expertise with an infectious enthusiasm. Although Tull has been viewed as basically Anderson's band, one can not overlook all the talented new and old recruits on this album. True, Tull has squandered their talents before in wasteful areas such as A Passion Play, their thumbs-down 1973 release), but eight U.S. gold albums and a horde of fanatical followers might argue to the contrary. Listening to this latest effort makes one realize Tull's classic contribution to rock music.

'Heavy Weather' Sequel Soars

By Tom Nuccio

Weather Report: *Mr. Gone
******

Weather Report's long awaited sequel to the successful Heavy Weather album has finally arrived. Mr. Gone, far less commercial than the quartet's last production, achieves a high level of musical quality yet retains characteristics beneficial to widespread sales. Keyboardist Joe Zawinul refers to it as "a commercial extension of the Mysterious Traveler album." Trurer words could not be said.

A key to this record's effectiveness is the addition of yet another synthesizer to Zawinul's already awesome arsenal. The Prophet (sequential circuits synthesizer) enables him to sound exactly like an entire horn section. On "Young and Fine" Zawinul alone plays powerful and harmonic off-beat accentuations that only a 12 piece ensemble could match. This tune also features tenor saxophonist Wayne Shorter opening up and blowing a dynamite two chorus solo.

The title track begins with spaced-out synthesizer overtones which dissolve to a swinging walk rhythm. Zawinul commands the melody with his multiplicity of keyboards – soloing freely on the Oberheim Polyphonic while vamping and comping with the ARP 2600 and Fender Rhodes.

"Punk Jazz" opens with an unbelievably quick solo by everyone's number one bassist – Jaco Pastorius. Jaco flys up and down the neck of his Fender Fretless disregarding the previous limitations of this instrument. A balladic interlude follows as Pastorius glides legato arpeggios while stating the theme. The tune then breaks into a deliberate four tempo highlighted by Zawinul's "keyboardic Big Band" and Shorter's high flving soprano.

On this album Weather Report employs the talents of three top rate drummers: Peter Erskine, Tony Williams and Steve Gadd. However, only Erskine, a Ferguson alumnus, will tour with the group this fall. Another interesting transaction undertaken by the Weathermen was the disposal of percussionist Manolo Badrena (whose obnoxious voice lingers on in "The Pursuit of the Women"). Thus, for the first time in its eight year history, Weather Report is a quartet – a foursome of talented musicians who continue to produce the most complex and innovatively artistic music on the progressive jazz scene.

'Socially Redeeming Value' Who Needs It?

By Tom Campbell

Just as one would not buy a Cheech and Chong album in search of music, one should not lay three dollars down to see their new film Up In Smoke in search of plot, meaning, or theme. They are virtually non-existent.

Directed and produced by the obscure duo of Lou Adler and Lou Lombardo, and involving an equally nameless cast of supporting actors, Up In Smoke is a collection of comedy skits held together, barely, by a message that pervades Cheech and Chong's every artistic venture – that drugs are fun and should be indulged in at every opportunity. With only a semblance of plot, the movie centers around the pair's efforts to elude Sargeant Spedenko, an undercover cop whose goal in life is to bust as many people as possible, and stay out of jail, if only because it is easier to get high outside than it is on the inside.

Up In Smoke opens with a shot of Cheech Marin driving in an old but gawdy, souped-up car. Stopping to pick up a hitchhiker with big pointed breasts and long black hair, Marin realizes that it isn't quite the passenger he was looking for when Thomas Chong sticks his hairy face in the window. "Wow man," he says, "Like sorry, but this is the only way I can get me a ride." Minutes later, after slipping out of a brush with the cops, Chong pulls out a joint that's at least four inches in diameter and they light up. In a few minutes the car is so full of smoke that it looks like a bong on wheels. When the smoke finally clears, the red-eyed pair are rather surprised to discover that they are parked on a sidewalk. Grabbing the opportunity to pop a bunch of uppers, they begin to have such a good time that the cop who suddenly appears in the window is only something else to laugh at. A wild courtroom farce follows, performed to the Cheech and Chong song "I Was Framed," which includes some incredibly effective and funny camera work.

From there they wander into various preposterous situations that include, as a sample:

–An insane Viet Nam veteran who wears his old combat uniform under a pair of overalls and often goes into violent spells in which he thinks he's still fighting in Viet Nam.

–Nearly being busted at a party put on by a group of illegal Mexican aliens who have told the police about their whereabouts so that they will be transported back to Mexico in time for a wedding that they were all invited to.

–Driving a truck back from Mexico that is actually made out of specially processed, and highly smokeable, marijuana.

–Competing against a number of punk groups in a "Battle of the Bands." ("We've had one practice session, man," says Chong. "I know we're as good as they are!")

"It's one thing to knock a film because it doesn't live up to the artistic or commercial standards that it sets for itself. But to criticize 'Up In Smoke' for this reason would be pointless, simply because it doesn't make any pretensions in this area"

It's one thing to knock a film because it doesn't live up to the artistic (or commercial) standards that it sets for itself. But to criticize Up In Smoke for this reason would be pointless, simply because it doesn't make any pretensions in this area. In this respect, it might be best to not even consider Up In Smoke a movie. Actually, it's more a two person party that we know will continue long after Marin's smoke filled car drives into the distance at the movie's close.

Both Cheech and Chong have done a surprisingly impressive job, although it can be argued that all they have really done is apply facial expressions and body movements to characters that they have been developing on their records for the past six years. So if you aren't looking for any socially redeeming value, then you should find Up In Smoke an excellent experience, particularly if you take the advice on the film's advertisements – join the party and don't go straight.

SYSTEM $379

Our stereo systems have become known for the high quality and value that they present. It's taken over 12 months to find just the right products to achieve such a fine system, priced under $400, and yet worthy of your ears. System $379 will bring years of high fidelity performance to you, with the same high standards of performance that you might have paid twice as much for several years ago. In this sense, System $379 is truely a value breakthrough.

System $379 consists of the new Technics SA80 receiver, it features a powerful 30 watt RMS output, and an FM tuner that is as sensitive as many receivers costing more. And it has many of the same high performance characteristics that are found in even the most expensive Technics receivers, such as: flat group delay IF, phase-lock-loop FM, 90dB phono S/N radio.

We've coupled this first class receiver to the Fisher MS 135 passive radiator speaker system. These very efficient speakers will surprise even the most critical ear, for their high clarity and accurate base handling response are very good. When you listen to System $379, you'll agree that these speakers are far from ordinary.

Last, but not least, we've included the BSR2260 automatic turntable. It comes equipped with the QLM 30 MDIII stereo cartridge. The BSR2260 is a very reliable performer. It features cue control as well as auto eject at the end of a record. It can also be operated manual as many audiophiles prefer.

Upon credit approval System $379 may be purchased for as little as $37 down with $17.10 a month for 24 months (A.P.R. 18.11%)

UVM Student Opens Recording Studio

By Tom Campbell

The Burlington area now boasts three recording studios. The latest venture, Antapus III, is the creation of UVM junior Bruce Nelson, Growing out of a Living/Learning suite, Antapus III's studios are now located in Williston, Vt.

The studio, says Nelson, is "fully prepared to lay down high quality, and relatively inexpensive master tracks for a musician or group."

Antapus has gone through three stages of development in its brief history...

ANTAPUS I

Bruce Nelson was so confident at fifteen that his future was in the field of sound recording that he shelled out more than he could afford for a piece of quality sound equipment, a TEAC 2300 S reel to reel recorder. Combining this with a friend's recorder of comparable quality, and adding a mix down unit, they were capable of making four channel recordings. Antapus Enterprises was born.

With many musical friends in the Great Neck, Long Island area, Nelson had the opportunity to do some recording, but his first exposure to professional recorders came while visiting friends in Seattle a year later. When a regular sound man at an Eric Clapton – Carlos Santana concert came down with the flu, Nelson found himself behind the sound board recording and acting as assistant producer. "It was my first paycheck in the business and, needless to say, a great piece of experience," said Bruce, looking back on the event.

Returning to New York, he resumed his Antapus work and got a big break about a year later when he latched on as an apprentice to a professional sound engineer in the Manhattan area. "This was really important to me for a number of reasons," related Bruce. "First, the pay was pretty good and second, I now had access to and use of a number of major contract studios in the area." Working as an assistant for two years, he helped to record a number of bands who have become well known on the national level.

Supplementing his income by buying, repairing, and reselling audio components, Nelson was able to gradually add to the few pieces of equipment owned by Antapus. He soon purchased a Dekorder four track, four channel reel to reel, a pair of P.A. speakers and a Lang Fairchild Tascam mixing board with 16 inputs and eight channel mixing capabilities. Called "The Blue Meanie" because of its dominant color scheme and imposing size, it was destined to become an integral part of the studio.

In 1976 Nelson came to UVM as a student majoring in physical engineering. During his first year, the equipment sat home "gathering dust" because he couldn't find a place on or near campus to mobilize it. Not pleased about the situation he soon inquired into the Living/Learning program, where programs are created by students with similar interests to Nelson's.

ANTAPUS II

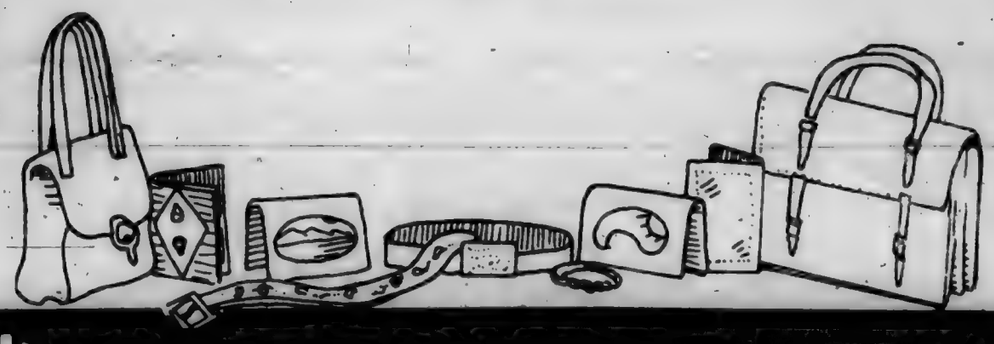
Teaming with George Sweet, Nelson gave to Living/Learning the proposal for what was to become the "Watts" program. Stressing the objectives of learning to operate and record from professional equipment, the program was set up in an educator/student manner with Nelson taking on the teaching responsibilities.

"From the start there were many misconceptions about the program," reflected Nelson. "People would come in and see all the equipment and think that we had received most of it from the Center. It's true that we had quite a large budget, but the only thing that the center actually gave us to use were microphones, stands, cables and tapes."

With the acceptance of the proposal, Nelson added again to the studio by buying a TEAC 80-8 reel to reel with full eight track capabilities and rewired his Lang/Fairchild/Tascum mixing board to fully utilize its capabilities. "These two actions," he cited, "are what actually brought Antapus across the gap from amateur to professional service."



Feeling that the members of "Watts" had learned as much, if not more, than had been accomplished in most of the other Living/Learning programs at the time, Nelson was shocked to discover that his proposal for the following year had been rejected. In near panic at the thought of not having sufficient space for his equipment, he decided that he needed an investor, which would allow him to incorporate into a real business. As luck would have it, the investor soon appeared in the form of Shana Schwartzburg, a student musician with a keen interest in the studio business.

Looking for a place to set up, Nelson had another lucky break in meeting William Meyer. Nelson said, "As we became involved in conversation, we soon realized that I was looking for a place to stay, as well as set up my studio, and that he had a place in Williston that would ideally suit my needs. Eventually working out an agreeable price for both of us, we moved in on the last day of the semester." Going with Nelson from the "Watts" suite were Roger Lewis and Rich Marshall, both of whom are considered "apprentices."

Fall Down '78

him "All you can do is hope," came in a close second with a peel of 84 inches. Campbell was awarded a free dinner for two at Carbur's.

The four ice cream eating finalists returned. While the necessary preparations were being made, Dr. Kidder (that's his name not his nature ) sang his award-winning rendition of "Let Me Call You Sweetheart."

The men took their respective positions on stage and were handed roughly 15 lbs. of ice cream; their aim was to beat the old and ungodly record for eating 11 lbs. in 8 minutes and 47 seconds. Each participant stared doubtfully at the overwhelming amount of ice cream they had confronting them face to face. The race was on and they were busy scooping out and shoving down as much ice as they could. Their eyes rolled, their bodies shivered, and their dreams for victory quickly faded. After about six minutes and what looked like gallons of ice cream, no one was even one-twelfth of the way done. It was at this point that one realized that whoever made that record must have been a trained pig. The time was up and the finalists looked relieved to say the least.

Once again Bruce Kohorn came out ahead having polished off a bird-like portion of only 12 oz. (a bit under ½ gallon). Kohorn was relatively quick but he lacked the essential flair necessary to keep the crowds attention. He did not gobble but rather neatly placed extremely large spoonfuls of vanilla, making sure none dribbled onto his beard. The others played fair and gave it their all but were unable to make even a dent in their 15 lbs. container.

The final event for the day was the stilt walking contest put on by Crispin' Leather. This event brought out real talent for previous experience was a practical necessity. There were three heats of six (one heat filled entirely with teenaged girls) where everyone had to walk two lengths across City Hall Park. The competition was intense with people trying their hardest to get their elongated legs moving. There were two winners — Erin Butler, a thirteen-year-old from Burlington who cruised with the grace and speed of a pelican on the run; and UVM's own Eric Pearson, who was as swift on those stilts as any tall man at the circus. Each winner was awarded a pair of Frye boots and that is nothing to shake your head at; Frye boots cost approximately $70 a pair. This ended Fall Down '78, which was considered by all a terrific success.

Along with all the official events of the day there were also jugglers, storytellers, food peddlers, a woman giving out free hugs, and a children's theatre company. The fun, humor, and excitement was enjoyed by one and all.

The business at Ben & Jeffy's reached an all-time high, the line was never shorter than fifteen people the entire day. One satisfied customer unabashedly offered this analogy, "Eating Ben & Jerry's pastashio brazil nut is like — wow — better than oral sex." One would have to say, after looking at all the smiling faces fade into the sunset that Fall Down 78 left the crowds in fine spirits.

Little Feat

"Don't Bogart That Joint," the cannabis anthem from the film Easy Rider. Finally, drawing the evening to a close, the Feat shooed the pedal steel back stage and tore into Feat's "Don't Fail Me Now." It could easily have been the finishing touch on a fine evening if Paul Barrere hadn't chosen to goad the crowd into such a frenzy of excitement, tossing maracas into the front rows and singing over and over, "roll right through the night, roll right through the night," from offstage, before running back on to close it together. Of course, the response was unrelenting.

Coming back onstage after the second thunderous ovation, Paul Barrere looked out over the crowd appreciatively and called out, "You all are great, you people want to rock and roll?" And finally, finishing off the night, was the satisfying punch of the classic "Oh, Atlanta." Bill Payne, looking pleased as hell, flashed a rare grin, singing that last song, and as they ducked off the stage for the last time, Barrere paused at the mike to shout, "Thank you, Vermont! It'll be a lot shorter before we get back here again!"

Backstage, in the hot and noisy Catamount locker room, the band was still glowing from the Patrick Gym reception. According to bass player Kenny Gradney, Little Feat's good nights come in cycles. "Lately, every time we play it gets better, one show after another until all of a sudden you'll have a real bad night and then the next night it'll hit again." Apparently, Friday had been pretty hot, "You kind of forget that folks really get like that when you get out on stage..."

Little Feat attributes its initial lack of widespread success to the fact that they don't tour as much as others, and that they've never restrained their music to a predictable format.

When asked if he would rather be working in a more successful band, Gradney was positive and insistent. "I could get up there and shake enough disco to get 'em, but that's neither here nor there. Why don't I just do what I want to do and be happy... I'm not going unnoticed, I'm getting to do what I really want to."

Gradney said that this summer's live double LP was a couple of thousand copies short of becoming their first gold album. and that January or February would see them back in the studio to work on a new release for next spring. Speaking for the Feat, he said, "I feel that in due time I will get my just reward, and if my just reward is just doing this until I die, I'll be very happy." Somehow, it looks as though a band that enjoys itself onstage as much as Little Feat did can look forward to more gold albums and more widespread acceptance.

The feeling of the Friday night concert was lively and happy, and while it may not have been the sprawling affair of last spring's Grateful Dead show, it was certainly a less passive scene on stage, the six members of Little Feat giving over completely all the emotional and instrumental strength they had.

With a new year of S.A. concerts ahead, the UVM audience may find that the explosive freshness of a Little Feat concert can be a tough act to follow.

Science Fiction

The 'Roots' of Science Fiction

By Jim Wright

It is time for one of the surprises which I hinted at in my first column of the semester. I have decided to expand my reviewing to include the SF magazines. I am doing this for a number of reasons: (1) to make you people out there aware of the fact that the magazines do indeed exist, and (2) because SF owes its past to the magazines.

Before 1926, there was no science fiction. There were occasional "scientific romance," the works of authors who like Verne, were as likely to follow up a novel like 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea (SF by today's standards) with a sequel like Mysterious Island (largely an adventure story). But the genre of SF did not then exist. The author was writing a novel, no more, no less.

Amazing Stories changed all that. When Hugo Gernsback founded it in 1926, he saw Amazing as a place in which to gather together stories of miraculous inventions and the frontiers of science. He wanted to give his readers the same sense of wonder he felt from the exploration of science. By sugar-coating the pill of science with fiction he hoped to incite in his younger readers an interest in science.

His actual accomplishment was not the one he had intended, but it was a far greater and more sweeping accomplishment. Gernsback accidentally created a new branch of literature, giving it both name and identity.

Since SF is in the middle of a "boom" time it seems appropriate that I start this new series with the newest SF magazine on the stands.

Omni has had only one issue published so far (the October issue). It is published monthly by Bob Guccione of Penthouse and will cost $2.00, which makes it the most expensive SF magazine as well as the newest. Guccione has created something different from the normal SF magazine because only one-third of Omni will contain fiction; the rest of the magazine being comprised of science fact articles. These articles will range on a variety of subjects from UFO's to Nobel Prize winners. Omni also has a budget of over two million dollars (with that money Guccione could have bought up all the other magazines and eliminated all the competition). There is a lot of potential there, but does it live up to it?

The fiction in the October issue, consisting of four stories, one each by Isaac Asimov, Theodore Sturgeon, Ron Goulart and James B. Hall, is fair at best. I was very disappointed in Asimov's story, it is – I think – something which he had sitting around in his desk until he could find a place to dump it. Sturgeon's story is the best of the lot, but then any story by Sturgeon is going to be the best of the lot. I've never read anything by Ron Goulart which I have enjoyed, and the story by Hall is poor, but expectedly so since he is a "mainstream" writer who has decided to jump on the bandwagon and write SF.

So while the fiction fails to make the grade, the fact comes through nicely. The question remains though: is this attempt at combining SF with science fact a workable idea? Well, provided that the fiction improves, I think that it can and will work. Although at least one SF reader I talked to didn't think that it would. She didn't feel that SF readers were necessarily science fact readers. I disagree however: almost anyone who reads SF is at least casually interested in science fact. I don't however, think that many SF readers also subscribe to the various science journals and therefore they will find Omni a way of satisfying both interests at once.

I do, by the way, expect the fiction to improve. Omni has just hired Ben Bova as its fiction editor. (All four stories in this issue were bought long before Ben became the editor.) While Ben was editor at Analog magazine he won the Hugo Award for best professional editor for the last five years in a row – he must be doing something right!

Antapus

ANTAPUS III

Taking on Jack Haigis as a co-engineer and Eber Lambert and Jim MacIsaac as apprentices, Antapus III, a professional quality sound and recording studio, soon became a reality. The Living/Learning material was given back and higher quality materials were bought, using some of the money from Shana's investment. The sound studio was constructed over the summer in the back of the two story house and midway into July they were able to take on a few recording jobs involving various area talent.

At the moment Antapus is negotiating with a well-known rock band from the area. "It's important to remember, though," states Nelson, "that this is essentially only the beginning. At the moment it's not a money-making operation for any of us."

AIR FORCE ROTC

Gateway to a great way of life.

When you're discussing something as important as your future, it's urgent that you get the straight facts . . . and that you understand them. Air Force ROTC can be an important part of your future. We would like to outline some of the facts and invite you to look into gathering more.

It's a fact: the Air Force needs highly-qualified, dedicated officers . . . men and women. It's a fact: we need people in all kinds of educational disciplines. It's a fact: we're prepared to offer financial help to those who can qualify for an Air Force ROTC scholarship.

Get together with an AFROTC representative and discuss the program. We'll give you all the facts. It could be one of the most important talks you've ever had with anyone about your educational plans.

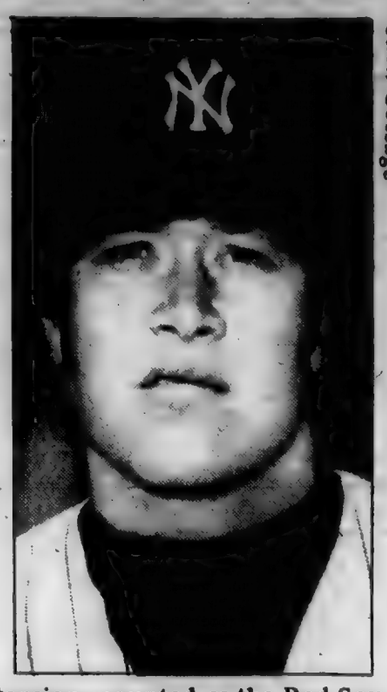
Yanks Now Battling Kansas City in Playoffs

Piniella & Dent Combine to End Sox Season

By Rob Smith

"The game is never over until the final out is made." So true. Just ask Carl Yastrzemski, Rich Gossage or any other fan who witnessed Monday's masterpiece American League tie breaker, in which the Yankees were able to thwart a ninth inning Red Sox rally and win the American League's Eastern Division by a score of 5-4. In a game where both teams exhibited timely hitting, clutch pitching and solid defensive play, the Yankee pitching combination of Guidry and Gossage, along with a three-run homer by Bucky Dent and a solo blast by Reggie Jackson proved to be just a bit too much for Boston who came within 90 ft. of tying the game in the ninth inning.

Rick Burleson



Carl Yaztremski

In the bottom of the ninth, with the Yankees leading by a run, the Red Sox staged what was to be their final threat of the season. With one out, and Rick Burleson on first base via a base on balls, Jerry Remy, the speedy second baseman who played his high school ball in Fall River, Mo., lined a shot to rightfield, sending Burleson to second. So the stage was set – two on, one out, and the AL's premier power hitter, Jim Rice, was at bat. Rice, desperately trying to end the Yankees' season with one swing, lifted a deep, high blast to rightfield, but it was to no avail, as Yankee rightfielder Lou Piniella perched himself under the ball with ease and made the catch. Burleson advanced to third base on the play, and it was now up to Captain Carl Yastrzemski. Yaz, who had homered in the second inning and scored the fourth Boston run in the eighth, tried to go to the opposite field with a Gossage fastball, but his efforts resulted in a short pop-up to Craig Nettles who put the lock and key on the Yankees' third consecutive American League Eastern Division pennant.

This Yankee–Red Sox pennant showdown, the first special playoff game since 1948 when the Red Sox lost to Cleveland, was actually two separate contests. For the first five innings, New York's super left-handed Ron Guidry and Boston's Mike Torrez battled each other in a tense pitching dual. Guidry had allowed just three hits (one of them a Yaz home run) and Torrez only two, as the score read Boston 1 – New York 0 going into the sixth.

After the Red Sox had scored to make it 2-0 in the sixth, however, the game suddenly changed tempo as the hitters came alive. In the top of the seventh, the Yankees exploded for four hits and four runs, the key hit being a three run blast by shortstop Bucky Dent. And in the eighth, baseball's premier showman and money ballplayer, Reggie Jackson, lined a shot into the centerfield bleachers to make it 5-2 Yankees. Just as it appeared the Sox were fading, Remy, Yaz, Fisk and Lynn registered base hits to close the score to 5-4 Yankees. The tension mounted as the Red Sox had runners on first and third in the ninth, but the Yankees' superior reliever Rich Gossage set down the last two Boston batters to seal the Yankee victory.

Rich Gossage

Craig Nettles

Once again the Red Sox are forced to play the role of second best in the AL East. One month ago no one would have dreamed that anyone could catch the Red Sox, but the Yankees proved as always that if they are even close to the top when September arrives, then they'll be in the money.

Two Yankee players who do not usually share the limelight, but who played heroic roles Monday were Bucky Dent and Lou Piniella. Dent, who played a solid shortstop all year for the Yankees, hit a key, three-run "Fenway flyball" homer to swing the momentum back to Yankees when the Red Sox were up 2-0. Piniella made a key play in the Red Sox half of the ninth, when after losing a Remy line drive in the sun, he desperately stabbed after the bounding ball and prevented Remy from getting extra bases, and more importantly, kept Burleson from scoring the tying run. If Remy's hit had eluded Piniella, Remy conceivably would have had a triple and Jim Rice's deep fly to right would have easily scored Remy and all of Beantown would be dancing in the streets tonight. However, Piniella stayed

Carl Christensen: Making The Difficult Rise to Pro Soccer

By Hart Van Denburg

Even though the promoters of soccer like to describe one of America's fastest growing spectator sports as "just a kick in the grass," soccer has blossomed into a career for former University of Vermont soccer all-star Carl Christensen.

Unlike most European players whose childhood dream is to play for their local club, Christensen's initial contact with soccer came when his junior high school didn't offer football on its athletic program. As an alternative Christensen took to soccer and stayed with it although it proved difficult at times especially when, as he recalls it "...all my friends would make fun of me because they were all going off to baseball practice while I went off to soccer." Christensen also added "...that although I was just as physically strong as they were, I had no urge to play baseball, and besides I liked soccer better."

"Carl has great mental and physical strength under pressure"
- Vermont Soccer Coach Paul Reinhardt

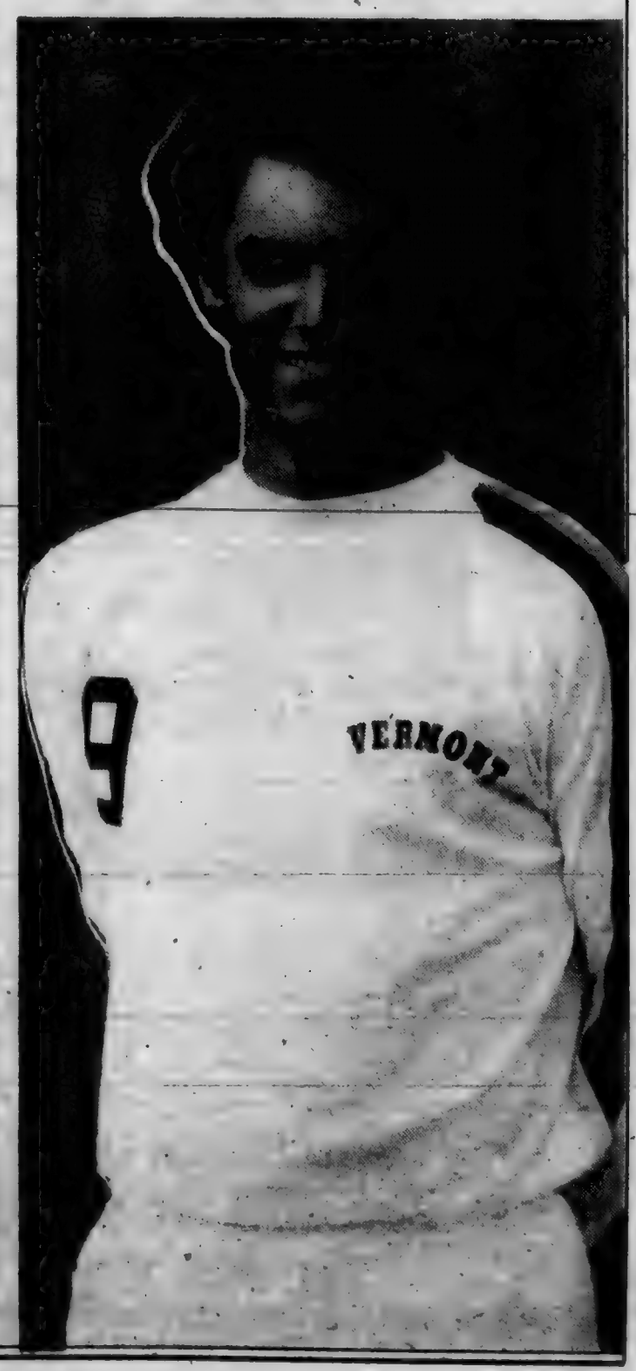
In High School he worked his way to the varsity team despite a brief spell in football. Peacetime warfare didn't appeal to Christensen though after seeing how his father, Charles Christensen, UVM's director of physical education, had had his knees permanently injured while playing football for the University of Connecticut. Christensen made a point that "there was no pressure" from his father to make him drop football, but then again he didn't need a lot to convince him to give it up. After all, soccer was his first love.

Christensen possessed so much soccer talent that when he arrived at UVM in 1974 he was put on the varsity squad immediately. Success was not long in waiting either; in his freshman year Christensen was selected as an All New England full back, a title which he retained during all four years at UVM. His final honor was to be nominated as an All American fullback in his senior year.



Coach Paul Reinhardt, head of soccer at UVM, spoke of Christensen's "...greatest assets being his prowess for the game, and his great mental and physical strength under pressure." He went on to add that Christensen's game "is still a very physical one."

After graduation Christensen "thought that maybe I should just go back to school, but then I realized that soccer was what I really wanted to do, and so I started to write letters and make phone calls to everybody, asking if I could have a tryout." Christensen had figured that since he was doing all this paperwork in January that he would have plenty of time for tryouts before the season started in April. This, however, was not the case, as he got a letter back from Dallas asking him to come to a free agent camp in the beginning of February. That gave Christensen and Geoff Greig, who was also invited to the camp, just four days to decide whether or not they would go.

Greig had no hesitation at all about going, but Christensen at first said no. He couldn't get the money together at such short notice. However, after talking it over with his father he changed his mind. "We figured that I had enough money for another semester, and it was either use it for school or use the money to take my chance. I felt that the chance was worth taking, and that weekend Geoff and I left for Dallas." It turned out to be a wise decision.

The Dallas Tornado coach had organized the free agent camp, and there were 100 candidates present for two weeks of intensive drilling. At the end of it Dallas head coach Miller invited just three players to the Tornado pre-season training camp, and Christensen with teammate Greig were two of them. "One day at the end of practice Coach Miller just came up to me and told me to be at the Cotton Bowl next week for a physical. It didn't really sink in to me though. I did phone home though to say that I would not be coming home all summer!" Although Coach Miller had signed him on he did so with the understanding that Christensen would not be getting a lot of game time, but it

Pennant Time Turns Burlington Into a Torn City

By Nick Witte

In Burlington, the only race that mattered was the American League East, more specifically, the Boston Red Sox vs. the New York Yankees. Favoritism grew stronger and those who took little interest in baseball all summer suddenly had to know if their team was winning. Tension-filled broadcasts filtered out of open dormitory rooms into the hallway; pedestrians huddled over cars with radios blaring, fearing how the next pitch could effect the outcome of the race. Discussion of the subject in a barroom ranged from heated argument to heated argument. It was friendly war that lasted the entire season. As the teams surged or slumped, the quality of play reflected on their fans. Followers euphorically rode the crest when their team was winning. But as we have seen in the last month of the season, the tide can easily shift.

Burlington's location, plus the addition of UVM, puts it in a strange position emotionally at this time of year. The city is, of course, in New England, so it has natural ties to the Red Sox. A local television station realizes this and it carries a program of Sox games. But as we stand in Burlington, across the lake is real Yankee territory and its strong influence is felt here. Cable television enables many to tune in games from New York City. With many out-of-staters at UVM from New Jersey and New York, the Yankee camp is further strengthened. The situation has gotten so that when the race for the division championship is over, half of Burlington is ecstatic, the other half miserable. Everyone will have just cause to either celebrate or commiserate. A saloon-keeper's idea of heaven.

Many shops and restaurants in Burlington get involved in the New York-Boston rivalry. A favorite diner is a Yankee stronghold, while around the corner in a certain store, no bad words are said about the Red Sox. One local supermarket is subject for treason as they change ships in midstream. It seems a company that makes meat products tried to capitalize on the shifting face of the American League by switching in September from their Red Sox-oriented goods to those that will appeal to New York fans. The market obviously felt that they could not afford to back a losing effort. I was surprised to discover this since I have yet to see any Yankee followers jump ship or a Boston fanatic who wouldn't love to throw darts at Thurmon Munson's picture. It seems that baseball favoritism is a permanent thing.

About this time, the situation in the dormitories gets interesting. Students advertise their sentiments by taping windows to convey messages. Since, for the most part, the halls are homogeneous, there are mixed emotions, sometimes between roommates. One dorm room had "Go Yanks" taped on one side of the window and "Boston No. 1" on the other side.

But it's all over now. Boston turned to the man who had been the hero so many times in his magnificent career. Carl Yastrzemski didn't choke; that word is alien to him. He thrives on pressure but by the ninth inning of Monday's playoff game, the well had run dry. Yaz, the Red Sox, and their fans face a long winter. The players will head south to spend the cold months trying to forget what has taken place during the last month, but what will happen to their fans? Most likely they will take extreme verbal abuse from Yankee fans as the New Yorkers take another World Series.

It's funny how there seemed to be few Yankee fans in Burlington during the two week Red Sox surge towards Monday's game. After the Yanks won the playoff game, however, they overtook the city. These fair-weather fans suddenly sprung up everywhere to bask in the post-season sunshine. Their desire to win is totally understandable but there's a fact that few Yankee fans seem to realize. The last time the Red Sox won the World Series, their ace pitcher was Babe Ruth and the year 1910. Boston fans suffer enough without hearing any flack from spoiled Yankee followers.

Though the season is over for Yaz, Rice and Lynn worshippers, they will take interest in the playoffs and Series. These noble fans will root for the Yankees since they beat the Red Sox and therefore should win it all. But most Red Sox fans will be pulling for three teams: the Kansas City Royals, the Los Angeles Dodgers and even the Philadelphia Phillies.

Carl Christensen

was still the break that he needed.

Christensen took all the instant success in stride to begin with, and it wasn't until the next week at the Cotton Bowl that things really began to sink in. "We were in the locker room with all the team members. They knew what we were here for, and we felt a little self-conscious, but that didn't bother us too much. It wasn't until Kyle Rote walked in that I suddenly thought... what the hell am I doing here?" That question became a little more obvious when, after more than half the season, he still wasn't getting any first team experience. Indeed, he spent most of his time playing for the reserve team, trying to keep in shape hoping that a new break would come.

In July the break came. Terry Fischer, coach of the San Jose Earthquakes, was looking to "Americanise" his team. The problem that had faced Christensen at Dallas was that because there were many European players on the team it was tough to prove yourself. The Europeans, who are generally more experienced and skillful than the Americans, tended to steal the show. Christensen went to California to talk it over. He didn't stay very long though. He had performed well in his tryout and impressed Fischer, but the head coach told him that he would travel a lot and not play a great deal. Christensen had heard that before and so he decided to return to Dallas to finish the season.

Soon thereafter Christensen and some teammates were in an Adidas warehouse outside Dallas when, as Christensen recalls, "This guy came up to me and said there was a phone call for me. I couldn't believe that someone had been able to find me all the way out there, and I wondered what it was all about." The call turned out to be from Dallas coach Miller informing Christensen that there was a possible deal on to trade him to San Jose, where it was promised that he would play in every game for the rest of the season.

That was just what Christensen had been hoping for. At last he had the opportunity to play on the "A" team for someone and his days of playing on the reserves had ended. It didn't take him long to have his few possessions packed and moved to San Jose where he played every game left in the season.

His first game could not have been a worse introduction to California. Detroit destroyed the Earthquakes 10-0. But Christensen was not taken aback by the score. "Despite the fact that we lost heavily, I felt that I played my best. I had to mark Trevor Francis, an import from England, and despite the fact that he took me through the washing machine, the coach was happy with my performance."

Christensen will be returning to the Earthquakes this season but is quick to add that he "will have to work hard to retain his place on the team." He enjoys playing in California a great deal too. "It's given me a good chance to travel a lot, and living on my own has been a great experience." His final words probably sum up how he has succeeded in ascending the ranks to his present position. "I want to keep on learning more about the game, and I want to keep on improving."

BU Battle Ends in 0-0 Tie in OT

By Hart Van Derburg

A determined University of Vermont soccer offense fought off the dominating Boston University Terriers for a scoreless tie in overtime on the astro-turf surface at Nickerson Field in Boston last Friday night.

The Terriers were in command for much of regular time play while UVM had trouble adjusting to the unfamiliar speed of the astro-turf, making ball control very difficult. The Boston attack, used to this playing surface and spearheaded by Yankee Conference leading scorer Mike Polger, pulled off 34 shots at the Cats' goal, while 15 shots were all that UVM could muster.

The UVM defense worked hard with co-captain David Allen and Danny Bryant holding the backs together, and goal tender Bart Farley keeping out the BU shots, including three difficult shots from Charles Green, Ralph Busco, and David Hill. Danny Bryant stopped the most threatening Terrier attempt when Polger fired a shot with Farley out of position. Bryant was able to deflect the ball away from the goal and defy Boston of a goal.

Vermont came closer to scoring as the regular time came near its end. The Cats began to gain more control of the ball and their best chance came from a cross by Brian Fleming to Zareh Avakian. Avakian connected with the ball but it hit the cross bar instead of going in the net.

As the game went into the second overtime period Fleming himself found a chance to score in front of the goal, but his shot flew over the crossbar for a goal kick. That was the last chance before the final whistle blew.

It was the second time in three outings that the Catamounts were unable to score. Vermont has been marked by a dominating offense but the inability to punch across the goal line has been a trait in Catamount soccer that goes back into the '77 season. Boston, on the other hand, used its strong offense to take potshots at the Vermont defense which had to scratch and dig to stay in the game.

Vermont coach Paul Reinhardt later remarked "Both teams had to fight for a tie. I was pleased with our work and our defense but we didn't stick with our game plan of passing the ball around. We were uncertain and playing too much one on one instead of as a team."

Vermont now holds a 1-1-1 record and after confronting Middlebury on Wednesday, the Cats meet Massachusetts on Saturday at Centennial field at 1 p.m.

Vermont Golf Squad Places Second in Toski Invitational

By Steven Larose

Ted Olsen continued to lead the University of Vermont golf team as he captured the runner-up medalist spot and led Vermont to a second place finish in the UConn hosted Toski Invitational last Sunday and Monday in Amherst, Mass.

Olsen had a two-day score of 72 and 79 while Vermont totaled 629 to UConn's winning score of 624. Vermont tied for second with a tough Southern Connecticut team which had just returned from a first place finish at the New England Intercollegiate tournament last week.

Earlier in the week, Vermont placed ninth in the New England tournament after holding the No. 2 spot after the first day of competition.

Vermont's other top performances came from Steve Pcolar with a 82-74 combination and Tim O'Connell with a 82-80 score. Hank Battles chalked up a 80-87 combination and Kim Guster racked up a 87-81 combination.

Vermont coach Ed Donnelly later remarked, "This was one of the top tourneys with all the top teams from New England competing. It was a good finish for us, which I attribute to the desire of the youngsters to do well. The team members have improved their individual golfing abilities."

The Catamount golfers were forced to compete without the services of their number three and four golfers, Mike Dukette and Pete Kelly. Donnelly stated that it was remarkable Vermont could do so well without the duo that he expects will be key factors in future games and seasons.

"We received fine leadership from Ted Olsen, our co-captain. He is a real trendsetter for the rest of the team and is truly inspirational to his teammates," remarked Donnelly. Olsen has proved himself by taking medalist honors in most of this year's contests, Donnelly pointed out.

Vermont now goes to the ECAC qualifying rounds this Friday and then hosts the J.C. Goss Invitational State Championships on Wednesday, Oct. 11 at the Burlington Country Club.

Williams Deflates UVM Volleyball; Comes Away With 2-1 Victory

By Molly McRoberts

The University of Vermont women's volleyball team used a new attack system, but Williams was able to pounce on the Catamounts and grab a 2-1 victory in the three game battle last Saturday at Williams College. Earlier Vermont received a forfeit victory when Greenfield Community College was unable to field a team.

Coach Cathy Schiller defined the early season games as a learning period for the young team. "I expect to lose a lot until we're past mid-season, because we're instituting a completely new, complicated system, which nobody on our team has ever played before. Instead of a 4-2 positioning, we are experimenting with a 6-2 multiple attack system," Schiller remarked.

Co-captain Connie Rockefeller made several diving saves and scored points with her powerful serving ability against Williams. Vermont snuck past Williams to win the first game 16-14, only to lose 15-3, and 15-11 in the second and third games. Vermont center Chris Bua performed well in her position, yet Coach Schiller noted difficulties with the new system. "They're executing well on the attack, but the transition phases, moving from defense to offense, and vice-versa, are awkward at this stage. It takes time to smooth out the wrinkles, but as long as we don't get discouraged, the new system will prove to be more effective." Schiller pointed out that she is working with a young team, 6 freshmen and no seniors, so that the new system can be learned, practiced, and carried over to next year.

UVM will challenge Clarkson and Potsdam State at Clarkson this Wednesday before returning to meet Maine and Massachusetts Bay Community College on Saturday, Oct. 7 at 2 p.m. in the Patrick Gym.

Catamounts Crush Castleton 5-1

By Molly McRoberts

The University of Vermont women's soccer team's left wing Tori Ryder stunned Castleton State College early in the second half by scoring the first of five goals for UVM as the Cats bounced back to win 5-1 after being downed 1-0 at the halfway mark of Monday's contest.

Vermont failed to score on two penalty kicks during the first half, when Castleton took advantage of a UVM defensive gap and scored their only point. Goalie Anne Bartlett, playing her second game of the season, prevented Castleton from scoring again by clearing the ball from UVM territory several times.

The Cats took over early in the second half when Meme Jacobs and Debby O'Connor each made attempts on goal. Ryder's goal bounced in off of the goalie's legs, tying the game 1-1. Vermont's offense attacked the stunned Castleton goalie as O'Connor assisted by Ryder scored three minutes after the initial breakthrough. Stacey Taylor dazzled the Castleton defense and boomed a long high shot for UVM's third goal, followed by Ryder's near goal on a header. A solid pass by Ryder to O'Connor allowed Vermont to continue the rally and put the icing on the cake when she scored with an assist by fast-moving Hilary Engisch. Taylor attempted a sixth goal for UVM which missed the mark.

Vermont's victory boosts them to a 4-1-1 overall record, and they visit Massachusetts this Saturday to play their seventh game of the season.

Peabody Spurs Vermont Field Hockey To 3-1 Win Over Middlebury

By Steven Larose

Linda Peabody punched through Middlebury's defense for two goals late in the first half leading the University of Vermont women's field hockey team to a 3-1 win Tuesday afternoon.

Peabody scored at 22:30 of the first period on an assist by Lisa Cleverdon. Peabody zeroed in on the Middlebury goal again at the 29:30 mark off a feed from Lisa Fernandez. Libby Sharp put the cap on the victory with a solo attempt near the end of the first half. Middlebury scored first by catching Vermont's defense out of position, but afterwards Vermont formed an iron-clad defensive line.

Catamount coach Janice Lange later remarked, "Middlebury was the best team we've played so far. They are really fast and didn't allow us much time to maneuver. Our attack line played well but our defense was caught off guard in the early going."

"Lisa Fernandez, our center halfback, played well, as did all our attacking line, despite Middlebury's being our toughest opponent to date. Forwards Linda Peabody and Amy Perkins stood out," remarked Lange.

"On defense Sherry Aquirre made a lot of intercepts," Lange concluded.

Vermont has a 5-0-2 record on the year.

Champlain Edges Vermont Women's Soccer Squad

By Molly McRoberts

Debby O'Connor's first period goal was not enough to save Vermont's women's soccer team from losing their first game of the season, 2-1, to Champlain Regional College Sunday in Quebec.

Despite problems with defense in the midfield position, UVM dominated the ball during the first half, according to Coach Mary Ellen Rathbone. Goalie Anne Bartlett overcame previous injuries to play in her first game of the season making 16 saves for the Cats.

Vermont was handicapped by lack of depth which was caused by the absence of four UVM players. Unable to call upon her bench, Coach Rathbone was hindered in her efforts to substitute effectively.

The Canadian women matched O'Connor's score, tying the game 1-1 before the end of the first half. During the first few minutes of the second half, Champlain scored again due to gaps in UVM's defense. The Cats failed to score on a penalty kick which hit the crossbar of the goal.

Burlington Woodchucks Squeak Past UVM Rugby

By Dale Gates

The Burlington Woodchucks, local rugby team, upset the University of Vermont 6-0 in a hard fought defensive match at Archie Post Field last Saturday.

The only score of the game came early in the second half when the Burlington team broke the deadlock with a single goal to post their 6-0 victory.

Windy conditions hindered the offensive attacks of both teams resulting in a defensive battle. UVM had several scoring opportunities in the first half, but mistakes and penalties prevented the Cats from putting the ball over the goal line.

The older, but more experienced Burlington team continuously interrupted the UVM running attack and took advantage of many UVM mistakes to stop UVM's momentum.

UVM coach Nante Meyer later remarked, "We made too many mistakes, our scoring drives were continuously stopped by penalties, we just weren't thinking enough to capitalize on our breaks."

Vermont's B Team defeated St. Michael's 12-0. This Saturday UVM travels to Norwich University.

All-Campus "Run for Fun" Set

On Friday October 13th, the first annual "Run for Fun" to support UVM intramurals will be held. This run will cover a major portion of the campus in a 3.3 mile road race. All proceeds will go to the financially stricken UVM intramural program.

This week, information teams from Sigma Nu fraternity (who is sponsoring the race) will go out to speak to the R.A.s on campus to explain the details of the run. A runner who wishes to participate needs a minimum of a dollar sponsorship fee and will ideally be willing to help raise more.

Meetings have been going on for several weeks between the Student Activities office, the Dean of Students and Sigma Nu. The plans have been extensive and many hours have gone into the planning of this campus race.

Tickets for this event are available in the Student Activities office and at Sigma Nu. Get out now and support your university Intramural program – the 13th could be everyone's lucky day!!

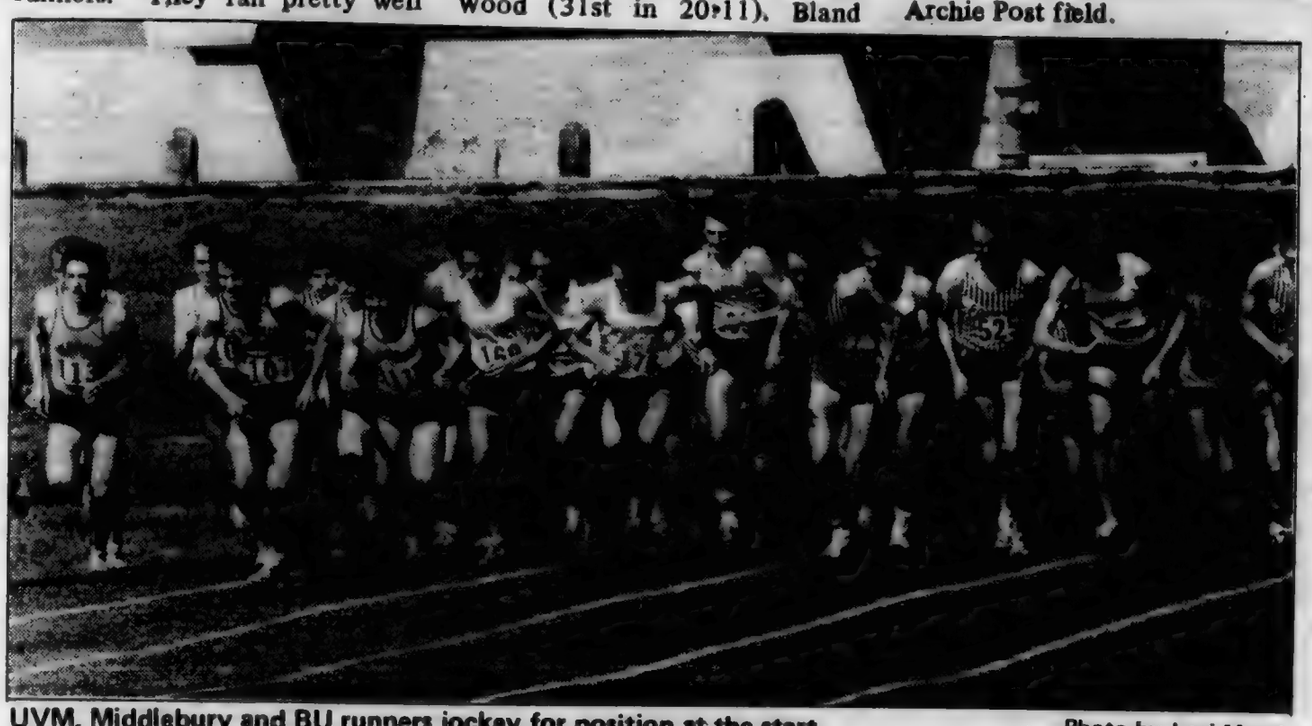
Catamount Cross Country Women Grab Second in UConn Tourney

By Tom Phillips



Hamstrung by the absence of a top runner, the University of Vermont's women's cross-country team still managed a respectable second place showing in last Saturday's UConn hosted invitational tournament. Rutgers was victorious with 62 points to Vermont's 73.

Coach Bland explained, "We were running without Judi (St. Hilaire). She has been one of our top two runners and would probably have placed in the top ten, based on where our other runners finished. This means that we could very well have made up the eleven point deficit on Rutgers and won the team title." St. Hilaire's having made a prior commitment in place of the Invitational accounted for her absence.

Still, Bland was pleased with the efforts of the attending runners. "They ran pretty well and I was proud of them." Perhaps Bland's contentment extended from his having looked at the team placings behind his squad's second spot. The Cats defeated eight of the ten teams entered in the meet, including St. John's of New York and Yankee Conference competitors UMass, UConn and Rhode Island. The victory over UConn avenges the loss UConn handed Vermont in an earlier meet.

The individual performances for UVM were highlighted by the trio of runners who tucked themselves neatly into sixth, seventh, and eighth places – Donna Raymond (19:00), Amy Bouchard (19:01), and Anne Schiavone (19:03), respectively. According to Bland, "It is always very important to get good bunching up in front and here we had it." The first three Cats were followed in the UVM order by scorers Robin Snyder (21st in 19:49) and Kristin Wood (31st in 20:11). Bland said, "They both ran well, but now we'll try to bring them closer timewise to the other girls."

The women look forward now to the October 7th home-opener against Dartmouth and Williams Colleges. Dartmouth, defeated once this season by UVM, should not pose a threat to either UVM or Williams. Williams, though also beaten by the Cats in the Williams Invitational, should challenge Vermont for top spot. Bland reports, "They're coming off a strong race against Middlebury College where they finished a close second to Middlebury. Also, when we beat Williams, it was in a large invitational field. Things are a little tougher in a dual meet when you don't have all the other teams' runners filling in the gaps between you and Williams." The Williams meet is slated to get underway on Saturday at 2:00 p.m. on the Archie Post field.

Runningmen Outpace BU and Middlebury

By Tom Phillips

After being handily defeated by Keene State last Tuesday, the University of Vermont cross-country men regrouped and responded with a pair of triumphs over Boston University and Middlebury last Saturday.

The Sept. 26 loss to Keene, 15-47, was devastating as Keene grabbed all but three of the top ten positions. Kevin Martell, Dave Elliot, and John Foster, placing seventh through ninth, respectively, were the only Catamounts who dared to break the Keene queue of runners. Vermont coach Bill Nedde described the finish in a dissatisfied tone, "Even though Keene ran some pretty good times here, we ran rather poorly. There's no reason why we should have lost the way we did. We knew Keene was strong, but they definitely were not strong enough to have swept us like they did."

Showing his experience, Nedde immediately added, "The only thing we can do is reaffirm ourselves against BU and Middlebury on Saturday. I think we should look a little sharper, then."

Fortunately, Nedde's words did not come back to haunt him. The Cats, having pride to defend, did indeed reaffirm themselves by outlegging BU and Middlebury, 31-35-62. Mike Myers, who chased the winning BU tandem of John Wilson and Mark Kimball around the five-mile course before finishing third, led the Vermont charge. He was followed by Catamounts Mike Landman (4th), Tom Beatini (6th), Tony Bates (7th), Randy Sightler (11th), and Carl Scott (12th).

Elated with the results, Nedde said, "This was a beautiful race. Most everyone lowered his time and that was what we needed to beat BU. They've been impressive so far this year, so this loss to UVM must be kind of a shocker for them."

Nedde then commented on the inspirational effect this surprise victory may supply for the remaining meets. "This has got to help. We lost to Keene badly, but we got right back up because we want to win. Now that we're starting to see what we can do, we're even hungrier. We've got some tough meets coming up, though."

One of the "touch meets" Nedde refers to will take place on Saturday when the Cats travel to the University of Maine at Orono. Maine, traditionally a power-laden squad, has one of the best teams it has fielded in several seasons. However, they have been hampered by injuries that just might prove helpful to the UVM cause.

The Cats will be on the road after the UMaine meet and will not compete at home until October 21. On that day, UVM is hosting the Yankee Conference Championships.

Redsox vs Yankees

with the ball and made the clutch play when it was needed most.

For the Red Sox, Monday's bitter loss ended a streak which saw them come from four games back on September 17th to a first place berth on October 1st, thanks to a little help from the Cleveland Indians and their pitcher Rick Waites, who stopped the Yanks on the last day of the season. For the Yanks, Monday's victory was a fitting climax to a season in which they lost a manager, most of their pitching staff during May and June and the striking New York press corps.

One final point must be made concerning this most memorable game. Although the Red Sox must realize the unfortunate consequences of being number two, it is only fitting that the two teams with the best records in baseball in '78 gave us probably the most exciting baseball game since the famous sixth game of the 75 Red Sox – Cincinnati World Series. The Red Sox can be proud of these facts, although it is all too true that pride alone doesn't always bring world championships.

One thing is for sure though. After Monday's excitement, the KC–Yankee playoffs and the World Series will most likely be anticlimatic. The Sox's and Yankees played 163 games and brought the season down to the final out. A better pennant race the world has never seen.

Becky Rich & Kathy Stanton
Doubles Team Strives for Success

By Randy Briggs

Teamwork in any sport is crucial to eventual success. The combination of individual skills meshed into a cohesive group is what makes sport so exciting. For Kathy Stanton and Becky Rich, co-captains of the UVM women's tennis team, it is teamwork that has carried them to success.

Rich and Stanton have played doubles together for four years and have come to adjust to each other's style of play. "The key to our success has been our ability to pull each other out of trouble," said Rich. While Stanton exhibits a strong, aggressive net game and solid backhand, Rich unveils a consistent forehand. This strong combination makes them a very formidable duo.

Both women have had very experienced tennis backgrounds. Stanton attended Miss Porter School in Farmington, Conn. She played tennis in her junior and senior years there, and her team experienced an undefeated season in the process.

Rich did not play high school tennis, although she was one of the top players in her county. Coming from Annapolis, Maryland she competed on the number one mixed doubles team in the county. She also reached the quarterfinals of the state mixed doubles tournament.

With such solid tennis backgrounds it is easy to see why Rich and Stanton have become a successful doubles team. Their coming together as partners was by pure chance.

Becky Rich Kathy Stanton

"I wanted to play doubles and so did Becky. The coach just put us together and we went from there," Stanton commented.

Early in their college careers Rich and Stanton enjoyed immediate success. As sophomores they compiled an 8-1 record. Using that fine mark as a springboard they went all the way to the quarterfinals of the New England Intercollegiate Tournament for women.

In their junior year they struggled to a 4-3 record. "We were losing to teams we know we should have beaten," said Stanton. "It was a very frustrating year for us," she added. This year the duo holds a 2-1 record as a team, but they are more confident than ever before. "As a unit we are stronger than we have ever been," said Rich.

Obviously the play of this doubles combination has made life much more pleasant for coach Marilyn Chase. "They are both very capable players. They both have excellent serves and net games and have a lot of mutual respect for each other. Having confidence in each other is very important," she concluded.

With physical ability and coordination being the key to excellent tennis, there has to be a mental side of the sport that makes a big difference. Rich and Stanton both agree that concentration is the most important factor of successful tennis. The pair pointed out that mind has to be focused on the task at hand.

The lack of quality tennis facilities has been a thorn in the side of the women's program. "The shortage of funds has hurt the team tremendously," said Rich. "Obviously the lack of courts and having only two ball machines to share among the men's team and the Phys. Ed. classes has hurt our progress," she added. "Things are better this year," commented Stanton. "The courts have been painted. On the other hand, the lighting is poor and lights often go out during a match. Better quality players would come here if the facilities were improved."

Both girls are confident that this year's team is the best they have played on. "This team has more depth than we had in previous years. We're 5-0 at this point," Stanton remarked. Rich voiced similar thoughts, "In both singles and doubles we are strong throughout. It is a very good team."

Both girls want to redeem themselves for the poor showing last year. "We wanted an undefeated record, but that's out the window. I hope that we do well in the New Englands," Stanton commented.

"I want us to play our very best and make up for last year's showing," commented Rich. "I feel like we let people down with our performance. I'm the co-captain so I feel like I have to win."

With a strong Dartmouth team hovering on the horizon ready to challenge Vermont, the leadership and consistent play of Kathy Stanton and Becky Rich should continue to be the glue that holds the Vermont women's tennis team together.

Redskins Stifle Cowboy Offense

By Rich Chalmers

A fired-up 4-0 Washington Redskin team toppled the defending NFL champion Dallas Cowboys 9-5 on Monday night in a game in which Washington's up-against-the-wall defensive stands proved to be the crucial factor.

A red hot crowd packed RFK stadium in Washington for a game which felt more like the playoffs than only the fifth game of the season. But then, it was the Redskins vs. the Cowboys and there are few rivalries in the NFL as hot as this one.

The Washington defense, newly revised since coach Jack Pardee took over this season, has been tougher than in many past seasons and it survived a number of crucial tests Monday against Dallas.

Using runningback John Riggins to his fullest, Washington opened the scoring early in the first period with a 52-yard field goal from Mark Mosely after a 21-yard run by Riggins brought the skins within range.

Although the Cowboys could move effectively between the 20 yard lines, once within close touchdown range they were unable to tally six points. In the most threatening Dallas drive of the first quarter, Roger Staubach led the Cowboys on a 12-play drive ending in a Tony Dorsett fumble on the Redskin nine yard line. Harold McLinton recovered for the Skins, ending Dallas' hopes of a 7-3 lead.

Washington held Dallas to nothing in the first Cowboy drive of the second quarter and then sustained a six-play drive ending in a 42-yard field goal.

"The Redskins can attribute the victory to a fired-up team backed by a defense which pulled through in the clutch."

Whereas Redskin quarterback Joe Theisman had an excellent game, Staubach was not his usual self, connecting for only five completions out of 14 passes in the first half.

The game-winning series began early in the third quarter as Dallas started a 16-play drive from its own 24 yard line. Having a total of seven plays within the Washington eight-yard-line and a first and goal on the two, Dallas was unable to penetrate the brick wall-like defensive effort from the Skins and had to settle for three points. A 19 yard field goal from Cowboy place-kicker Rafael Septien did much more than just add three points to the Dallas scoreboard. It proved the Redskins were unintimidated by last year's prowess of the Cowboys. It proved they could play Dallas' kind of ball game and still come out on top, and it proved that Washington, although far from a division title, will be a team to be reckoned with in the future.

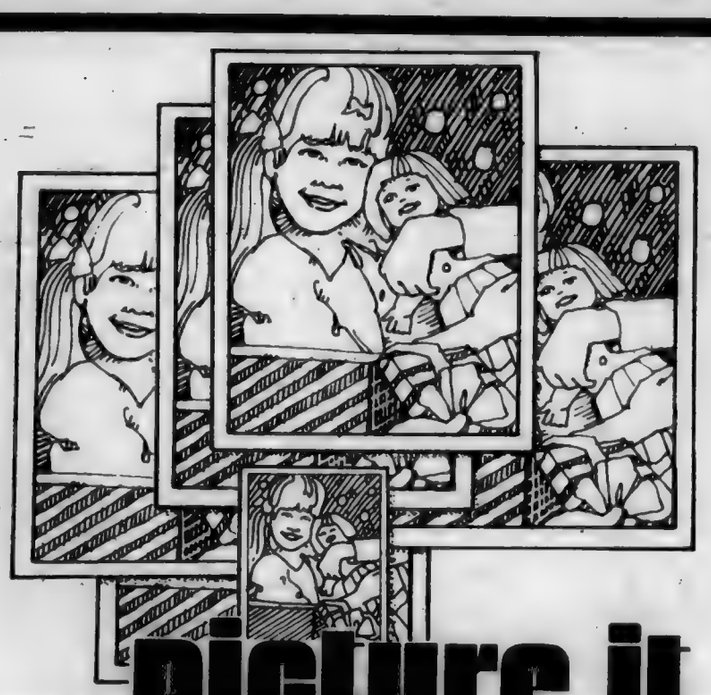
As if to put the icing on the cake the Redskins turned right around and ended an 11-play, five-minute drive with a 27 yard Mosely field goal to make it 9-3.

The first half of the fourth quarter contained a long and threatening drive by both teams, each ending in an end zone interception. Aaron Kyle ended the Redskin drive with an impressive diving end zone catch for a touchback. Washington's Ken Houston made the same play minutes later on the other end of the field, thus ending Dallas' march.

Time was running out for the NFL champs, and with only enough remaining for one long drive, Dallas began its surge. The Cowboys pushed from their own 28-yard-line to the Washington 10 in eight plays, but once again the Redskin defensive unit seemed to come alive and soon it was fourth down and twelve to go on the 17-yard-line. Since a field goal would do nothing, Staubach tried a difficult pass to Tony Hill in the end zone but came up empty handed. As if to add insult to injury, Theisman ran out of the endzone to give Dallas a safety just as the game ended.

The Redskins can attribute the victory to a fired-up team backed by a defense which pulled through in the clutch. Whereas Dallas running star Tony Dorsett was able to penetrate the Redskin defense for short gains, he could never get the damaging yardage that Dallas often enjoys. Redskin runningback John Riggins, on the other hand, was used often on the outside and in the open where his quickness and running skill became apparent.

The Redskins, 6-0 at home on Monday nights, will face Detroit this Saturday and Philadelphia again on the 15th. Dallas will battle the N.Y. Giants on Saturday and St. Louis the next weekend.



This is a new Washington ball club; the last time the Skins were 5-0 was in 1972. Jack Pardee's revisions have proven to be quite effective so far.

Morgan Tops Green in World Series of Golf

Gil Morgan scored a playoff victory Sunday in his first appearance in the World Series of Golf as he sank a two-putt par on the first play-off hole and claimed the $100,000 reward. Hubert Green, Morgan's only competitor in the playoff, bogeyed the hole and settled for second place. Green had tied Morgan with a dramatic 12-foot birdie putt on the 72 hole.

Second Secretariat Foal Loses

Terlinqua became the second Secretariat foal to be defeated in a week when she finished third behind 60-1 shot Golferette in the $100,000 Frizette at Belmont Park, Monday. On Sept. 27th, Secretariat's son, General Assembly was upset by Tim the Tiger in the $75,000 Cowdin Stakes at Belmont.

Crash Gives Reutemann Grand Prix

Argentinian Carlos Reutemann held on to first place to win the U.S. Grand Prix as former favorite Mario Andretti sustained a near deadly crash in a practice a few moments before the race. A bolt broke on one of his wheels while he was speeding at 170 miles an hour, throwing him off the track into the retaining fence causing a second wheel to fly off. "I hit so hard I thought I had stretched my neck about four feet," Andretti said after it was determined he was unhurt. He raced in a backup car but break problems ruined his bid.

Reutemann's margin of victory was 19.739 seconds over second place Alan Jones as the winner sped over the 200 miles of twisting track in 40 minutes, 48.8 seconds.

Texas Rangers Fire Hunter

The Texas Rangers made the sixth managerial change in two years Sunday as they fired manager Billy Hunter. Third base coach Pat Corrales was named his successor. Majority owner Brad Corbett commented, "The organization felt that a change was needed. I think Billy is an outstanding baseball man, but there are people in the organization besides me." Corbett had given Hunter a vote of confidence recently.

The Rangers, sporting a $2.5 million payroll (one of the highest in the major leagues) had problems most of the season as they fell behind American League Division Champion Kansas City and California. Executive Vice President Eddie Robinson explained the firing was due to "the performance of the club this year and the fact that we didn't want to go into next year with some doubt." Coralles was signed for a one-year contract.

Vermont Racketwomen Stop UMaine & Colby

By Rich Chalmers

Although missing three of its top players, the University of Vermont women's tennis team stretched its winning streak to 5-0 last weekend when the Catamounts defeated Colby 5-1-1 and UMaine 4-3.

Number one doubles player and co-captain Becky Rich was unable to attend the matches as were Jenny Hynson due to a twisted ankle and Carol Shukis because of a fractured wrist.

Pam Hensel, using her characteristic strong serve and aggressive play, soundly defeated Martha Oakes of Colby, 6-3, 6-0 on Friday. Carol Khachian sustained the only Vermont loss as Colby's Maureen Flint won 7-5, 6-3.

Palumbo tallied an impressive victory 6-0, 6-3. Beth Cleary's match against Colby's Pam Helgar was stopped due to lateness after the first two sets were split 6-4, 1-6. The number one doubles team of Kathy Stanton and Kathy Borda pulled out a close three-set contest over Amy Parker and Jodie Dwight of Colby 3-6, 7-6, 6-2. UVM's Jean Dunbar and Kathy Babbot also notched a win 7-6, 6-1 to make the final score 5-1-1. "Stanton and Borda made a good comeback," commented coach Marilyn Chase. "They turned the momentum around quite handily."

The women went on to tackle UMaine on Saturday but ran into stiffer competition, coming away with a slim 4-3 victory. Hensel's match this time was close and decisive. She won the first set 6-3 over UMaine's Kris Everett but Everett aced Vermont's leading singles player for the ninth point of a nine point tie-breaker 5-4 to take the second set 7-6. Everett then appeared to get tired as Hensel put on the pressure with hard serves and quick offensive net play to grab the third set easily 6-1.

Khachian was beaten by Pam Cobers of UMaine 6-0, 6-2 in the second singles spot. "Carol (Khachian) has been in a little slump this weekend," explained coach Chase. "She's been having some trouble with her confidence but she should be out of it soon."

Alicia Good played a strong match, defeating her opponent 6-2, 6-2 while UMaine claimed the last two singles spots 6-2, 7-5 and 5-7, 6-3 over Palumbo and Cleary.

The doubles teams shined forth for Vermont as Stanton and Borda claimed an extremely strong win in the first position 6-0, 6-1. Dunbar and Babbott also connected for a 6-2, 6-1 win to cap the Catamount victory.

UVM will now compete against Smith on Friday, Williams on Saturday and Middlebury on Monday. Referring to the upcoming action-packed weekend, coach Chase commented, "We know nothing about Smith, but if we play as well as we have been, we should take Williams and Middlebury."

Women's Ice Hockey

To those interested in playing women's ice hockey, there will be an organizational meeting at 6:30 October 12 at Billings' Marsh Lounge. Please bring a pen/pencil as there will be forms to fill out. If you can't attend, please contact Pamela 862-0895 or Sarah 656-4254.

Big Brother

AHH... To Be Young Again!

Did you ever fart during a test?

Did you ever have "kooties"?

Did no one bother to look for you when playing "hide and seek"?

Did you ever pick your nose and eat it... and someone SAW you?

Did you ever eat a PB&J in one bite... and live to tell about it?

Well here's your chance to relive those memorable moments through the eyes of an impressionable 8-12 year old. The Big Brother/Big Sister Program needs volunteers to spend a few hours a week with a child who needs your attention. Hey – you've been there before, how about helping someone who's there now?

Come to the Mansfield House, 25 Colchester Ave. or call 656-2062.

Relevant Workshops

The Counseling & Testing Center continues to interact with a large number of students each semester in classes, small groups, workshops and individual personal and education/vocational counseling. This semester we have chosen a few workshop topics which seem to us to be currently relevant to students. A flyer describing Workshops about to begin in October is circulating on campus now.

Briefly the topics are: EXPRESSING YOUR SEXUALITY – Tuesdays 3 – 5 p.m. beginning October 10. SELF APPRECIATION – Wednesdays 3:30 – 5 p.m. beginning October 11. COMFORTABLE ASSERTIVENESS – Fridays 3 – 5 p.m. October 13 and 20. TOTAL WELL BEING/A HOLISTIC APPROACH – Tuesdays 3:30 – 5 p.m. beginning October 17. HUMANIZING HEALTH CARE – Tuesday & Wednesday, October 24 & 25, 7 – 8:30 p.m. X-CULTURAL WORKSHOP – Wednesdays, October 18 & 25, 7 – 9 p.m. Fireside Lounge L/L. SUCCESS & PERSONAL POWER (2 separate workshops) Tuesday, October 24, 11:30 – 1 p.m. and Tuesday, October 31, 11:30 – 1 p.m.

Please call us at x3340 with questions about workshops. We will be glad to mail you a flyer. We welcome requests for other topics and will be happy to coordinate additional workshops for interested groups.

Women's Gymnastics

The Vermont Women's Gymnastic Judging Association will hold a judging clinic for all those interested beginning October 5, at 7 p.m. It will be held at the Ira Allen School. For further information call 863-4714.

Counseling Center

Agora Counseling Center of 182 Main St. in Burlington is offering a weekly group focusing on creative problem-solving through role-playing, starting on Tuesday, October 17, from 4:30 to 6:00 p.m. This will be an ongoing group.

Role-playing will be used to help group members experiment with acting different ways in current problem situations – for example, asking for what you want in a relationship, saying "no", or being assertive at work. We hope to have fun as well as to experience some of the power in even small changes in behavior.

The fee is $10 per group meeting and is negotiable for those who cannot afford it.

For registration and information, call Agora Counseling Center at 658-4336 on weekdays between 9:00 a.m. and noon. The group will be limited to 8 people. The meeting time is negotiable if inconvenient.

Leaders will be Robin Greene and Caroline Nickerson.

Art Club

A collective effort is needed to help re-initiate the UVM Art Club. In so doing, a first meeting has been arranged for Wednesday, October 11 at 4:00 p.m. in the Francis Colburn Gallery located on the third floor of the Williams Science Hall. All students are welcomed to attend and participate in this organizational meeting. The major topic for discussion will be to recognize interested students and promotional ideas for the club. If interested, but unable to attend, please call Mary at 862-4063.

Student Info. Projects Competition

The National Student Educational Fund is sponsoring, for the second year, the Better Information Project: Prizes in Education (BIPPIE), a national competition to encourage and recognize original student produced informational materials.

$500 awards will be given to each of the 12 best entries. Winners will then give their award money to the student organization or project of their choice.

Individual students and student organizations are eligible to enter the competition. All materials may be in any media and must be aimed at improving the information available to students concerning campus programs, opportunities and experiences, such as orientation handbooks or guides for women reentering college. Materials must have been produced during the 1977-78 or 1978-79 academic years.

Each of the 12 winners will win a trip to Washington, D.C. at which time the prize money will be awarded at a national Information Celebration.

Application packets are available from the National Student Educational Fund, 2000 P Street, NW, Suite 305, Washington, D.C. 20036.

The competition is supported by a grant from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education. To date, the Chronicle of Higher Education, the International Study Travel Center, and the Student Loan Marketing Association have also contributed to the project. The College Entrance Examination Board has donated funds toward the project's evaluation activities.

The competition is sponsored by the National Studeat Educational Fund, a national non-profit group engaged in research, information services and training activities from a student perspective.

Air Force Scholars

The Air Force has awarded five scholarships to students currently enrolled in Air Force ROTC at UVM. These scholarships cover all tuition, all fees, all books and it pays the student $100 a month for other expenses. These new awards are:

Kathy Neill, a freshman mathematics major. Ms. Neill won her scholarship as a high school senior in Honolulu and elected UVM from among 400 other schools offering AFROTC.

Janet Peppard, a junior nursing student. Ms. Peppard is from Laconia, NH.

Lucie Robillard, an electrical engineering major. She makes her home in Derby, VT.

Caroline Root, a junior nursing student from Weston, VT.

Wayne Stimpson, a junior mathematics major from Rockingham, NH.

R.N.

A continuing education conference for registered nurses on "Performance Evaluation" will be conducted by Dorothy delBueno, Nov. 1-2, at the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge and Conference Complex in White River Junction, VT.

The conference will be held from 8 a.m. – 4:30 p.m. Nov. 1, and 8:30 a.m. – 3:30 p.m., Nov. 2. Participants can elect to attend the first day only or both days. The registration fee is $32 for the first day and $54 for both days.

Pre-registration arrangements can be made with the Division of Continuing Education, Grasse Mount, UVM (802-656-2085), prior to Oct. 13.

UVM Adapts to the Needs of the Handicapped Student

"Today I am issuing a regulation, pursuant to Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, that will open a new world of equal opportunity for more than 35 million handicapped Americans – the blind, the deaf, persons confined to wheelchairs, the mentally ill or retarded, and those with other handicaps.

"The 504 Regulation attacks the discrimination, the demeaning practices and the injustices that have afflicted the nation's handicapped citizens. It reflects the recognition of the Congress that most handicapped persons can lead proud and productive lives, despite their disabilities. It will usher in a new era of equality for handicapped individuals in which unfair barriers to self-sufficiency and decent treatment will begin to fall before the force of law." (Statement by Joseph A. Califano, Jr., Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on April 28, 1977)

We must heighten their awareness.

By Mary Dixon

To comply with these federal provisions, the University of Vermont has begun to alleviate the plight of the handicapped student,

The university has embarked on a series of architectural improvement programs designed to meet the accessibility requirements set forth in Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

The Office of Architectural Barrier Control is responsible for many of the changes on campus with regard to meeting handicap requirements. Since its inception in 1972, the office has received in excess of $200,000 from the university and $270,000 from the state of Vermont.

Nancy Koch, handicap co-ordinator and counselor at UVM, said, "UVM is ahead of other campuses in terms of physical modifications." Ms. Koch noted such things as the installation of railings, ramps, and elevators in existing buildings, and said all new buildings constructed since 1971 feature lower drinking fountains, wider doors and hand rails in the bathrooms. In the Living/Learning Center, 28 rooms are accessible, in Harris-Millis there are eight, in Converse, 16, and in Redstone Hall four rooms are adapted for the handicapped person. In addition, 50 curb cuts were installed over the summer and a number of handicapped parking spaces have been designated as well.

Nevertheless, buildings such as Billings Center, Ira Allen Chapel, and Fleming Museum remain inaccessible to handicapped students. Brenda Carlstrom, a quadraplegic attending UVM, said, "I've never been to the student center." Marcie Ryan, a blind student, said most of the buildings around campus are not marked with braille or a raised map of any kind. She suggested a raised map of the building could be used by anybody wanting to find their way, and would make a good project for an architectural student.

Funding for physical projects such as elevators also becomes a problem. Ms. Carlstrom said the university wants to know how many people are going to use an elevator before they "spend two or three thousand dollars on it." Further, Ms. Ryan said people cannot use the tunnel elevator during the winter because it "freezes up," and even though an elevator exists in Harris-Millis, it is located in the cafeteria behind locked doors.

Although the university has made some curb cuts, Ms. Carlstrom said on the intersection of So. Prospect and Main Streets cuts exist on one side of the street but not on the other. "So consequently, those are really useless. What are you going to do, go out and pay in the street?"

In addition, Ms. Ryan said people park in handicapped spots without considering the fact that a real need and use does exist for them.

Another physical problem arises in the winter since no transportation service is offered by the university at this time. "The snow is a catastrophe. I'm transferring because of it," said Ms. Carlstrom.

Nancy Olliker, full-time handicapped co-ordinator and advisor, said with the expansion of their office they hoped to get a van, but until then, they would like a security van with a hydraulic lift installed. Presently, handicapped students must use the Chittenden County Transportation Authority at a cost of 75 cents one way, miss classes or use the streets.

Besides dealing with physical problems including transportation, the handicapped co-ordinator's office helps get students the services they need. For example, her office finds readers, notetakers and personal care attendants for handicapped students. In addition, they provide tape recorders, hospital beds, recorders, and interpreters for those who need them. They also provide personal counseling and support.

In an effort to avoid a duplication of services, the handicapped co-ordinator's

In State Tuition Increase To Depend on State Legislative Appropriation

By David C. Greeff

The University of Vermont Board of Trustees approved a resolution Saturday to request a 15.7% increase in the state legislative appropriation for Fiscal Year (FY) 1980 and a subsequent 13.4% hike in FY 81.

The appropriation, requested on a bi-annual basis, if approved would constitute 20% of a total proposed UVM operating budget of $77,600,000 in fiscal '80.

Whether or not the Legislature will grant the request is open to debate. Several observers have noted that because of insistent demands by the people to curtail government spending, that UVM may suffer accordingly.

In response to this, UVM President Lattie F. Coor stated, "In light of concern about total tax revenue, it is very difficult to predict. Nevertheless, we are confident that because there never has been such an articulately designed and supported request sent to them before, we will have the best possible chances for approval."

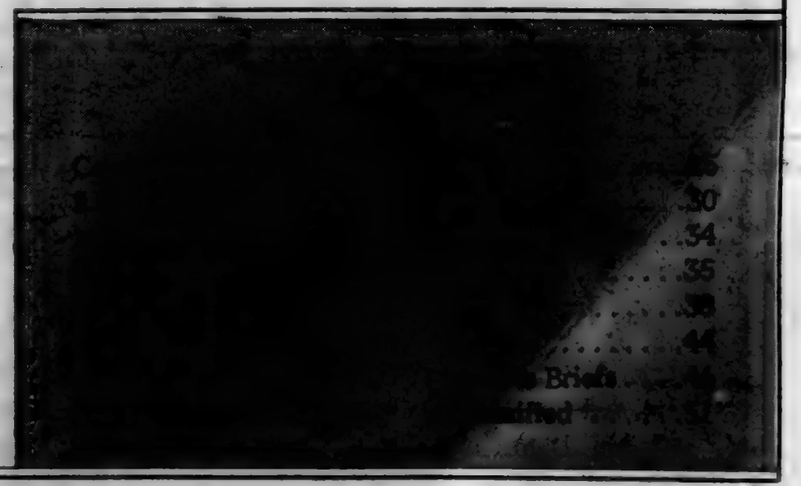
In a press briefing Thursday night before the Trustee meeting, Coor stated that UVM ranked 50th out of 50 in the percentage of operating dollars state universities receive from their home legislatures.

The administration proposed originally to ask for only a 1.9 million dollar increase because they believed requesting more than $2,000,000 was "unrealistic." The Board rejected this on the grounds that it wasn't the right "strategy." An appropriation of 1.9 million dollars would require the university to cut another 254,000 from its projected operating budget. "It would be very difficult, but if necessary, we believe it could be done," said President Coor.

The present budget proposal already plans to reduce the operating base by more than 2 million dollars in the next two years. The cuts were possible through elimination of unnecessary personnel, energy savings and generally tighter fiscal management, according to Coor.

Coor further stated that the level of in-state appropriation is linked directly with tuition costs for Vermont students. If the appropriation is not approved, tuition will increase proportionately. Resident tuition is already one of the highest in the country, and many feel that if it continues to rise, UVM will have difficulty remaining a Vermont-dominated institution.

While under the new budget proposal resident tuition would remain constant, out-of-state tuition would rise 10% or $375 in FY 80 and 8.7% or $385 in FY 81. The increases will put the actual yearly cost figures per student to $4,110 and $4,468 in FY 80 and 81 respectively.



UVM out-of-state tuition costs are the highest of any state university in the country.

Coor said there were three principle reasons for the increases: inflation; faculty pay raises; and mandated costs such as Social Security payments and improvements of facilities for the handicapped required by Federal legislation. He said that inflation and mandated costs had to be accounted for, and while faculty pay hikes were optional, they were imperative if the university wants to continue to attract quality educators.

Faculty purchasing power has fallen over 12% since 1972. Under the proposal, faculty salaries would rise, over the next five years, 2% a year beyond the normal cost of living increases, in an attempt to erase the past erosion.

The budget is based on a proposed consumer price index (CPI) rate of 6.5% next year. Concern was expressed at the meeting that this was a very low figure that if wrong would necessitate further increases later. In response to this, Coor stated: "Unfortunately a CPI rate higher than 6.5% would slow down the process of increasing faculty purchasing power. But we do not believe it would have a direct effect on tuition."

Administration Combines Positions and Hires New Personnel

By Sarah Bailey

Several changes have been made in the UVM administration including new faces and a change in the titles and responsibilities of some positions.

John McDonald has been appointed assistant to the president for human resources, replacing Delores Stocker and William Bright. McDonald, from the University of Ohio, will be involved in the Affirmative Action and the Equal Opportunity programs as well as with Student Center for Cultural Understanding. He was involved with similar programs in Ohio.

The position of assistant vice-president for research has been combined with that of the dean of the Graduate College. It is now held by Robert Lawson, professor of psychiatry. "We feel that the two are symbiotic," explained Robert Stanfield, from the office of the president.

Kenneth Fishell has become assistant vice-president of Academic Affairs. He will have particular concern for the outreach programs of the university throughout the state, including programs for educational television.

William Young, professor of anatomy, will be a part-time assistant vice-president of

Dr. Kenneth Fishell

Academic Affairs, with special concern for the planning of future academic programs.

One position that appears to be new is actually a re-naming of an old title. The former position of executive vice-president is now vice-president for Administration. "It gives people a better understanding of the meaning of the position," clarified Stanfield. "The old title means different things at different universities. It is clear here that he will deal with business, not academics." Dr. Ben Forsyth, assistant dean of Medicine, is acting vice-president at this point.

William Shimel is replacing Bob Davison, now director of Extension Services. He held a similar position at the University of Wisconsin.

The new dean of the College of Education and Social Services, born and raised in Rutland, was recruited from a position at the Chicago Circle Campus of the University of Illinois, Charles A. Tesconi Jr.

In addition Raymond P. Coward will be coming from Purdue Indiana to take the position of director of the school of Home Economics to replace Armin Grams, who is presently acting director.

Education Policy Turns to Infusing Intellectualism

By John Letteri

"We are now turning our attention to the sharpening of the intensity of the intellectual life at UVM," said Dr. Lattie Coor, president of the University of Vermont, before the full Board of Trustees Saturday.

The physical improvements such as the expansion of the gym and library, and an administrative house cleaning "have already been completed," said Coor.

In keeping with this philosophy, the university has completed a "self study" and will be visited in late October by a re-accreditation team from the New England Association of Schools and Colleges (NEASC).

The team will not only be looking at the "snapshot" of the university for re-accreditation purposes, but also will be reviewing academic programs at UVM in an effort to find areas for "future improvements," said Dr. Robert Arns, vice-president for academic affairs.

In addition, the team will be reviewing the university's decision-making process. Such things as appointment policies for administration, and promotion and tenure rules for faculty will be assessed by the team in order to evaluate UVM's methods of self-correction and improvement.

Although Arns is "confident" UVM meets "maximum standards" necessary for re-accreditation, "we have to be even better." He said the NEASC team will be able to help the administration determine where improvements can be made.

The university is "dedicated to the advancement, transmission, and application of knowledge through teaching, research and scholarly pursuits, and public service," according to the self study statement of the university's mission.

The NEASC team will be asked to answer several questions dealing with the mission of the university to ascertain if UVM through its academic programs and administration processes are in accordance with this mission.

The final question the team will be considering is if there are other processes, constraints or potential linkages the university must incorporate in order to realize its potential for development.

An example of this "infusion for intellectual pursuit" according to Coor is the Vermont Seminar series. By bringing distinguished speakers to the university on a variety of subjects, the administration hopes to create a "richer" educational atmosphere at UVM.

UVM's South African Investments Spark Debate

By John Letteri

South African investments, and the moral issues they raise, were the focus of the UVM Board of Trustee's Investment Committee meeting last Friday.

Concerns over these holdings in the country where segregation of blacks is mandated by law were expressed by Student Association President Charles Clark and Student Trustee Andrea Pearl. Clark said the S.A. should get involved in a matter which four or five student groups have already voiced opposition to. He will be meeting with the leaders of these groups and other students to set up a program to answer basic questions about the extent of UVM's holdings in South Africa and about the country itself.

Ms. Pearl, one of the two student members of the Board, said information on the holdings should be provided by the Board of Trustees. She advocated that the Board consider other investment possibilities and divestment of the holdings in the countries where blacks are forbidden by law from holding public offic and must live in special sectic ns of the country. "Racism is the law there," Ms. Pearl said.

Investment Committee Chairman J. R. Morgan agreed to provide the information, but holdings, a precedent would be established whereby the Trustees would have to rule out 300 companies right off the bat who operate in countries run by oppressive regimes. Morgan said this would create a problem since "Andrew Young says our country is racist."

Clark said Monday people must make a "rational decision about a political question" and not a "political decision on a popular question." He said the South Africa is "purely arbitrary." If UVM were to rid itself of its South African Board was considering the question on an economic basis, but the issue was a moral one.

Trustee Benjamin Aibel said for UVM to divest itself of an investment returning 7% (Mobil Oil Corporation) on the basis of an operation consisting of "a withheld judgment on the divestiture question. He said the list of companies operating in South Africa would be "assinine."

Student Trustee Butch Crandall said although the Trustees might disapprove of the South African government, "we still have a fiduciary responsibility" to return income on investments.

In an effort to influence corporate moves to invest in South Africa, the Trustees will submit proxy votes at stockholder's meetings opposing further South African involvement. Morgan said if enough schools did this, corporations might be dissuaded and invest elsewhere. Yet, UVM owns only 1/8th of 1/10th of one percent of Mobil Corporation.

Students at universities and colleges across the country have begun to grow uneasy about their school's investments in South Africa. The trustees of UVM, through proxy votes and information on countries operating in South Africa through the Investor Responsibility Research Center, are attempting to understand the situation, and possibly oppose future South African investment.

Trustee Robert Bickford said he thinks companies are doing something to help South Africa and their people, and if people "would look at it with both eyes, they might change their mind."

South Africa, however, is the only country in the world where a group of people are legally oppressed and segregated because of the color of their skin.

"... although the trustees might disapprove of the South African government, we still have a fiduciary responsibility to return income on our investments."

Berster's Rights May Have Been Violated During Arrest

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

Testimony in Federal District Court this week suggests that law enforcement officers may have been lax in making Kristina Berster's rights known to her during questioning after she was picked up near the Canadian border at Alburg.

U.S. Customs officer John Ryan testified that he did not read Berster her legal rights before he detained her in his car, or later at the Alburg Port of Entry. Under cross-examination by defense attorneys, he denied that she was under arrest at that time. However, he said she was not free to leave. If she had attempted to leave, he continued, she would have been placed under arrest.

The defense requested the present suppression hearings in an attempt to prevent statements Berster made before she was read her legal rights from being used against her.

Ryan testified that he encountered Berster "walking briskly" down Line Road, about fifteen feet from the Canadian border. He called it "unusual" to encounter a lone person out walking at that time of evening, and characterized the walk of the local inhabitants as "leisurely."

Ryan said Berster stopped when she came abreast of his car, at which time he asked her where she was going.

Berster said that she was "out walking," according to Ryan's testimony, having come from a motel in Canada. Ryan quoted her as saying that she had had "no intention" of entering the U.S. When asked for identification, Berster produced an Iranian passport which lacked a valid U.S. visa. Ryan then asked her to step into the car.

Ryan testified that he then brought her to the Alburg Port-of-Entry, for "possible immigration violations." He said that he conducted a "field test for hashish oil" on a liquid-centered candy bar in Berster's possession. The test was negative, he said.

She was then turned over to immigration officer Donald Peck.

Peck testified that Berster told him she was staying with a Ray Kajma, a woman named Maria, and another woman whose name she didn't know. A computer check, which indicated that these three had crossed the border into the U.S. earlier in the evening "confirmed my suspicions," he said, that "she wasn't telling the truth."

Peck said he then placed her in his car and read her her rights.

She was then taken to the Swanton immigration office, where she tried unsuccessfully to reach her New York City lawyer by telephone.

She was held there as a deportable alien. Her fingerprints were taken as an "administrative procedure" for deportation proceedings.

The issue of legal rights during questioning has also become a focal point in the trial of Berster's co-defendent on the conspiracy charge, Ray Kajmir. Swanton Border Patrol officer Roger Jackson the fourth

Growing Soviet Economic Influence in Middle East Poses Threat says Gumple

Western acquiescence to growing Soviet economic influence in the Middle East poses a serious security threat to the free world, said University of Munich Economics Department Chairman Werner Gumple in an address to a John Dewey Lounge audience last Tuesday.

Citing growing Iranian, Afghanistan, and Western European dependence on Siberian natural gas, Grumple said detente will not save "Soviet hedgemonial trials."

As opposed to an assessment of Western Soviet economic strengths, however, the economist lectured at length on current Soviet energy policy, stating that although the U.S.S.R. exportation of coal, natural gas, and oil ranks her as the world's second leading energy producer, geographical and fundamental economic restrictions currently hinder the achievement of any far-reaching objectives.

The Soviet Union's major domestic energy objective is the industrialization of its primary and secondary forms of energy which are located in the "highly unfavorable climate and terrain" of Siberia, and are "among the largest in the world," according to Gumple. Politically the Soviets have used their resources to influence the policies of their satellite states and Middle Eastern nations. Economically, current Western European dependence on Soviet oil imports, has created a potential "crisis in energy allotment," said Grumple.

Yet due to the unfavorable physical environment, the lack of a modern communication system in the west Siberian territories, and the imbalanced distribution of resources and population, the Soviets face a problem in exploiting their resources. Accordingly, the Soviet desire for increased industrial expansion, while simultaneously attempting to expand their interests in the Middle East and maintain a dominating political influence in their satellite states, have not been achieved.

Reconciliation of these conflicting goals has produced Soviet attempts to construct its industrial plants closer to the Asian plain, and to complete a railway network which could ship materials, i.e. coal, directly to European locations. Furthermore, the Soviets are researching hydroelectric and nuclear power, as well as trying to maintain a highly favorable balance of trade, which finances the pursuit of new resources, said Grumple.

Given limited success in these endeavors, Gumple suggested that although the Soviets cannot threaten economic domination, its action should not remain unchecked by the United States.

office also works with other programs such as Career Planning and Placement and Counseling and Testing to provide needed facilities for the academic and counseling responsibility.

In addition, the office also serves as a liaison between the university and Vermont Vocational Rehabilitation Program. The Vocational Rehabilitation Program provides funds for Personal Care Attendants (PCA), as well as tuition and books for handicapped students. Ms. Carlstrom said she receives R100/month through Voc. Rehab. for her PCA. Voc. Rehab. also funds readers for blind students. Any student can be a PCA, but "they have to be willing to work closely with someone," said Ms. Carlstrom. She said Nancy Olliker interviews potential candidates and the handicapped student trains them.

But, "Even with physical modifications, just being aware there are people here with varying capabilities doesn't happen enough," said Ms. Koch. The awareness of handicapped problems needs to be heightened, she added.

Her office is planning such programs as slide shows, handicapped awareness week, and workshops designed to help able-bodied students look at attitudes towards people with physical disabilities.

Further, they are working with project STAY designing an outward bound program. Such things as camping trips would be provided through such a program for both able-bodied and disabled people. Project STAY provides tutoring and peer counseling for students.

Generally, faculty have been quite helpful to handicapped students and make quite reasonable adaptations for them, said Ms. Koch. Ms. Ryan said she has had only one problem with a professor who "wasn't too keen on the idea of having me in the class." She feels, however, the overall attitude is "pretty good." Ms. Carlstrom indicated she has never run into any problems with faculty. She said professors are willing to make the necessary exceptions for her.

Student attitudes are generally good. Ms. Ryan said the students that know her are "really good" about helping her out. Carlstrom echoes these thoughts, but felt many students aren't aware of the disabled students at UVM, and consequently aren't prepared to help them when they need it.

"A lot of people don't take the time to stop and ask questions," she said. "Most people are either afraid to ask or just take over in a problem situation and don't ask."

Ms. Koch said more contact needs to be made with all state Vocational Rehabilitation offices in order to insure sharing of information, correct referral procedures and smooth working relationships.

More time needs to be spent researching best adaptive methods for use in the classroom and proper equipment which the program should be planning to purchase. Federal legislation needs to be further studied and recommendations and plans made accordingly, Ms. Koch said

Kunstler Claims FBI Responsible for Martin Luther King's Death

By John Letteri

"The FBI, I am certain, is responsible for the death of Martin Luther King," said noted defense attorney William Kunstler last Thursday.

Speaking before a near capacity crowd at Ira Allen Chapel, the man who defended H. Rap Brown and the Chicago 7, said he had "no smoking gun" to prove his claim about the FBI, but stated several facts he said supported his case.

Quoting from a two-year analysis of FBI tactics during the 1960's and early 1970's prepared by a Senate sub-committee headed by Frank Church (D—Iowa), Kunstler said King was the target of a "viscious, personal attack."

The late J. Edgar Hoover, director of the FBI at the time, called King the "Black Messiah" who had to be stopped. Vulgar, false letters written by FBI agents about King were sent to his wife Coretta and his close friends. A letter, written by FBI agents, was sent to King saying "they (the FBI did not identify themselves and often used false identities) were close enough to him to kill him anytime they pleased."

The FBI also sent letters to the king of Sweden before Martin Luther King was to receive the Nobel Peace Prize in Stockholm, and to the Pope before King was to have an audience with the Pontiff in Rome.

Black Panther Party. FBI agents wrote letters to different factions of the Panthers, or other groups, such as the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), saying "one had better hit before the other does first."

In this manner, the Panthers were physically destroyed. To compound this, FBI agents wrote letters to supporters of the Panthers. For example, Kunstler cited evidence from the Church report stating hundreds of letters were written to Jewish leaders claiming the Panthers were anti-semitic. As a result, Jewish support was withdrawn from the Panthers.

Using these examples as an introduction to his theme for the evening, Kunstler explained how even today groups are singled out for selective treatment by the FBI. He likened this to "creating outlaws." He used his current client, Kristina Berster, as a case in point.

Ms. Berster, who was apprehended while allegedly trying to illegally enter the United States, was labelled a terrorist from West Germany by FBI officials and the press, and put in jail with a bail of $500,000. Yet, Ms. Berster, in fact, is not a member of the notorious West German Terrorist group, Baader-Meinhoff, as was originally reported, nor is she wanted in West Germany for terrorist activities. Both the U.S. and West Germany have retracted their earlier statements.

Kunstler said this is an example of the increasingly oppressive nature of the U.S. federal government. He said Ms. Berster fled the suppressive laws of West Germany, and is now asking for political asylum in the U.S.

Kunstler said West Germany has passed several very strict laws concerning terrorists and their activities. One such law is called "Lexus Baader-Meinhof," which effectively forbids attorneys from representing terrorist clients.

"You must always oppose this type of authority," said Kunstler. He emphasized rational thinking on everyone's part to resist the erosion of rights steming from laws like "Lexus Baader-Meinhof" and U.S. Senate bill 1437. Formerly S-1, 1437, now in the House, if passed, would severely restrict many civil liberties mandated in the Constitution or guaranteed in the Bill of Rights.

In response to a question from the audience, Kunstler said the anti-nuclear Clamshell Alliance is the most likely candidate for future FBI attacks. He urged everyone present to buy and read the Church report which detailed the FBI abuses of the past decade. Senator Frank Church, on completing the summary of the analysis his sub-committee prepared, said, "I hope to God the likes of this are never seen again."

"At one point, Kunstler said, 23 percent of the FBI agents in this country were engaged in subversive activities and dirty tricks."

King was not the only target of subversive tactics employed by the FBI, according to Kunstler. He said the Church report documented evidence of letters written by FBI agents to various radical groups, telling them they were in danger and had to kill off another group to survive. At one point, Kunstler said 23 percent of the FBI agents in this country were engaged in subversive activities and dirty tricks.

Other activities of the FBI included an intense letter-writing campaign directed against the in her final report on Special Services for the Physically Handicapped.

Ms. Carlstrom feels once people overcome the attitudinal barriers they have toward handicapped students, the architectural barriers will come along with them. She said the handicapped student is "neck and neck with racism" and use a lot of "their techniques to get what we want."

"I would love to see the administration in wheelchairs. Let them see if they could get through campus... then they would understand why we need transportation... I would like to see them get along in the winter, in snow or have to pay 75 cents one way to a class."

Ms. Carlstrom feels handicapped people, as human beings, have the right to anything "no matter what." In her view, no lines can be drawn because of one's physical disability.

Wood Burning Plant Raises Enviornmental Questions

By Ann Seidenberg
VPIRG

Many questions have been raised about possible environmental effects of the $80 million dollar wood chip burning plant proposed by the Burlington Electric Department.

A series of articles looking at some of these questions appeared recently in the Burlington Free Press. William H. Braun, a Free Press reporter, interviewed conservationists, foresters, and engineers to define the important questions about the plant.

The most important question raised by concerned Vermonters is the initial necessity of the plant. In presenting this project, Burlington Electric is assuming a growth in consumption of 5% per year in Burlington — a doubling of energy use by 1985. Current consumption growth has been only about 1% per year, however, and if the trend continues, the actual growth will be well below the Burlington Electric estimate.

The wood chip burning plant would "hold the line" on electric rates, direct the state toward energy independence, and improve the quality of our forests, by removing cull wood and allowing the stronger specimens to grow, according to Burlington Electric.

Many of the people interviewed by Braun recognize the value of such a concept, but have serious reservations about the environmental impact of the plant. According to Mark Lapping, acting director of the Environmental Program at UVM, "There is no such thing as a free lunch. Everything has a cost attached to it."

One environmental cost related to construction of the wood chip burning plant is the amount of wood chips needed per year for the plant to function (close to half a million tons), and the resulting effect on the wood supply. What will happen when the cull wood is gone? (BED is proposing to take only dead, rotten or otherwise unusable wood from the forests in a selective cutting process.)

Questions have been raised as to whether burning wood to generate electricity is its highest and best use in the first place. If the proposed wood chip burning plant consumes the equivalent of 5000 acres of clear-cut forest land each year as estimated, some wonder where that leaves the homeowner who relies on wood to directly heat his home, the lumber industry, or farmers who use sawdust for bedding?

Colin High, an environmental scientist from Dartmouth College's Research Program on Technology and Public Policy, is concerned about the loss of nutrients to the soil as a result of whole-tree chipping. This is the process that converts whole trees — branches, leaves and all — into chips. Conventional logging techniques leave the tops and branches ("slash") in the forest to be incorporated into the soil. This part of the tree contains a very high amount of soil-enriching nutrients. If the slash is chipped up, those nutrients are lost to the soil. There are questions as to the long-term effects of this practice on the forest land.

The whole-tree chippers and the feller-bunchers (hydraulically operated tree-cutting machines) are extremely large and expensive. A feller-buncher, for example, is driven up to the base of a tree, it grabs the trunk with its hydraulically operated claw, and at the same time cuts through it with hydraulic shears like one would slice a carrot. The operator then transfers the severed tree — still upright — to a pile, where he twists the claw arm around to lay it down.

The expense of this machinery ($65,000 for a feller-buncher, $170,000 for a whole-tree chipper) necessitates it being efficient and economical. One concern of some of the men interviewed by Braun is that the environment may suffer as a result. For example, some are fearful of consequences if a chipper operator finds it more economical to run a few good trees through the machinery with the cull wood to produce more volume.

Braun notes no forest practices law is in effect in Vermont, and logging on private land is not regulated. To protect this land from unsound forest management, such as excessive clearcutting, damage to still-standing trees by machinery and excessive erosion, it will be necessary to employ harvesting controls. It has been noted that these harvesting controls, in the form of a greater number of foresters hired to more closely monitor forest management practices, will mean more money spent for the initial investment.

The original proposals of an $80 million wood chip burning plant, a $15 million hydroelectric facility, and a $10 million trash burning plant were approved by Burlington voters on March 7.

VPIRG is involved this semester in gathering data about the tree plants and compiling a schedule of the hearings that must take place during the issuance of permits.

witness for the prosecution, testified that he wasn't sure whether statements made by Kajmir after he declined to answer further questions were offered. "I can't recall whether I directly asked him the question or not," said Jackson.

Jackson also disputed the wording of an F.B.I. report which quoted him as saying that a female suspect had been "arrested" at the border.

Later this week, defense lawyers are expected to argue for a dismissal on the basis of a 1967 multi-lateral refugee protection treaty. They claim she was made a refugee by political conditions in West Germany, and is therefore immune to prosecution under immigration statues, as spelled out by the treaty. If this defense is permitted by Judge Albert Coffrin, immigration law specialist William Waterman is expected to handle this angle of Berster's defense.

In the meantime, the judge has twice apologized to the jury, requested their patience, and explained that all parties were attempting to resolve preliminary matters with "all possible speed." He has admonished them to "remain firm in their resolve" not to read or listen or view or discuss anything concerning any aspect of the case.

S.A. Elects New Senators

Voter Turnout Termed Largest Ever

By Rob Smith
S.A. Communications

S.A. Elections

In what was called by S.A. President Charlie Clark, "the largest voter turnout for Senate elections ever," the Student Association elected its 78-79 Senate last week.

A total 1,802 students voted over the three-day election, with 1,194 of these students voting on-campus and 608 students voting either off-campus or Greek. 23.5% of the aggregate student body voted, with 29% of on-campus students voting as compared to 17% of off-campus voting. Last year's total was under 20%.

In trying to explain the reason for such a high turnout this year, President Clark credited the record number of candidates and S.A. election organization as possible reasons for the voter response. Stating that the S.A. made every effort to keep advertised polling places open at all times indicated in pre-election advertising, Clark said that this effort, along with an increased awareness by UVM students concerning the S.A., were key factors leading to the successful election.

Those students elected to the 1978-79 S.A. Senate are as follows:

Off-Campus Senators — (1) Henry Chamberlain, (2) Vaune Davis, (3) Betsy Day, (4) Alison Gardner, (5) Mike Gilbert, (6) Mark Guyette, (7) Susan Hagan, (8) Linda Peabody, (9) Helen Pelzman, (10) Peter Riegelman, (11) Bill Short, (12) Glen Turner, (13) Peter Vanderbilt, (14) Wilda White.

On-Campus — (1) Lynn Ackerman, (2) Arthur Adams, (3) Jeff Beckerman, (4) Laura Callan, (5) Christopher Chandler, (6) Pat Danaher, (7) Michael Deutsch, (8) Jesse Gadson, (9) Ann Harris, (10) Leon Hayward, (11) Linda Jeffries, (12) Suzanne Kelly, (13) Susan Kimball, (14) Pam Rogal, (15) Bill Scheer, (16) Mauna Schwartz, (17) Tricia Turner, (18) Brien Zecchinelli.

Greek Senators — (1) Ray Bateman, (2) Bill Bogasky, (3) Keith Fleischman, (4) Henry Peterson, (5) Holly Zecker.

All 37 senators will be placed on committees later this week.

New Senate Goes to Camp Keeywadin

A panel discussion led by President Lattie Coor, Vice President for Academic Affairs Robert Arns, Board of Trustees Chairperson Louise Swainbank, and Dean of EMBA Elmer Goden, highlighted the new S.A. Senate's student governance retreat this past weekend at Lake Dunmore in Middlebury.

Topics discussed by the new Senate and their guest administrators over the weekend included a student lobby in Montpelier, the UVM budget, tuition, minority courses at UVM and student governance in the community. Also included in the weekend's events were a discussion on the structure and history of UVM given by Dean of Students Keith Miser, and an explanation of the S.A.'s standing committees led by President Charlie Clark and V.P. Missy Burke.

Most senators found the retreat extremely informative and were impressed that the S.A. was able to gather such an array of top UVM administrators to come talk to the students. Commenting on the retreat, one senator stated, "The panel of Coor, Arns, Swainbank and Goden gave us a healthy diversity of opinion on where the university's coming from and where we as students can help."

The weekend also gave the senators a chance to get acquainted with the S.A. administration of President Clark, V.P. Burke and Treasurer Myers. Concerning Clark, newly elected senator Henry Chamberlain stated, "He thinks everyone's made a commitment to the S.A. by running for Senate, and should put in X number of hours weekly as a senator. I think his conception of what a student senator should be is well defined, and I think that's good."

Later this week, all 37 senators will be placed on standing committees for the academic year.

"Anti-Inflation Move Disclosed Soon"

In the informal setting of a Fireside chat, President Carter is planning to unveil his re-enforced anti-inflation policy. Top aides have been asked to have the message ready for next Monday, counting on the Senate to recess as scheduled.

Carter is expected to set forth a program of voluntary wage-price standards, generally for wage-increase ceilings of seven percent and average price increases that do not exceed five and three-quarters percent. Limited sanctions involving federal procurement policy and regulatory steps will back the standards.

Two measures no longer under consideration are delaying the minimum wage and social security tax increases, although inclusion of these proposals could come in the President's economic message.

The administration is encountering difficulty in finding an anti-inflation "czar" to administer the soon-to-be-announced program. A non-government person with enough influence to sway big business and organized labor is needed, according to a White House source.

In order to sell the inflation program, cabinet members and White House aids are going to tour the U.S. giving speeches and attending forums with business, labor, and consumer groups.

The un-veiling of this program will be postponed until Congress adjourns so that no attention is taken from the energy package before it is completed.

OPEC Expects to Enter Refinery Busines

The world's major oil companies are being faced with a major challenge. OPEC said Monday that they are planning to enter into competition for transportation and refining of petroleum.

Ali M. Jaidah, secretary general of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, said "We can no longer afford to play the role of mere suppliers of raw materials."

In the past OPEC has allowed multinational oil companies such as Exxon and Mobil to control transportation, refining, and marketing of their product, leaving OPEC to control oil prices.

The organization threatened to cut back oil supplies to industrialized nations if they do not offer help to OPEC nations in developing refining capacity, and receive a share of world markets for petrochemical products.

Health Insurance at Another Angle

Senator Edward M. Kennedy continued his fight this week for a national health insurance plan. Unlike in the past, Senator Kennedy opened hearings with the witnesses who have had medical difficulty compounded by bill worries.

In testimony which began Monday, the Senate Subcommittee on Health heard stories of families who thought their insurance covered something, only to find they were wrong.

The committee also heard testimony from six Canadians praising Canada's comprehensive health plan.

Two more days of hearings were planned with testimony from labor leaders, the American Medical Association on Tuesday, and Joseph Califano, Secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare on Friday.

The new assault is geared to attract more support for the plan over which Kennedy and President Carter have split.

There will be no health insurance proposal introduced into Congress this term, though. Kennedy conceded to the difficulty involved in passing such a universal plan.

Last Leg of "Soyuz"

After 116 days in space, the Soyuz 29 cosmonauts are still functioning. Monday they were unloading cargo from the Progress 4 capsule and were getting ready to transfer food.

Tass, the official Soviet News agency, reports that the two cosmonauts, Vladimir Kovalevok and Alexander Ivanchenkov, are in good physical condition.

When unloading is complete, the two will return to earth. The record-breaking mission, which began on June 15, will end in mid-October.

Rape Victims

The House passed legislation protecting the privacy of rape victims in federal rape trials.

The controversial bill would restrict evidence about their past sexual behavior. Supporters of the bill argued that rape victims are discouraged from reporting attacks, due to the humiliation brought on by cross-examination. The Bill has been sent on to the Senate.

For Geography Majors

The regions of Kirghizier and Uzbekistan in Soviet Central Asia were hit with a minor earthquake Sunday, according to Tass, the Soviet News agency.

Tass said the quake registered between five and six points on the Soviet 12 point scale at Osh.

The same release said there were no casualties or reported damage. The quake was centered in the area of the Soviet-Chinese border in the eastern part of the Alar Ridge.

New Coin to Have Woman on Face

On Tuesday, President Carter signed a bill that authorized the minting of a new one-dollar coin. The coin will bear the image of suffragist Susan B. Anthony. This is the first time an American woman has been put on a coin.

Energy Package Moves

By wide margins the U.S. Senate passed two more provisions of the energy bill.

A vote of 76 to 13 passed a provision dealing with utility rates. The proposal falls far short of President Carter's initial request. Many consumer groups support the measure.

The new legislation is aimed toward State Regulatory agencies policy and new rate programs to increase conservation. Changes would be in the form of cheaper rates for home consumers and prohibition of rate decreases for big industry. The pressure to make these changes come from forcing the state agencies to explain why the changes are not necessary.

A general energy-conservation measure was passed by a vote of 86-3. Previous aspects of the energy package already approved by the Senate are coal-conservation measures, and a controversial, slow de-regulation of newly found gas.

The House is expected to act on a maj r energy bill by the end of the week.

Carter Helps Peace Plan

An undisclosed White House source said last week that President Carter will participate in the Egyptian-Israeli peace conference beginning Thursday in Washington. The same source also said that there might be a White House meeting between Carter and the two delegations before the conference begins.

A State Dept. spokesman said that Secretary of State Vance would leave on Saturday for South Africa and Moscow, but that top U.S. officials would be involved with the talks at all times.

In a speech at the U.N., Israeli Foreign Minister Dayan urged other Arab nations to join the initiative for peace. He defended the Israeli settlements on the West Bank of the Jordan River and an Israeli-controlled Jerusalem. He stated that prospects for the Israeli position to change are "unconceivable."

Attempt at Saving Cease-fire by Sarkis

Lebanese President Elias Sarkis flew to Saudi Arabia yesterday following inconclusive talks in Syria.

As of Tuesday, the two-day old cease-fire between Lebanese Christians and Syrians showed signs of deteriorating.

There was not much hope for positive outcome as talks between Sarkis and Syrian President Hafez Assad were interrupted by occasional mortar rounds and sniper fire.

Sarkis' efforts were further hampered by a successful general strike by Moslems in West Beruit, called to protest the new security plan.

Sarkis' plan involved the replacement of Syrian troops with the Lebanese Army, yet untried. The people of Beruit remember the last Lebanese Army, which fell apart in the 1975-76 civil war.

With machine gunned army jeeps and armed gunmen, the Army drove in convoys down West Beruit Streets.

A compromise between Moslems and Leftists is being sought by Sarkis by the October 26 date set for expiration of the cease-fire mandate.

Oil Picture Looks Grim

The world oil situation picture for the mid-80's is grimmer than it appeared a year ago, according to Energy Secretary Schlesinger.

In an interview in U.S. News and World Report Schlesinger said, "Mexico's prospects are a bit better than we thought a year ago. But the overall picture for 1985 is probably a little grimmer than we thought."

Out of Carter's 113 energy proposals, 105 would be passed by Congress, Schlesinger said. He also said that the ones rejected are the most important ones.

Another prediction is that the U.S. will fall far short of President Carter's goal of almost double coal consumption in 1985. Still, the energy secretary feels the new legislation will be good conservation incentives.

Torrijos Steps Down

Dictator of Panama for 10 years, Omar Torrijos stepped down Wednesday as Chief of Government taking the title with him. A new president will take over, and the self-proclaimed "Dictator with a Heart," Torrijos, will become the head of the National Guard, Panama's Army.

A Letter from Long Island:

The American Dream

By Eric Kilburn

Dear Daniel,

I'm told that Nassau County, Long Island, has the second highest per capita income in the U.S. That doesn't matter. What's more important is that the party upstairs has almost no vegetarian food and I'm a hungry but as yet uncompromising herbivore. Feeling somewhat awkward in a crowd composed largely of corporate executives, I've taken temporary refuge in the basement, where a guitar, pen and paper provide needed sanctuary.

One doesn't have to travel to Long Island to find the "American Dream," but it's difficult to envision a better example. Walking from the train station to a friend's house, I saw many of the prerequisites – weedless, lush green lawns, two-story colonials, long driveways and large cars – yet familiarity bred contempt.. Strange, I thought – I grew up in an environment that carbon copies this neighborhood, but now I feel like an outsider, repulsed by my surroundings. Perhaps I'm hypocritical, self-righteous, or maybe it's just from living in Vermont too long, but the phrase running over and over in my mind is "Taking Responsibility."

Responsibility? We had responsibility as children when we took out the garbage as per mother's requests. Granted, this task was performed under the paternal threat of allowance suspension, but we still felt proud knowing we were "in charge" of something. With advancing age, our definition of responsibility has broadened considerably, yet its ramifications for many remain unchanged. Hopefully the jobs are more interesting, and the "allowance" substantially greater, but "responsibility" is still a case of "taking out the garbage."

It comes down to a problem of definitions. If one interprets responsibility as pertaining to self, family and country, then Long Island and the American Dream are sensible. It is reasonably certain that most of the people on Long Island take ample care of their own and their family's needs, at least on the physical plane. It is also likely, despite numerous loopholes for the wealthy, that people here are responsible to their country by paying taxes. How could these individuals be irresponsible?

If one holds that responsibility implies duties of self, family, country and spaceship earth, a world of uncomfortable realities surfaces. Despite the American self-image of enjoying the highest standard of living of any people in history, in many ways we are grossly negligent of our duties as global citizens, and our actions clearly affect the quality of life on earth.

The party upstairs is an excellent example. To begin with, how many people drove when they could have walked? What are they doing riding two-to-a-car in a ten miles-per-gallon monster? Most of the people are either smoking or drinking or both. How many millions of acres yearly go into grain (for liquor) and tobacco to supply our social addictions? The lawns of the neighborhood are soft and beautiful green, having been heavily fertilized. How many millions of tons of fertilizers are annually spread on lawns and golf courses in the U.S.? Many developing nations have food shortages, in part because of a lack of fertilizer and energy. Beneath this endless rhetoric, the underlying question is simple: How many people could be fed?

Last night I stayed with a friend in Brooklyn, on the edge of Bedford-Stuyversant, one of the most downtrodden, rat-crawling, roach-infested neighborhoods in the U.S. How many firetrap dives in Bed-Stuy does it take to equal one quarter acre lot with ten-room house in Nassau County? And Bed-Stuy would be paradise lost to probably two billion of the world's people, where running water, flush toilets and electricity are unattainable luxuries. How many festering holes in the Third World equal one condominium? It's mathematics, only this time there are no meaningless numbers, just people and the way they live.

If we put the previous questions to the people at the party and demanded rational, globally-responsible answers, the sum total of generated guilt could sink the Queen Elizabeth. And this would be tragic, because guilt is an ineffective tool for changing attitudes (People naturally tend to avoid anything uncomfortable). In addition, the argument for voluntary conservation is at least partially unrealistic, since resource availability in no way insures that the needy will benefit. Thus, where does one begin?

"Despite all apparent indications to the contrary, I remain convinced that the human race will somehow survive," said Pete Seeger. Seeger is also certain of the inherent goodness in people, an almost mandatory requirement for anyone interested in bringing about change. I don't know most of the people at this party, but I am sure that they are warm and friendly souls. Most would never knowingly harm anyone. I guess all you can do is keep talking and asking questions, suggesting that people read books like Taking Charge, Food First, and Moving Towards a New Society, and hope that one percent actually do.

I think I'm going upstairs now. Maybe I'll even start a conversation-argument on the merits of highly-consumptive vs. voluntarily-simple lifestyles. I'm a pretty good actor too – I'll pretend I'm open-minded and listen to the proponents of suburbia, Cadillacs and Scotts Super Turf-Builders. Then I'll present my side, in the same pseudo-objective style, and hope someone hears. We'll have a bona-fide "intellectual" discussion and there's no way I can lose. You see, I've got a secret weapon. I ain't about to change.

Fighting For Gay Liberation

By Wilda White

The Student Association Senators have been recently elected and after spending a weekend tucked away in the wraps of Camp Keewaydin, they have established or at least discussed their goals and objectives for this year. One goal that was absent from their list was a stand against the discrimination of Gay people, and in particular, against Gay students. Immediately, students at UVM may wonder why the Student Association should take such a precarious stand.

As we all know, support by one or any number of organizations will not in itself change or eliminate the oppression of a minority group. The real struggle for any kind of human liberation takes place in the minds and hearts of people in all strata of society. Although the ultimate responsibility for re-educating the heterosexual world lies with gay people, this does not mean that others among us should remain silent.

Discrimination against gay students takes many forms. Gays are often denied official student housing, teaching assistantships and job recommendations. Corporations which have an announced policy against hiring gays are allowed to recruit on campus. If counseling exists at all for gay students, it usually exists solely to "reform" them. Gayness is rarely dealt with in literature and history classes, although it has had a significant impact in both those areas; and many psychology courses still preach that homosexuality is an illness. Many Gay student groups are denied official recognition and/or funding. The list is longer, and if none of this affects you personally, chances are good that it does affect the person sitting next to you in class. Student governments have an obligation to battle discrimination against Gay students because they have an obligation to battle discrimination against all students.

Many students will remain unconvinced of the responsibility that the S.A. has to Gay students. Others will be inclined to avoid taking a stand until it is popular to do so. But I feel it is the time for the Student Association at UVM to begin to take a strong stand on any one of a number of politically sensitive issues.

Although most students should need no justification for the Student Association involvement in Gay rights, it is important to point out that a stand on Gay issues is consistent with the National Student Association mandates on a broad spectrum of human rights issues. In 1971, the National Student Association went on record as favoring an end to discrimination against Gay people.

If the first step for non-Gay students is not closing their eyes to the problems of their fellow students, the second is learning not to be coopted by that favorite opposition ploy: guilt by association. The question, "How could anyone be for Gay rights besides Gays?" belongs next to "You're not a women's libber, are you?" and "What are you, a nigger lover?"

The Gay movement has contributed significantly to our changing definition of normal behavior. It is no more "normal" to be heterosexual than it is to be white, or male, or middle class, or young, or a democrat. No real dialogue between human beings can take place if individuals retain an inordinate pride in whatever their particular normalcy happens to be. Understanding that, the Gay movement benefits heterosexuals, as well as Gays.

It is my hope that the Student Association at UVM will go on record supporting Gay rights and will also be helpful both in furthering the struggle for Gay liberation on campus, and furthering understanding and support of that struggle.

Wilda White is President of the UVM Gay Student Union.

Mountaineering #5.

REGULATION GARB

You, a faithful follower of this space, have been a mountaineer for some time now. You've studied the fundamentals, selected your gear and experimented with methodology. In short, you are nobody's fool. Nonetheless, you also know a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. So you want to learn more. Smart thinking.

First, you must realize that once the basics of mountaineering are mastered, it is only nuance which distinguishes the true artists from the merely adequate. Therefore, attention to detail, especially in matters of clothing, is vital.

Always protect the head according to seasonal fluctuations. In winter, a warm hat is mandatory. (The head, after all, is the chimney of the body. Avoid cerebral heat loss – it diminishes your psycho-physio abilities.) In summertime, a sun visor or a billed cap will guarantee crucial visibility among the craggy peaks.

Pay particular regard to your footgear. Shoes should be sturdy and stable. A secure footing is of utmost importance. Without it, you're asking for trouble. Point of order: while mountaineering is pursued for fun, it is nevertheless serious business. If you are going to down the mountains, rather than vice versa, you must be confident of your standing.

Between the head and the feet lies the area known to pros as "the body." Mountaineering bodywear is usually based on personal preference. However, keep a keen eye out for one common criterion. Your clothes should be comfortable and flexible, allowing for open movement, specifically in the vicinity of the arms. A free and responsive arm is a mountaineer's best friend.

Certain accessories, of course, complement and complete the regulation garb. Expedition flags to mark your territory in public places, connecting ropes for those who prefer the security of mountaineering in tandem and backpacks filled with beer nuts, mugs, bottle openers and other paraphanalia. Beyond these standards, wardrobe styles range from the rustic to the refined. And well they might, for mountaineers are a rugged and individual lot, joined only by a common taste for excellence.

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH Head for the mountains.

To An Awakened State

Tibetan Buddhism has found two homes in Vermont that are as different as night and day. But their down-to-earth perepectives are basically the same.

By Randy McMullen

If you're ever driving through Barnet, Vermont on route 5, you may pass a small sign with some oriental looking caricatures and the word "Karme-Choling" on it. The whole thing may appear rather insignificant, but if you turn into the dirt road there, you'll eventually stumble upon a small cluster of buildings that marks a 2500-year-old religious discipline, and a unique perspective on life.

Karme-Choling (pronounced "Karma-Chuling") is a meditation center owned by a non-profit corporation named Vajradhatu. It represents a small resurgence in Tibetan Buddhism a practice that was driven from its mother country by a Red Chinese invasion in 1959. At that time, some 700 Buddhist teachers and disciples escaped to the Himalayas which proved to be an unhospitable sanctuary. The few survivors, perhaps 20 or 30, went mostly to India, but some eventually came to the United States where the freedom and diverse population appeared to hold promise.

One of those who made it, Vajracarya, the Venerable Chugyam Trungpa, Rinpoche is the current director of Vajradhatu. He founded Karme-Choling, has been responsible for much of the recent rise in American interest in Buddhism. This rise in U.S. participation is reflected by the fact that the first American in history has been promoted to a high position in Tibetan buddhism. Having adopted the name Osel Tendzin, he will eventually be the successor to Trungpa, Rinpoche.

THE TELL-TALE TIGER

Karme-Choling was initially christened the "Tail of the Tiger," and its intentions were not so well defined as they are now. According to Rick Spiegel, Karme-Choling's publicity/public relations coordinator, the meditation center began with a lot of "raw hippie material." He explained that most of the original residents had come from urban areas, with cynical natures and a propensity toward drug abuse or other "spiritually related things." They, for the most part, did not get along well with the Barnet community and weren't knowledgeable about living in the country. The Buddhist teachings were only vaguely followed and some were outwardly misinterpreted.

However, as Spiegel reported, a continual upgrading has led to a fairly major change in idealogy. "There has been a shift away from the residential community type of set-up," he said, "so that now, almost only the staff lives here. It is no longer just a hangout." The good-fences-make-good-neighbors policy is also a thing of the past. "We have recently extended ourselves to them (the local people of Barnet), and some of our members are even in the local fire department," he said.

Subsequently, Karme-Choling has been receiving more curious visitors than in the past. But their reactions aren't quite so noteworthy as their expectations. "People expect to see us flying around, being levitated, wearing exquisite robes, and shaving our heads," laughed Spiegel. "Most seem quite shocked when they learn that we aren't bizarre, that we act like normal people."

Visitors to Karme-Choling see more than a collection of "normal people," however, for the center is a charming balance of old and new, intricacy and simplicity. The one common aspect of it all is beauty.

The shrine room, which is the spiritual center of Karme-Choling, is a mini-palace with fittingly elaborate decorations: paintings, drawings, gold colored wood carvings, and rows of red pads with red and yellow pillows for the meditation periods (called "sittings"). There is a faint smell of incense, and small offerings are placed on the shrine (such as small statues and carvings). What is offered here is, simply stated, the mind: its good and bad aspects, its intelligence and neuroses. The shrine room's decor matches the tradition of old Tibet and is symbolic of, as Siegel explained, "the richness and energy of a proper meditation process."

Another striking aspect of Karme-Choling is its central living room, which is highlighted by a boulder that juts daringly into the room from the eastern wall. It gives the living room an air of mysticism and organic spontaneity, but in truth represents not a work of creative ingenuity but an architectural error. According to Spiegel, the rock was mistakenly left unblasted when the foundation was poured, leaving the room with its centerpiece a la granite. "It's a good example, though," added Spiegel, "of the Buddhist approach: everything – even a mistake – is a workable situation."

Offsetting the shrine and living room is an ancient, red barn whose different lofts have been converted into administrative offices and makeshift workshops. The workshops are where the meditation cushions are made, as well as shrine decorations. One of these decorations, called Naga, is a dragon-like creature carved in wood. It traditionally serves as a protector of the shrine, and artistically it personified the different aspects of the mind. However, explained Spiegel, Naga is not intended for Karme-Choling, but will instead be sent to a center in Boulder, Colorado which is also under the direction of Trungpa, Rinpoche.

NO CHEAP THRILL

How, you may wonder, is all of this paid for? As a non-profit corporation, Karme-Choling is funded partially by donations, and mostly through the rates charged to non-residents. Subsequently, Karme-Choling is an expensive place to find out whether you're into Tibetan buddhism. The fee is generally $12 per night, and certain meditation programs are differently priced (introductory weekends, for example, are $30, and an intensive month of meditation costs $345).

Staff members, on the average, are paid the unexciting salary of $10 per week, but living 80 miles from the nearest town, and with a hectic schedule allowing two free hours a day (between meditating, working, and studying), and only one day off every fortnight, one could argue that a bigger salary is unnecessary.

THE LOCAL CHAPTER

It is quite possible that a fee of $12 per night, plus the heavy dose of meditation that a stay at Karme-Choling commits you to, could discourage a good many from even sniffing at Tibetan Buddhism. Fortunately for those who are interested, a less intensive (and less expensive) Buddhist organization exists in Burlington. This center, called Dharmadhatau, is also under the direction of Trungpa, Rinpoche, and might be described as a protege of Vajradhatu, the corporation owning Karme-Choling.

Dharmadhatu practices meditation twice daily (7-8 a.m. and 7:30–8:30 p.m.) except for Sundays, when the sitting lasts from 9 a.m. – 9 p.m., and Wednesday night, in which an introductory course called "Taming the Mind" is offered for $15. The Dharmadhatu center is on Elmwood Ave., and its eight occupants are all students of Buddhism, although each has either a job or school responsibilities as well. One of them, Dr. David Whitehorn, is an associate professor of physiology at UVM.

Whitehorn explains that he started with Dharmadhatu about five years ago, at a time in his life when he was "all screwed up." He was confused, experimenting with different drugs, and basically dissatisfied with his lifestyle. Then, as he tells it, he ran into Trungpa, Rinpoche, who introduced some important changes.

"He was the first really sane person I ever met," said Whitehorn. "That guy really had his feet on the ground." Whitehorn maintained that the change in his life has been gradual, something he has not really been conscious of. But he definitely realizes an increased awareness of his environment. "I experience the world more vividly," he says. "Things seem sharper; everything seems more vivid."

AND THAT'S WHAT IT'S ALL ABOUT

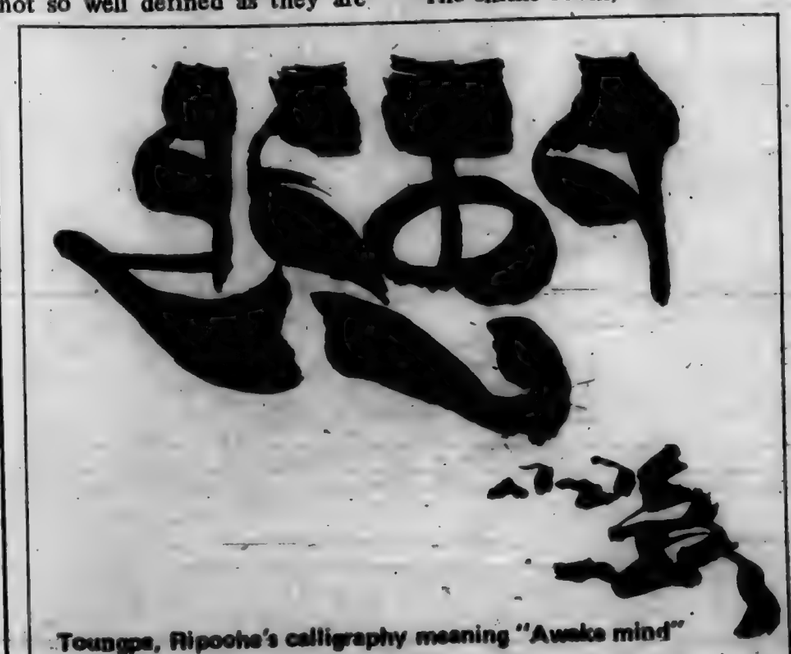
Seeing the world more vividly is a concept inherent within all forms of Tibetan Buddhism, whether you make it just a part of your life or you whole life.



The logo that identifies the Vajradhatu corporation is a Tibetan calligraphy – written by Trungpa, Rinpoche — that translated into English means "awake mind." That's the condition that Buddhists strive

Short Story Contest

His name was Jack. The eventual destination on this annual excursion of his was a place in Italy with his surname for a title and where he had many relatives. People so readily accept and trust blood ties. I have many relatives in Ireland. They are farmers, and, in contrast, their American kin have become arrogant suburban dwellers. Some cousins of mine who visited 'the old country' described with distaste the farms which they considered primitive and unpleasant.

I was on route to Europe. I didn't know just where; I was only escaping impending insanity. I was sincerely afraid small town life was making me crazy. I had immersed myself in a few jobs in the community, and knew too many people who knew everything I was doing. Each job exposed me to a different element in the community, and the last had been the most bigoted and decadent.

Jack was an antique dealer in the Boston area. I think he told me he also sold dope. For a month every year he goes to Europe and stumbles around. Like me, he only spoke English – though by now, he's probably learned a little Italian.

I remember vividly the first time I saw him. He was staring at me and gesturing in a very friendly manner. He didn't interest me, though. He was short, balding and coming on too strongly. I avoided his gaze and checked out the possibilities of developing an immediate relationship elsewhere. A roomful of people and myself were going to be held overnight in New York City on New Year's Eve at the airline's expense. The majority of people in the room were under 24, and I was pretending to be, as it was the last day of youth fare and the day before airline rate hikes.

I saw a tall, blond, handsome and shy-looking young man with a male traveling companion; so I played Jack's game, I believed, more subtly. I don't even think he noticed me, and I looked pretty good. I was thinner than I'd been in years and was wearing all new clothes. I had lost a lot of weight from the anxiety, hours and running I had endured for the previous four months as a cocktail waitress.

As I walked up the bus stairs, I noticed immediately, and much to my dismay, my flirtatious friend in the front seat. He sat alone. He beamed and asked me if I was alone, and if I would sit with him. I did and found him to be delightful company. He made me laugh, and I love laughing.

The bus took us to the Edison Hotel on Time's Square. I couldn't believe it. The place I had always sworn I'd avoid on New Year's Eve, but I was looking forward to the evening. I had an escort and he had a joint. The brazen man had planned to bring it onto the plane. In a panic I had flushed what little I had down the toilet. It wasn't very good anyway – remnants of stuff I'd grown in Vermont the previous summer.

In my room I called a friend in SoHo to find out the address in London of a mutual friend of ours – a gay pianist. It was nice talking to him; a marked improvement over our last encounter the summer before, at which time I made the mistake of sleeping with him when I would have preferred to sleep alone. I remembered how much fun he could be, and he wished me a good trip.

I tried to call some friends in Vermont who I thought would be partying, but couldn't reach them. Instead, I wrote a couple of letters. I like to write letters.

The marijuana was quite good. We went into Nathan's shortly afterward and I was most high there. The whole scene was very bizarre. It was very crowded and everyone seemed very high.

An old woman sat down with us and related a lengthy tale. Like most of the people there, she appeared a bit insane. She made some disparaging remarks about blacks, and I grew more fond of Jack when he politely reprimanded her.

"Nymphomania may be considered another form of virginity if you wish; and as for Justine, she may never have been in love. Perhaps one day she will meet a man before whom all these tiresome chimeras will fade into innocence again."

Lawrence Durrell, Justine

It was after eleven o'clock and we were curious about the chaos out in the square. I found the crowd uncomfortable and threatening. Drunks were blowing horns in our ears, it was raining and ruining my new shoes and I had a lot of traveler's checks in my new pocketbook. Around 11:30 p.m. we ducked into a nearby bar as the crowds passed us going in the opposite direction – to the square. We had the place to ourselves and watched that famous ball descend at midnight on television. I empathized with the post-rush ecstacy the bartenders and waiters were experiencing.

Jack and I talked of our intended routes of travel. I spoke about a friend in Strasbourg, France whom I picked hitch-hiking in Montreal and showed him where I lived in Vermont. He loved the state, we became good friends and he stayed a week with me before heading for New York.

I had been haunted by the fear that I would never get out of the airport in Luxembourg because of the language barrier, and I conveyed this apprehension to Jack. He told me not to worry and that I should first head toward Amsterdam as everyone spoke English and that, after spending some time there, I should become adept at traveling and communicating in a foreign culture. It sounded like a good idea and I had heard exciting things about that city. Jack said he thought he might go back himself as he had a great time there on his last trip. I asked if I could join him and he was thrilled. At this point I felt very comfortable with him and was thoroughly enjoying his sense of humor. I was apprehensive, though, about sleeping with him as I assumed I probably would later do. I'm always uncomfortable the first time I sleep with someone, especially when I'm not sexually attracted to the person.

Later, as he stroked my body, he said I was a goddess, said he couldn't believe I was there with him. It didn't go badly. It was dark and over quickly.

We left for the airport the next afternoon after lunch. I was really liking Jack, and very much relieved that he had assumed responsibility for my welfare. Well-prepared, Jack had a bottle of brandy in his small valise. On the plane we ordered two sodas and lavishly mixed brandy with them. My circumstances and the brandy made me feel quite euphoric and we talked freely. I told him I had been employed by Planned Parenthood for a couple of years and, as is usual when I make a reference to that experience, a conversation about sex ensued. Before long we were kissing, and fondling each other's genitals. I climaxed before he (a unique experience for me), so I slid below my long coat, under which I concealed my obscene gestures, and proceeded to complete the adventure. Everyone on the plane appeared to be sleeping. Shortly afterward, we stopped briefly in Iceland, and a stewardess winked at me as I walked off the plane.

Jack became more possessive of me than any man I'd ever known. He said that I was everything he had ever hoped of finding in a woman. He talked of my meeting his family and of all the things we would do when I returned to America – when my funds expired. He was getting ludicrous. He claimed that every man with whom I spoke or who even looked at me was overwhelmed with concupisence. I could see that our days together were numbered.

Jack didn't believe in traveller's checks, and had $1,000 in cash in his boots. One afternoon while napping in a hotel room in Luxumbourg, I dreamt I killed him, stole his money and got caught. Even while dreaming, I knew I was incapable of committing the crime.

In Amsterdam he once again played my knight in shining armor. He insisted on carrying my absurdly overstocked suitcase. (Later I gave him jeans that were uncomfortably tight on me and a flannel shirt that made me feel awkward because I thought it looked too masculine.) In the cab he made the mistake of asking the driver where we could buy some cannabis, and the driver took us to an incredible dive of a hotel. When we saw the room, I had a constricting lump in my throat as I tried to be optimistic about our plight. Jack said I was too good for a place like that and demanded our money back. We trudged around for at least a half-hour before we found a nice, reasonably-priced place on a canal. We were both very much relieved and happy again.

We showered and changed, and went out on the town. I found it delightful that Heiniken was on tap everywhere.

We spent almost a week there. On the second night Jack said he wanted to get some hash. We walked around town until Jack saw some potential dealers and no one else within earshot. He asked if they were selling hash, and purchased enough to loosely fill a cigarette box. They were quite amused by Jack. He went through such outrageous contortions to test the hash and seemed to get high from just smelling it.

We made a pipe from the cardboard portion of a roll of toilet paper, and got pleasantly high. I find physical intimacies more pleasant when high.

Friday night the streets were filled with people eddying one way or another. We roamed all about town, stopping at bars as they struck our fancy. On a street near a hazy discoteque, we were reprimanded by some Dutch students for being American and responsible for Allende's death and the plight of Chile.

For the evening's finale, we walked, unawares, into a very crowded gay bar. Jack must have been very drunk, because he didn't notice for some time the obvious nature of the clientele's sexuality. In the midst of a conversation, Jack looked about startled and outraged.

for, an accurate clear perception of the world around them. This comes through many hours of meditation, which is what the practice of Buddhism ultimately revolves around.

Whitehorn explained that this gained perspective is not only fulfilling, but useful as well. "It (meditation) lets you see a lot of the things going on in your mind. You see plans and worries for what they really are. It's very practical, but not if you're interested in creating fantastic frames of mind."

Thus, Tibetan meditation is set apart from the stereotyped image of meditation: a person attempting to find an altered state of consciousness, a new reality. The term nirvana is often applied here, but according to Whitehorn, it has little to do with the aspirations involved with Tibetan Buddhism. "In our approach," said Whitehorn, "you go beyond nirvana, because nirvana is conditional, there has to be something that is not-nirvana." That "something" according to Whitehorn, is called samsara, which is defined as the normal state of confusion and neurosis dualistic with nirvana. "Nirvana is not the point at all," he added, "the goal in Tibetan Buddhism is transcendent knowledge, which goes beyond nirvana and samsara both. It's being right where it's all going on."

Spiegel maintains that Tibetan meditation is often mistaken as an escapist-oriented practice. "It (meditation) isn't a way of getting through life's hassles, it's a way of dealing with life's hassles."

Whitehorn echoed this point, "It's a hoax to tell people that life will get easy when you practice Buddhism. To fully experience life is to accept that it is not easy. That's the first Noble Truth of Buddha, that life is not easy."

THREE JEWELLS AND A PARADOX

Tibetan Buddhism, through the interaction of three principles, called the three jewels. They are the Buddha the dharma, and the sangha.

The Buddha principle is the inspirational assumption that enlightenment can be achieved by an ordinary human being. In fact, added Whitehorn, "it can be immediately obtainable; how you relate to things in the next second is up to you."

The Dharma is the path which leads to an awakened mind. This means/ends relationship, however, is reciprocal. The path is also the goal.

The Sangha is the community of people who are inspired by the Buddha to follow the Dharma. The person who attains "wakefulness" has not reached some spiritual plateau, and it does not mean that he is a good person, as opposed to a bad person, because the concepts "good" and "bad" are meaningless when dealing with all the aspects of the self.

Thus, it should not be surprising that people at Karme-Choling are allowed to partake in cigarettes and liquor. Such indulgences are part of the "neuroses of the mind," explained Spiegel. "They are aspects in us that we have to live with and deal with." Pot smoking is forbidden, however, primarily because of its illegality. Karme-Choling, which has made one recent court appearance concerning their tax-exemption, wants to avoid another. "Also," said Spiegel, "getting stoned tends to introvert the person, so that he doesn't take responsibility for himself. When you're drunk, your actions are loud and expressive, and even if they aren't great, they are out in the open and have to be dealt with." Apparently, however, drunken behavior at the Center is infrequent.

While Karme-Choling contains some aspects of the outside world, it obviously neglects others. Staff members, who for the most part can leave the center only once every two weeks, have a decidedly limited contact with the "other reality" outside of the center. Thus there is a subtle paradox. Karme-Choling, which has a philosophy that avidly maintains Tibetan meditation seeks no alternative reality, has ironically produced just that.

The conception of dharmadhatu, Burlington's local Tibetan Buddhist center.

Not that its residents can be considered false, or escapists, for it seems that they are hard-working students and teachers of Buddhism. But one must consider the fact that those who reside at Karme-Choling indeed have assumed a place in "another" reality.

Tibetan Buddhism is nonetheless an intriguing discipline. It is a very down-to-earth practice whose concepts can be explored without churches, rituals, or holiday traffic jams. The only thing you really need is yourself. All of it.

Before you spend more than $630 for a stereo system, make sure it sounds better than this one.

Upon credit approval System $630 may be purchased with $63 down and $20.36 a month*

Our customers, our friends, have been saying great things about our stereo systems. The reason is simple, we match individual components to each other to provide a perfect matchup of components at the lowest price then we guarantee your satisfaction or your money back.

System $630 is a harmonious blend of superior components:

The New Advent loudspeakers

(utility) will reproduce even the low 30 cycle note that occurs on Strauss' "Also Sprach Zararathrustra" as room-shakingly as one could ask provided the note is even on the record (it is on the London Recording CS-6000) Part of the unrestrained clarity and "open" quality of the Advents is due to the excellent power response at high frequency, and part of the simplicity of its two-way design. We believe the true test of a loudspeaker's greatness begins when you stop listening to the speaker, and begin listening to the music. The Advents are that way.

The New Technics SA300 stereo receiver

produces clean sound, so clean, in face (.04% THD at full rated power, 3 5 RMS/channel) receiver-introduced distortion is unaudible. There is more to tell about this receiver than just clean power, like the highly sensitive FM section, with Phase lock loop circuitry for stability; high selectivity is achieved with ceramic filters in the IF section. The phono section is equally great, with a S/N ratio of 90dB. This receiver is destined to be acclaimed a best buy we're already sure it is. Where most prepackaged systems usually lessen in quality, our system $630 shines!

The New Technics SL220 semi-automatic turntable

is a best drive system using a (frequency controlled) servo controlled DC motor. It's precision design provides performance that is surprisingly close to the world-famous Technics direct drives. Wow and flutter are held to an amazing .045% WRMS, while rumble, measured according to DINB is -70dB. The SL220 also incorporates a dual Gimble tone arm for almost frictionless, error-free tracking. We've also equipped this performer with the Audio Technica AT11E stereo cartridge.

It's a fantastic Stereo System, one that we would buy.

Each of these components, the large Advents, the Technics receiver, the Technics turntable, and the Audio Technica cartridge stand alone as top performers. Each excells in performance versus dollar cost, and when each component compliments the other to the degree that it does in System $630 it's invincible. That's why we're clearly saying before you spend more than $630 for a stereo system, make sure it sounds better than this one.

(Cash isn't the only way you may purchase System $630. Financing is available to qualified customers. Often, approval is obtained the same day. So come in early and listen to System $630.) *Based on 36 monthly installments with A.P.R. of 17.5%.

The newly formed Environmental Club aims to extend the campus environmental movement beyond the boudaries of Robinson Hall.

By Sue Kashanski

Meeting in Robinson Hall last Sunday, the UVM Environmental Club laid the groundwork for this semester's club activities. Functioning as a coordinating group for environmental concerns on campus, the club will focus on energy conservation, paper recycling, smoking regulations, alternative energy sources, wildlife preservation, and environmental awareness and communications.

The UVM Environmental Club was established last spring in an effort to bring environmental action to the whole campus, rather than remaining isolated in Robinson Hall and other similar groups. The club will work independently of but cooperatively with Robinson as well as VPIRG and the L/L Environmental Communications Suite.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

The energy conservation work begun on campus last year will be continued this semester by a project group in the Environmental Club. The focus of this group will be to educate students about the easy, practical ways to save energy on campus or at home in an effort to decrease student energy consumption.

A slide/tape show and discussion session will be sponsored in each of the dormitories on campus, emphasizing the role of the student in campus conservation. One possible outcome of the project will be a stabilization of room costs because of these efforts. Presently one fifth of the cost of a room at UVM goes toward utilities. A decrease in utility usage could conceivably affect that cost.

SMOKING

Are you concerned about the effects of smoking on your health – whether or not you're a smoker? If so, then maybe you should contact the Environmental Club's Anti-smoking project. As more facts emerge about the health hazards of cigarette smoke, more action is taking place across the U.S. and abroad to educate the public and to limit public smoking for non-smoker protection.

California has proposed Proposition 5, the Clean Indoor Air Act, which if passed will prohibit smoking in practically all public facilities as well as private businesses.

On a smaller but equally serious scale, the UVM Environmental club will investigate the present status of the smoking issue on campus, will engage in educational efforts, and propose action for limiting the areas on campus where smoking is allowed.

RECYCLING

5000 lbs. of paper – that's a 1977 estimate of how much newspaper is thrown out each week by UVM students. Multiply that figure by the number of weeks in a school year and you come out with an astronomical sum representing mountains of wasted paper.

This example of excessive waste is part of the impetus behind the revitalized Robinson Recycling Project. Environmental Club members will concentrate on the topic of recycling and its connection with resource conservation, while Robinson members and E.S.I. students, headed by Jed Cramer, will run the weekly paper pick-up across campus.

According to Cramer, the last two weekly loads of paper have weighed in at the Burlington Paper Stock Co. at between 600 and 700 lbs. each. At 35 cents/100 lbs., the money received for these loads has been just enough to keep the recycling project economically viable. Cost of the project includes gas for the van, paper bins, and publicity materials.

There are places to leave papers for recycling in each of the dorms or dorm complexes on campus. Off campus students can bring papers to Billings or Robinson Hall on Redstone campus.

If you are interested in becoming involved, the next meeting will be Oct. 15 at 6:30 in the Robinson Hall Lounge. For information Conservation call Sue Kashanski at 862-9629, Smoking call Ellen Greenberg at x3086, Recycling contact Jed Cramer x3084.

Aqua Terrorism Hits Campus

By Darcie McCann

One night, not so long ago, I found myself in the Living/Learning — snackbar, enjoying my evening ritual of a cookie sandwich after running. Leaving the snackbar I happened to notice what seemed like hundreds of people marching by armed with buckets. Little was I to know until I heard that now infamous battlecry, "hit the snackbar" what was to be my fate. Dodging tables and jumping chairs I headed for temporary safety in the SAGA kitchen. My safety was not long because I was followed and promptly doused by twenty slug-faced Redstoners. Now is the time for a retrospective look back at those avante-garde guerillas.

It was hardly three weeks ago, on a dark, blustery night, that the MAT complex and L/L battled it out for over two hours. What started out as a shouting contest of disclaiming the other dorm's worth (to say it nicely) erupted into a full-scale brawl — the war to end all wars complete with cheerleaders from both dorms. Crash military tactics courses were set up hurriedly in the separate halls in an effort to teach the soldiers, and future leaders of America, the basics of aqua fighting. One such tactic seen in action was the MAT's distinctive march, the water gait, the 'only underwater march of its type. First floor bathrooms were converted to makeshift loading areas. Offensively, there were many old stand-by tricks that proved to be effective in both dorms' cases.

The MAT made extensive use of B-16's and B-52's (water balloons and the distance they traveled) to an advantage over the Living/Learning Army, with frequent bombardments spewn from various floors within the complex. Also used by the MAT offensive was guerrilla warfare and aggressive artillery lines.

Living/Learning's attack was based on barrage attack (also called the "Niagra Falls effect").

Both armies made heavy use of merceneries, mostly students from other dorms. Occasionally both armies had to rely on regressive tactics, namely swimming back to camp and hurling metal buckets at the opponent.

Casualty reports so far have been conflicting. The L/L AP wire reports heavy losses on the MAT side: structural damage, soggy paper towels, and three cases of the bends. They added that there were no damages to their own troops and facilities.

However, the MAT Express Wire stated that L/L had suffered heavy damage in the fireplace area, and ten cases of water on the knee, while their own army was dry and in good spirits.

It is expected that the actual amount of damage is somewhere between the two reports.

The Cynic was able to acquire an exclusive interview with the person who started the All-Campus Waterfight of September 20th. Although wishing to remain anonymous, he allowed that he is an undergraduate, living in Wing Hall. Preferring to be called Lake Skywater because of this person's force in starting this conflict, he stated, "I lived in Simpson for two years and they (Simpson & Wright) had the reputation for starting waterfights for the past two years and I didn't want the reputation stopped just like that. My roommate called up Simpson and threatened them with water and I called Wright. So., the blame can go to Simpson and Wright."

What started out as a 2½ down civil war solely within Redstone Campus turned into a full campus war. Two hundred or more troops emanated from the Redstone area to perpetrate the surprise attaek. The "Reds" attacked Harris-Millis, MAT, L/L, the Shoeboxes and McAuley, all by surprise. What started out as just innocent people roaming their respective dorms turned into dampening of many spirits across the university. During this momentary cease-fire, forces from East and Main Campus have regrouped and military strategists are planning to get much needed land back from the "Reds."

It has been rumored that this is what the following sections of campus want:

East Campus

(1) Gymnasium — will torture the students into agreement by shortening and even denying the rights to the indoor track, tennis courts, racquetball, squash and the pool. (The water will remain in the pool).

(2) Living/Learning—Store Dining Area, Harris-Millis — They want to deprive the rest of the campus of the SAGA facilities. That's food for thought.

(3) Library — While reserved, when talking to me, it seemed apparent that the East Campus wishes to shelf any ideas of teaching military courses there because they're all booked up. Repair will have to be made on the library which has already been attacked. Reconstruction of this addition should be complete in several years.

Main Campus Demands

(1) Waterman — The Main Campuses retain a good sense of humor and wish this building as a play on words on the waterfight only. The female floors want the Mail room.

(2) Billings — The lounges, "the Den," and the Store are first priority in the hearts of these proud people.

(3) Given — Medical Buildings — Again they want this to pun-ish the remainder of the campus, sort of a "Given and take" situation.

Eggs, Cholesterol, and Atherosclerosis: A Rebuttal

By Barry Gustin

Recently, a disconcerting report was published by a prominent member of the University of Vermont's faculty, Dr. Lyndon B. Carew. The article entitled "They Aren't Such Bad Eggs" appears in the August 7th and 14th editions of Feedstuffs, a magazine of the animal feed industry. The content of this paper forms the basis of information he presents to an impressionable group of students in the university's most popular nutrition course.

In the report, Dr. Carew presented evidence from three scientific studies which showed that the addition of one or two eggs to the diet of healthy subjects produced no significant overall increase in blood cholesterol levels. He concluded that eating eggs will not contribute to the development of atherosclerosis, a disease of the blood vessels, which normally progresses in the presence of "elevated" serum cholesterol levels.

These conclusions assume the soundness of the premise that present-day average blood cholesterol levels in the U.S. are normal. "Average" does not necessarily mean "ideal."

Population Studies

A comparison of vegetarians and primitive people having a low incidence of atherosclerosis to Americans having a high incidence gives an indication of what "healthy" blood cholesterol levels are.

Studies of rural Guatemalan Indians and Kalahari Bushmen whose dietary cholesterol intake is sharply lower than in westernized societies, have exhibited blood cholesterol levels that rarely exceed 180mg/dl. (Mendez J. et al American Journal Clinical Nutrition 10:403,1962) (Miller K. Arch. Intern. Med. 121:414, 1968)

Studies of the Seventh-Day Adventists, a vegetarian church group in the U.S., reveal serum cholesterol levels significantly lower than those of the general population, the level coinciding closely with a decreased consumption of saturated fat and cholesterol. (West R.O. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 21:853, 1968). The incidence of coronary heart disease has been reported to be approximately 40% less among the Seventh-Day Adventist males than among males in the general population of the U.S. (Wynder E.L. Cancer 12:1016, 1959)

It is usually the case that when the mean serum cholesterol levels of populations are very low (e.g. 140-175 mg/dl), clinical coronary heart disease and severe coronary atherosclerosis are rare. (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 163)

In America, at least 30% of the population have plasma cholesterol levels greater than 250 mg/dl. (Reiser R. Amer. J. Clin Nutr. 31:865, 1978). The renowned Framingham Study indicated that plasma cholesterol levels above 180 mg/dl constitutes an ever increasing risk for coronary heart disease in adults (Kannel W.B. et al Ann. Intern. Med. 74:1, 1971). A majority of adults in the U.S. with coronary disease, in fact, have plasma cholesterol levels of 220 mg/dl or above (Connor W.E. Prev. Med. 1:49, 1972)

Unfortunately, the American "norm" is anything but ideal and carries with it a several-fold increased risk of developing atherosclerotic heart disease when compared with the incidence of the disease in relatively unaffected cultures. In other words, average American serum cholesterol levels are already pathogenic; that is, they are sufficiently high as to result in the present-day epidemic of atherosclerosis in the country.

Hereditary factors as a primary cause of high blood cholesterol levels for all but a few percent of those at risk, have been ruled out by human migration studies. Those individuals who migrate from an area of low cardiovascular disease to an area of high cardiovascular disease rapidly acquire the high blood level characteristic of their host population. This has been demonstrated with Japanese migrants living in Hawaii or California (Keys A. et al Ann. Intern. Med. 48:83, 1958)

Close inspection of Dr. Carew's paper shows that he is quoting studies which have an inherent defect in their approach. This defect tends to invalidate the conclusions he derives from the data.

Dr. Carew assumes that because the feeding of one to two additional eggs per day produce no increase in blood cholesterol levels, the cholesterol of eggs is not a factor in the pathogenesis of atherosclerosis. This is an erroneous assumption. Dr. Carew fails to consider that the subjects of these studies may have already exhibited a near maximum response to a diet previously high in cholesterol. An additional egg or two would then have no significant effect.

Evidence has elsewhere been presented which postulates a dietary "threshold" of cholesterol intake above which no simple linear effect of diet on serum cholesterol levels is exerted (Connors W.E. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 31:727, 1978). Connors reports that most Americans already ingest dietary cholesterol above this threshold. Metabolic studies have shown that this dietary threshold appears to be within the range of 500 to 600 mg. per day (two eggs). (Beveridge J.M. J. Nutr. 71:61, 1960). These threshold observations are consistent with the data presented by Dr. Carew but are not consistent with Dr. Carew's interpretation. The importance of this observation is that as most Americans age and show ever-increasing maximum response levels to diets high in cholesterol, atherosclerosis becomes an inevitable consequence. Autopsy studies in Americans clearly demonstrate that coronary atheroscherosis is virtually omnipresent in our adult population (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 47).

Numerous detailed studies in humans have indicated that dietary cholesterol in amounts ranging from 200 to 1000 mg/day will produce a 15% to 30% elevation in blood cholesterol only when the base-line diets have been low in cholesterol (summarized by Connors, Amer. J. Cli. Nutr.) One study showed that blood cholesterol levels in subjects ingesting a diet containing an amount of cholesterol equivalent to two to three eggs a day increased approximately 25% over levels measured on a cholesterol-free diet. (Mattson F.H. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 25:589, 1972). This elevation will in many cases match average American adult levels and will conclusively increase the risk of developing atherosclerotic heart disease.

He raised himself and said loudly: "Faggots! I hate cock-sucking faggots. They're disgusting."

I was appalled and alarmed. Though he deserved retribution for his heinous remark, I was grateful that his comment went either unnoticed or was ignored. I asked the young man who took our coats to please bring them, and gave him a generous tip because I usually believe in over-tipping and, in this instance, hoped to placate him as well in the event he had heard.

Once out on the street, I conveyed my embarrassment and anger. I told him that some of my best friends were homosexuals, and that I was bisexual. (This was an exaggeration. Only in fantasy had I ever made love to or with a woman.)

"Dyke! Cunt-lapper!" were his retorts to my revelation. I told him I was leaving him in the morning. He muttered something unintelligible.

The next morning he followed me to the train station offering me apologies, begging me to remain with him or to promise to meet him in Madrid.

As I sat in the compartment on the train, he pressed his face against my window offering me a kiss. Suddenly, he disappeared and, seconds later, reappeared at my door. To the middle-aged, conservative-looking, British couple sitting across from me, he said: "Isn't she beautiful; how I wish she would stay with me."

"Why don't you go with him?" the man replied.

"She's got a boyfriend in Strasbourg," Jack said as I cringed.

The train groaned its rumble of departure, and he finally left.

The British man scrutinized me. "You are an American?"

"Yes," I replied.

"One in every port," he mumbled.

Chicken And Egg

what concerns us here is that even the high fat, low cholesterol diet caused regression to occur although only 65% of the total regression encountered in the low fat, low cholesterol animals (Armstrong M.L. Circ. Res. 27:59, 1970 and 30:675, 1972).

Thus dietary cholesterol contributed to the development of atherosclerosis and its removal from the diet caused the plaques (cholesterol buildup on artery walls) of atherosclerosis to regress. Recent studies have also shown that atherosclerotic lesions were substantially reversed in human patients by adopting a diet low in saturated fat and cholesterol (Barndt R. Ann. Int. Med. 86:139, 1977) (Wissler R.W. Ann. N.Y. Acad. Sci. 275: 363, 1976).

All of the above is powerful evidence linking dietary components to atherosclerosis. The consumption of eggs is one important factor in the genesis of high blood cholesterol. There is, however, a select minority of people on a global scale that have an especially efficient internal feedback mechanism capable of keeping blood cholesterol low even in the presence of a high dietary input of cholesterol. The Masai tribe in Africa, for example, have a diet high in saturated fat and cholesterol yet their serum cholesterol levels remain low. The catch-22, however, is that atherosclerosis is still quite extensive. Thus, it appears that the composition of the diet is the primary consideration in spite of serum cholesterol levels. Data from animal experiments support these facts (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 58).

be implemented at all levels only if Federal and State governments adopted a national nutritional policy that would have as its top priority nutritional health instead of the present-day model tainted with corporate interests.

From a base-line diet low in cholesterol, eggs have been shown to cause highly significant increases in serum cholesterol levels. This is scientific fact. The levels arrived at in collaboration with saturated fat encompass the American average — a pathogenic average. In fact, no culture in the world has a high rate of coronary heart disease the data, it is useful to examine experiments performed on animals. In dozens of species, high cholesterol diets, in combination with saturated fat or alone, have produced atherosclerosis. An important study was conducted with rhesus monkeys, a close biological relative to humans.

A high saturated fat, high cholesterol diet which approximated the average American diet was fed for 17 months to thirty monkeys. Ten were sacrificed and extensive atherosclerosis was observed. The other twenty were split into two groups: one ate a low fat, low cholesterol diet; the other ate a high fat, low cholesterol diet. After 40 months, all animals were sacrificed. The researchers found a tremendous reversal of the atherosclerotic lesions as compared to the original ten animals for both groups. The low fat, low cholesterol group had the greatest regression with a blood flow increased by 400%. But

"Close inspection of Dr. Carew's paper shows that he is quoting studies which have an inherent defect in their approach."

Dr. Carew suggests that it would be better to test the response of a particular patient before assuming that serum cholesterol will increase when whole eggs are included in the diet. This is a worthy consideration, however, it is irrelevant and unrealistic. No matter what the serum cholesterol levels are, atherosclerosis seems unavoidable when a diet high in saturated fat and/or cholesterol is consumed. Besides, an effective screening program designed to reach all individuals cannot at this time be successfully implemented. The cost factor is too great.

A more favorable cost-efficient approach would be mass prevention, the ultimate objective being the formulation of a diet that would not result in elevated serum cholesterol levels for the majority of the population. This approach could without a diet rich in saturated fat and cholesterol (and the high blood cholesterol levels such a diet usually produces). Eggs, when part of a diet already containing large quantities of red meat, and whole fat milk products could only compound the danger. This risk is also increased when hypertension, diabetes, overweight, cigarette smoking, and a positive family history for the disease are present. But it is well to note that diet is the key factor among the multiple factors involved in the etiology and pathogenesis of atherosclerotic disease. Without the nutritional prerequisites for atherosclerotic disease (i.e. high saturated fat → high cholesterol diet), hypertension and cigarette smoking ceases to be coronary heart disease risk factors. Thus, they are secondary to dietary considerations (Stamler Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 126 and 140).

Perhaps this rebuttal will have shed additional light on the controversy.

I'M MAD AS HELL AND I WON'T TAKE IT ANYMORE...

A Fair Shake

On Saturday the Board of Trustees passed a resolution to ask the legislature for an appropriation increase of more than two million dollars in both Fiscal Year (FY) '80 and '81 (article p. 3). If approved, resident tuition will remain constant over the next two years. If not, it will either have to increase or the university will be forced into deficit spending. Neither alternative is acceptable.

The administration, under the leadership of President Coor, has worked extremely hard in presenting an articulate, balanced budget proposal to be sent to the governor. Great sacrifices have been made to curtail costs and trim excess while simultaneously allowing for the critically needed faculty pay raises. In light of these efforts, we urge the legislature to approve the appropriation request in its entirety.

It's about time the legislature discarded its false notion that UVM is filled with free spending hedonists and allot the university the money it needs to provide quality education. If the present trend continues, UVM will be compelled to accept more out-of-state students who can afford to pay the bills and run the risk of becoming a non-Vermont dominated institution.

Sign The Petition!

Over the past several weeks, students for progressive agricultural development (SPADE) have been meeting in the interest of redefining the educational priorities of the College of Agriculture. The students believe that more attention should be devoted to the needs of small-scale, diversified and organic farming, rather than the agribusiness focus of many Ag courses. SPADE members are researching existing inadequacies and circulating a petition through classes and at a table in Billings. We strongly urge that UVM students sign the petition and support SPADE's work in any other way possible.

Looking over a state that has lost more than twenty thousand farms in the last thirty years, it's hard to believe that Vermont was once the bread basket of the thirteen colonies. Just 100 years ago, Vermont was still self-sufficient in agricultural production; now we import eighty-five percent of our food. Our tremendous dependency on external food sources costs consumers millions of dollars each year, while formerly productive Vermont farms return to forest.

An Unsettling Mixture at UVM

To the Editor:

I was glad to see two commentaries on minorities in the October fifth issue of the Cynic. However, the writers simplified the issue apropos the average student here. One-hundred thirty minority students out of a total enrollment of 7400 is a fantasy, especially when one finds the remaining 7,270 students representing a production line of manufactured American WASP dolls.

UVM is hardly, as L. Howard states in his article, "an institution that will prepare one to go out in the world," because the "real" world is not composed of thousands of white, conservative middle-class persons. The only similarities UVM has in common with the outside world is alcoholism and baseball.

I arrived at this university two years ago from a wealthy suburban town composed of a mixture of blacks, white Jews, Catholics and Protestants. As a Jew, I never felt discriminated against, nor did I limit my sphere of friends to just my race, religion or income-class. However, at UVM I feel weird in my classes when just one black is sitting in a room full of 100 students, when before – at home – there was a natural mixture.

As time goes on however, and Christmas comes, I begin to feel quite in the minority, and must succumb to the majority. Furthermore, I am tired of being asked, what did you get for Christmas? as if there was nothing but! When was the last time you were invited to a W-D-W Chanukah cocktail party? And does anyone believe that Jewish girls are not J.A.P.'s? (Isn't L.L. Bean to the WASPs what Bloomingdales is to the Jews?)

As a Jew, I feel uncomfortable at this university, because so many stereotypes are carried to the point of absolute truth – due to the ignorance of many, content in their simple world. I give credit to those 130 "minority" students for remaining at UVM for more than one year, without transferring to a school that provides a genuine taste of a mixture of people that prepares one for future ventures in that "real" world out there.

The Infirmary: Professional, Caring

To the Editor:

I'm presently a sophomore student who, for unfortunate reasons, has found it necessary to take a medical leave of absence.

This letter has two purposes. The first is to discard the many preconceived judgments that the Infirmary is an inefficient, unkind medical institution. After spending twelve days in the infirmary, I've realized that even though the staff is extremely busy, they are also very efficient. They have done everything possible to aid in my healing, keep me comfortable, and keep my spirits high. They incessantly repeat, "Just give us a call whenever you need us!" Now that's a reassuring, comforting thought in itself!

The second is to express my sincerest thanks to the entire Infirmary staff. Their professional medical care and unrelenting thoughtfulness well deserves praise and thanks.

I hope that I've caused many of you to take a serious look at the infirmary. You can't always believe what others have spoken or written. But for the sake of your health and well-being, please think about this first hand information. You may, someday, need to visit the Infirmary!

Sincerely,
Jeanne Kelly

Beware of the Campus Crook

To the Editor:

I would like to voice a gripe that seems to be more and more common. Last night when I was studying at Bailey, I left my carroll for ten minutes, only to return and find my wallet missing from the zipper pocket of my knapsack.

Earlier this semester, my wallet was stolen from my dorm room in Harris/Millis. The door was ajar and my roommate was only two doors down. When I returned, we discovered both wallets missing. We recovered the wallets a few days later, of course with no money.

It's unfortunate we can't trust our fellow students. I realize that I can't appeal to the thieves, but I'd like to warn others to be careful and to keep your eyes open! In both cases there were several people nearby, yet no one noticed anything unusual. At the very least we can make it more difficult for the thief.

Sincerely,
Sue Schwartz

How About a Hand?

To the Editor:

I will not belabor a scenario that is all too blatant. We all know how hard it is to find an apartment, let alone one which is close to campus, affordable and liveable. But my gripe is simple; I wish UVM would accept a little more responsibility.

UVM, there is a lot that you can do. For instance, residential life might take a more active role in finding apartments and it could ensure that landlords do not discriminate against student tenants. The university could make a stand for rent control and encourage the town to build more low income apartments instead of destroying them. Or the university could consider the prospects of either renting, buying or building university apartments.

Without some help from UVM, the housing situation will only grow worse. How long will it be before some of us decide to pitch tents in Centennial woods?

Pyramid Mall - A Fairy Tale

By Scott Sartorius

Once upon a time there was a small town named Split that was way up in the northern section of a small state named Selling. As a state, Selling was beautiful – rolling green pastures in the summertime, blazing, colorful trees in the autumn, and snow-capped mountains in the wintertime. Many of the inhabitants of Selling spent most of their time farming or working in rural-oriented jobs, but a large portion of the tax revenues taken in by the Selling government were from tourist dollars.

In time, though, Selling began to attract new inhabitants to their state from large, neighboring cities. Many of these new inhabitants shunned their old jobs in the cities to find new ones in Selling. These Flatlanders, as some called them, realized that to live and work in Selling, they would be earning far less money than they had in the cities, but felt the sacrifice would be worthwhile because of Selling's sheer beauty and clean air.

Split was an average town – two main roads, a school, fire department, police car and one tiny shopping center for the locals – affected only marginally by the Flatlanders. There was a lot of farmland in Split, and a great deal of it was owned by some people who held elective offices in town. Their land wasn't worth all that much, though, until one day...

It happened one March afternoon when a wicked, profiteering company called GREED, from a neighboring state called Careyland, took an option on 80 acres of land across the street from the town's gas pump. Rumors quickly circulated among the town's residents that the GREEDies wanted to build a huge Bowling Alley, but were quickly dispelled. The next rumor that surfaced was that the GREEDies were going to build a statue dedicated to the company's mascot, the Frog. This rumor, too, proved false before the local TV station could put it on the six o'clock news.

Finally, in August of the same year, the shroud that had surrounded the mystery was finally lifted when GREED presented its plans to the Split Planning Commission. The GREEDies told the town's planners they were going to build an 80-store shopping mall to be named The Kwebek Mall.

For the next year, the residents of Split formed two opposing groups, one was pro-GREED and one was anti-GREED, and neither was willing to give in to the other.

A number of town referendums were taken, and Split was nearly renamed Fickle. In the first vote, the pro-GREEDers won, and in the second vote, the anti-GREEDers won.

All along, the GREEDies had been applying for the Act 2000 permit, which they needed in order to begin construction, but because of the many technicalities involved in Act 2000, these permit hearings took longer than a year to complete.

Many of the residents of Split had grown bitter and Selling's governor, Nick Smelling, refused to take a stand on the Kwebek Mall. Everyone knew that Smelling was a business tycoon and always encouraged new business in the state, but he was up for re-election and couldn't be anti-GREED, because everyone also knew that his ex-campaign manager, Junken Green, was head of the panel that would decide on the fate of the Act 2000 permit.

When the Act 2000 permit was finally approved, and when the court appeals finally ended, the construction began. Within a year, nearly all of the surrounding land had been sub-divided by its now rich original owners, and scores of new Flatlanders and Froggies from the country to the North had begun to build new houses, estates and swimming pools.

The roads became congested with Cadillacs and station wagons, the town's air and water became polluted, the crime rate increased as did the accident rate, and Ronald McDonald made weekly appearances in the lobby of the new Montgomery Ward. Many of the native Split residents were forced to move out of town because they could no longer afford to pay the tax rate and because they were opposed to forced busing.

Shortly afterward, Split died a very unnatural death when it was forced to merge with its neighboring city, Girlington, which had gone into bankruptcy the year before. The Federal Government had decided to stop making loans to Girlington and suggested that Split and Girlington merge to join fiscal forces. They did not live happily ever after.

The rest is history.

********

Pardon my innuendo, but the continuing saga of the Pyramid Mall controversy will leap a major hurdle by the time this edition of the Cynic rolls off the presses. That is, by tonight (Thursday), the District 4 Environmental Commission will have made a decision on whether or not to grant the Pyramid Co. an Act 250 land-use permit.

Regardless of the outcome of that decision, the Pyramid issue will not yet be laid to rest. Any decision by the Commission can be appealed to the Environmental Board or to the Vermont Superior Court. And then there is always the Vermont Supreme Court for further appeals, so believe it, you have not heard the last about Pyramid.

Act 250 is divided into ten separate criteria, seven of which must be completely met before the Commission can grant its approval. The panel can, however, grant a "conditional" permit, with certain stipulations written into the approval which must be met by Pyramid before it can proceed.

If anyone's keeping score, and I am, Pyramid looks like it might be the winner as far as the Act 250 approval goes, but the major curve ball that Pyramid will have to deal with is Burlington.

Estimates have shown that the state is liable to lose about $150,000 annually, and that Burlington could lose as much as $1.6 million each year in tax revenues if the mall is built. Such a loss, to Burlington at any rate, would be nothing short of sheer devastation.

Pyramid has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in its legal battles and is not likely to give up easily should it lose.

So what? That's the risk they have to take – and they knew of such a risk from the very beginning.

Pyramid offers very little to the State of Vermont. If built, it will make the partners in Pyramid very rich, and there will be some landowners in Williston who will also make some money. Overall, however, this area has little to gain and lots to lose. But business being what business is, and politics being as devious as they can be, Pyramid stands a good chance of coming out fairly clean.

Let's hope not.

Galaxy Five: Solar Rubble

By Henry Chamberlain

The Mentauri Solar System was a depressed area that nevertheless offered some unparalleled beauty. Citizens of the region were poor, often functionally illiterate, and, as a result, somewhat behind the other planets of Galaxy Five. Its interest to the rest of the Galaxy was related to its strategic location.

Included in the intergalactic archives, back to the beginning of interplanetary space travel, cultures of the Galaxy had travelled through the economically depressed area to exchange with more affluent cultures in the bordering solar systems, namely the Etoen and Upeeron. Etoen was known for its spice riches while Upeeron was a monarchical assemblage of affluent traders.

As time went by, the Upeerons found it more expeditious to simply take over territories around the Galaxy instead of trading with them. There was a good defense for this disrespect of planetary sovereignty. Basically, the inhabitants of Upeeron, by virtue of their intellect, religion, and money, felt a need to help modernize the poor neglected races of the Galaxy. As a result of their efforts, they became rich while the people of the suppressed nations had the dubious benefit of their presence.

By the mid-7000's A.C. (After Planetary Colonization), the entire Mentauri Solar System was operated by the colonial powers of the Upeeron Solar System. A couple of intergalactic wars later, the planetary powers of the Galaxy decided that all colonial planets which were ready for self-rule would be granted their sovereignty. This was done, but before they left, the powers created the Planet of Istern out of the planetary holdings of the Pallys. Istern was at war for the first thirty years of its existence with its neighbors the Pallys as a result, leading to great inter-planetary tension.

A planet of interest at that time (7158) was Nonabel. Its location in the Solar System, close to the sun, gave it an ideal climate for the recreational enjoyment of citizens from the other planets of the Galaxy. Also, Nonabel had slowly evolved into a commercial center with much of the Galaxy's banking done from the Planet's capital city of Turibe.

One problem, the planet was divided up into two distinctly different religions, the Natsirhics and the Slemoms. In both religions the followers submitted to the will of an historical figure. For the Natsirhics it was Jay Corth, and for the Slemoms, it was big A little l, Al. Problems arose over the basic question of who was going to control the political processes of the planet, besides the foreign bankers.

In 7158, the two sides began fighting in a civil war. The Slemoms were tired of being dominated by the foreign supported Natsirhic Council. As Galactic monetary holdings were present, the powers of Galaxy Five responded quickly.

The interplanetary fighting machine of Ulsta beamed to the surface of Nonabel from their star cruisers. Calm quickly returned as did the Natsirhic Council. Peace reigned until the 7170's, in spite of two Mentauri interplanetary wars in 7167 and 7173 respectively.

However, with the political instability within Nonabel, and the planetary instability surrounding it, strife was inevitable. In the 7160's, the Pallys began using Nonabel to launch terrorist attacks upon Istern. Isternians, being an "eye for an eye" culture, repeatedly attacked the guerrilla's bases in Nonabel in retaliation.

Syond, a neighboring planet and enemy of Istern, did not like the Isternian intervention on its right flank. As a result, it became involved in the politics of Nonabel backing the Slemoms, who were ideologically similar. This support gave the Slemoms the impetus to once again attack the Natsirhics.

Thus, a devastating civil war began. The Lemoms (supported by the Syonds), and the Natsirhics (supported by the Isternians) fought savagely for more than five years. Deaths by the thousands were registered on both sides. Istern invaded Nonabel at one point, only to later be replaced by a Syondian invasion.

By 7178, the capital city of Turibe was rubble. Galactic banking was done elsewhere, and the beautiful tourist centers were memories. Despite the total devastation, the two sides, rather than tired of fighting, were even more bitter. Nonabel was a virtual wasteland.

The planets of Syond and Istern had taken their interplanetary conflict onto the Nonabelan people. As a consequence, Nonabel had been destroyed both culturally and economically.

After exhibiting little interest in the situation, the United Planets Organization finally intervened in 7178. It placed a peace keeping force on the planet to establish a stable councilar government. This it succeeded in doing, while ingrained religious tensions never departed. Nonabel did not begin to reconstruct the rubble left behind until well into the 7200's, a sorry consequence of religious tensions present in human nature and outside political intervention.

The Economics of an Education

To the Editor:

When a child is born, it requires the constant attention of at least one adult twenty-four hours a day. If the child is to develop as a healthy productive individual, this person will be needed until the child is eighteen years old. Once the child starts school, this person could be the school bus driver, policeman, counselor, athletic director, and so on. These people are provided by society in order to insure that the child has every opportunity to develop fully. If the cost of these individuals averages out to $2.50 an hour per child, the society will invest $60 a day, $21,900 a year, and $394,200 of its resources in developing and educating each eighteen year old youth. If, in the society as a whole, there are two children per family unit, the society will invest, in round figures, $200,000 of its resources in developing each eighteen year old youth. Would it be considered impractical or unprofitable for society to invest an additional $6,000, or $50 per academic hour, to provide these individuals with a tuition free education through the college level and double their mental and productive efficiency?

Now, let us look at the matter as a sound and practical business investment. The median income of an individual with an eighth grade education or less is, in round figures, $5,000 a year, a high school graduate $10,000, and a college education $15,000 a year. If society invests $6,000 in order to provide an individual with a tuition free education through the college level and if the individual only pays twenty percent tax on the last $5,000 of his income, he will contribute $42,000 more in taxes during his forty-two years of productive life span than a high school graduate. A seven to one return on this investment is good business in any man's language.

What the GSU Is Meant to Be

To the Editor:

The college environment is substantially different from that of the "real" world. As a gay person, coming out as a student on campus is frequently easier than coming out later on. Naturally, this does not mean that being gay on campus is necessarily easy. Yet Gay student groups, while not universal, are becoming more and more common. The Gay Liberation Movement as a whole has actively organized to combat Gay oppression. The Gay Student Union at UVM is one small contribution to that growing movement.

Primarily, the Gay Student Union at UVM attempts to provide a support base for Gay people and re-educate the community about homosexuality. The programs we have coordinated to accomplish this task include a Speaker's Bureau whose members speak to many classes on topics which include homosexuality and related issues. The Home Economics Department, the Sociology Department, the English Department, Counseling and Testing, the Medical School, to name a few, have taken advantage of this service. In addition, we sponsor a Gay Switchboard five nights a week. Essentially, the Switchboard provides Gay students and others an opportunity to talk about their feelings with supportive people.

The GSU has over sixty members. Because of the nature of the organization, many students are apprehensive about attending meetings for the first time. The GSU is in the process of examining possible solutions to the situation. Presently, we hold meetings and informal get-togethers the first and third Sundays of every month at seven o'clock (7 p.m.) in Billings Marsh Lounge. Everyone is invited to attend regardless of their sexual preference. If you are apprehensive about attending meetings, call the Switchboard and discuss your feelings. No names need be given and all calls are confidential. Our office is located on the second floor of Billings Center, adjacent to the Student Legal Service.

Finally as an officially recognized Student Association organization, the Gay Student Union desires to be an integral part of the UVM community. Our potential is enormous and our value as a resource could be extremely beneficial, especially in educating ignorant people about homosexuality. It is my belief that education is a central part of changing attitudes, and what better place to change attitudes than an institution ostensibly established for the purpose of education?

Wilda L. White
President
Gay Student Union

A Pitiful Role as Apologist

To the Editor:

It is high time that people wake up to the fact that Jerry Rubin is one of the many political-cultural agents who has served the interests of a conspiratorial elite by promoting an incredibly distorted perspective of political reality.

The fact that most students take on face value, the babble that Rubin has been spewing forth in his modified incarnation, clearly demonstrates how susceptible intelligent adults can be to a well-funded and sophisticated brain-washing campaign.

The Cynic's pitiful acceptance of the role of apologist for the pie-throwing incident only accentuates and perpetuates the widespread gullibility of a student body that should know better.

My compliments to the pieman.

A Funny Thing Happened At My Visit to the Forum

By Randy McMullen

My accomplice and I had a rather intriguing time at the Montreal Forum. The crowd there seemed very image-conscious, very much concerned with the way they looked, walked, talked, and even the way they smoked hashish. The security was mean, and the music was played at a dangerously high volume. Our adventures there were such that I feel compelled to construct a mini-log of our experience.

8:00 p.m.

We arrive at the Forum after being told by a group of Canadian girls that the building is the "other way" (each girl pointed in a different direction). At the first five doors we enter, we are snarled at by security officers for choosing the wrong door.

8:10

We find two temporary seats that are closer to the stage than those we paid for. Moments later, a rather large security officer asks for tickets, and subsequently shoves us toward the rear of the auditorium, ignoring my remarks concerning journalistic privileges. From his reaction, I wonder if we are the first to ever attempt sitting in the wrong seats at the Forum.

8:20

The warm-up band begins. They sound something like the band Boston only noisier and less creative, something like a clothes dryer full of starving cats. The girl to my left asks me what I am doing with a notebook, and as I am about to reply, her boyfriend pushes his face very close to mine. He is not smiling. He is wearing a Bachman-Turner Overdrive tee-shirt which barely covers his muscular trunk. I apologize for my inexcusable forwardness and turn to watch the show.

8:45

The warm-up band, whose name I have not bothered to find out, mercifully concludes its act. The lights go on in the auditorium, and a huge beachball advertising CHOM (a popular radio station) is batted amongst the crowd. Many people are missing the beachball and hitting their friends and neighbors, but nobody seems to care. It is my first look at the audience, and I am struck by the very meticulous clothes styles. Women are, for the most part, wearing tight jeans with leather boots, and a jacket of some sort over their shirt. Men are also wearing similar tight jeans with either leather jackets or jean jackets. Some couples are more elaborately dressed, but the unifying factor is undoubtedly tight pants.

Outside in the corridors, a very attractive girl is sitting atop a booth shouting "tee-shats heeaay; get ya' tee-shats heeaay!" She is nice to watch, but her voice resembles that of a Bostonian with a clothespin over her nose. She is not selling many tee-shirts.

Within 10 minutes of entering the corridor, a large black fellow is tempting us with hashish. "Get a gram of the baaaddest stuff, man," he offers. The hashish looks all right, but it is obviously far short of a gram. "How much?" "Ten dollars." We tell him "No, thanks."

9:10

Heart, the night's main attraction, enters the stage to the vast approval of the audience. Although the crowd on the ground floor scrambles atop their chairs at first, they are sitting before long.

9:45

With each number, Heart is

Zappa Zones

By Pablo Conrad

After a dozen years and at least as many albums, Zappa appears ready to follow his old band, the Mothers of Invention, into the annals of rock history. That is if the establishment will allow him a place.

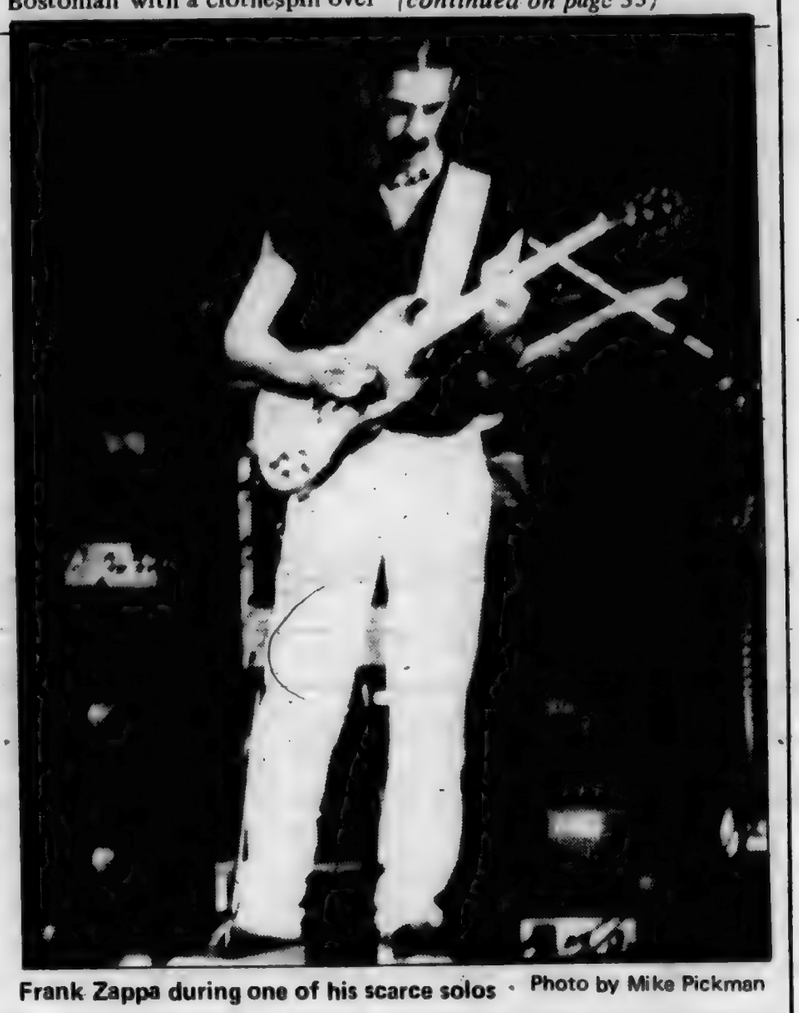
Ten years ago, Frank Zappa's jarring performances typically drew the full range of critical reaction, from casual dismissal to outright hostility.

Despite an enthusiastic reception at the Montreal Forum last Wednesday night, Zappa held his abrasive sense of humor and stage presence well in check, often to the point of non-participation. The resulting disappointment was heightened by the excesses of his new band, which included two guitarists, two keyboard players, (each armed with a wall of synthesizers), bass, percussion and drums.

The band was well rehearsed, extremely tight, and remained at ease within the complex arrangements of Zappa's songs. They were sufficient to fill in the gaps while the composer-conductor-electric guitarist remained seated, tuning his guitar, smoking cigarettes and pouring himself coffee from a handy thermos bottle.



In the past, it often seemed that a single performance could scarcely contain everything Zappa had to convey in his long musical narratives. At the Forum, however, he seemed quite at a loss for both verbal and musical inspiration. Instead of the expected sideshow-barker commentary and unusual stage directions, Zappa was content to share lead guitar and vocals with a group of people who might have been in eighth grade at the time he composed and produced his first "Mothers of Invention" record.

The sets were varied and included Zappa's disco tune called "Dancing Fool," and some quick shifts from heavy-handed blues to his unique "jazz." Though he's called a rock artist, his music still defies classification. At the Montreal Forum, his detachment made the music difficult to enjoy. One wondered why Zappa was onstage at all, when the excess beggage of dual guitars and dual keyboards behind him churned on through his extended onstage cigarette and coffee breaks.

When he chose to share it with us, inbetween meticulously tuning up, his lead guitar was at once deft and predictable. Choosing from a staggering array of special effects devices, Zappa's sound remained heavy on the treble; after a dozen years of hard service, this distortion has become wearisome to listen to.

Luckily for Zappa, the Montreal audience loved it. Even on a Wednesday night, a concert

An Earsplitting Novelty

By Randy McMullen

From the very onset of their performance in the Montreal Forum last Thursday night, Heart seemed frantically determined to live up to their hype. Challenged by a stigma as ancient as the phenomenon of rock and roll, vocalist Anne Wilson, along with her sister Nancy on guitar, proved that nice girls can play it hard and loud, if not impressively.

Anne's voice — sometimes pleading, sometimes high-pitched and matter-of-fact — was the major coordinating force in the band, while Rod Fisher's crazed guitar-licks provided the power. At times the sound was tight, and at others fragmented and left to wander. This was especially true at the beginning when Heart stuck to promoting the harder aspects of their recent album, Dog and Butterfly.

But the audience didn't want style just yet, they wanted strength. The crowd seemed anxious to see Anne and Nancy participate in a no-nonsense, ear-numbing rock experience and come out of it smiling. It was as if everyone had arrived to have a myth shattered.

Not that women are alien to rock history, but those who do venture into the dirty realms of hard rock don't always emerge with all of their innocence or feminity. Janis Joplin and Grace Slick, two significant female rock figures, never had much credibility as "nice girls." Joplin virtually drank herself to death, and the media seems to be all but encouraging Slick to follow suit.

And then there are those like Linda Ronstadt or Joni Mitchell who have maintained respectable images, but whose music doesn't really approach hard rock.

Heart seems to have found a medium in the middle of all this. The Wilson sisters seem almost like Barbi Dolls, immune to the exaggerated heights of degeneracy or perversion that have been something of a tradition with the heaviest of rock bands. Yet their stage mannerisms can hardly be described as emotionless or shy. Anne strutted and kicked her way through a gutsy vocal performance, at one time inviting the audience to dance in a pleasingly aggressive manner. "And if you want," she said while pointing vaguely toward the audience, "you can all be my partner." It was hardly a sexual come-on, yet she showed a subtle expression of joy at knowing that the majority of the male audience would probably be only too happy to accept her proposition.

Nancy, however, is the more startling of the two. There is something slightly unnerving about watching a petite, blond woman wrestling with an acoustic guitar like it was an alligator. This could possibly stem from the fact that her gestures seemed intended to

Graham's Outstanding Images

Mary Hinkson

By Elizabeth Thompson

The world renowned Martha Graham Dance Company sailed on their opening night last Tuesday. Scheduled for three consecutive performances in Burlington, the entire company danced almost flawlessly on their first night.

Martha Graham, 84, is known as the pioneer of modern dance. Her choreography and innovative dance expressions are continually expanding the horizons of modern dance.

Elisa Monte, one of the dancers in the first offering of the night, "Diversion of Angels," injured her foot so that she was unable to take her leading role in the second dance "Ecuatorial." Yuriko Kimura and Tim Wengard substituted for Monte, who was carried from the auditorium, and her partner Mario Delamio. Pairs of dancers are so attuned to each other's movements and timing that, should one become injured, the couple must be replaced. It attests to the professional quality of the Martha Graham Dance Company that Monte's injury was not apparent as long as she remained on stage.

"Diversion of Angels" was a light and lyrical dance about young love, sadness and joy. The stage was bare; the dancers created all the allusions and images with their leotard-clad bodies.

The substitute couple, Yuiko Kimura and Tim Wengard, performed with ease the difficult "Ecuatorial." Accompanied by heavy, mystical musical arrangements, the two dancers swirled as the celebrants of the Sun and Moon. The dance revolved around a golden edifice which the celebrants would ascend to pay homage to the deified Sun and Moon. Using a large velvet cape, the dancers created effects ranging from rippling patterns to the mythical chariot of the sun.

"Night Journey," the final selection of the evening, was a modern rendition of the classical myth of Oedipus. Martha Graham's version is seen through the eyes of Jocasta, the wife and mother of Oedipus. In the dance as in the story, the two share the intimacy of their courtship and love, ignorant of their cruel fate. Graham's company conveyed the tragic imagery of the dance with the same exactness that characterized the entire evening's performance.

The audience was appreciative and gave a warm reception, but it was not the same enthusiastic welcome of 1967, when the Martha Graham Company last performed in Burlington.

Although the first night's performance was not a sellout, this was probably attributable to the fact that the company was scheduled for three performances. The Lane Series has brought another cultural event of the professional quality it is known for.

Van Morrison
Back In the Spotlight

By Pablo Conrad

Coming out of his four year retirement from touring, with a new record and a new band, Van Morrison promises to stand out as the highlight of the S.A. Concerts' season. The "man" is not to be missed.

Tomorrow night's show at Patrick Gym will be one of Morrison's limited appearances on his comeback fall tour. And having listened to his new album Wavelength has reminded followers that Van Morrison is as real and electrifying as he was when he gave his last concert in 1974.

Getting his start as a lead singer for a group called "Them" in 1962, Van wrote and sang their early hits, including "Gloria" and "Here Comes the Night." In 1967 he moved on to establish himself as a successful solo artist, releasing "Brown Eyed Girl," a top forty hit that still sounds just as fresh on radios and jukeboxes ten years later.

Following the success of "Brown Eyed Girl," Morrison signed with Warner Brothers Records and put out his first solo LP, Astral Weeks. Although his voice has matured since 1968, Astral Weeks (recorded with jazz masters Richard Davis on bass, Connie Kay on drums, and John Payne on reeds) still remains one of his masterpiece albums.

In 1969 Morrison produced the classic Moondance, which endures as his most well-known album. Moondance revealed the strongly felt brass work and R&B influences which continued to color his next three albums, His Band and The Street Choir, Tupelo Honey, and St. Dominic's Preview. While songs like "Domino," "Wild Night," and "Listen to the Lion" were hits on the radio, Morrison was making his vital presence felt in electric shows at the Fillmore East in New York and in guest appearances with groups like "The Band" on their song "Belfast Cowboy."

In 1972, a move to California inspired Hard Nose the Highway, produced and recorded by Morrison in his own studio. Hard Nose showed a more introspective turn in songwriting and singing that culminated in the acoustic, jazz-influenced Veedon Fleece. At this time, Warner Brothers released a live double LP entitled It's Too Late to Stop Now, an in-concert recap of the past twelve years of Morrison's music.

Last year, following a long absence after Veedon Fleece, Morrison joined Mac Rebennack and a group of musicians from recent Stevie Wonder and Minnie Riperton-sessions, and recorded the funky "joyous sound" of A Period of Transition.

Now, with a year gone by, Van Morrison comes back with the LP Wavelength, a fresh band, and at last, a national tour bringing him to UVM's Patrick Gymnasium.

Opening tomorrow at 8 p.m. will be Dave Edmund's "Rock Pile," featuring Stiff Records' punk pioneer Nick Lowe. The sound of "New Wave" should provide an interesting start for what the S.A. Concert Bureau bills as "An Evening with the Legendary Van Morrison."

Bureau chairman Pat Butler told the Cynic that he expected the crowd to be "a lot more mellow for Van Morrison as opposed to Little Feat."

The seating arrangement will imitate that of last year's George Benson/Gil Scott-Heron show. Only 3450 seats will be sold (none of them behind the stage) as compared to the 4150 offered for "Little Feat."

There are a limited number of tickets available at Grassemount, for $6.50 with a UVM ID and $7.50 to the general public.

Whether you've listened to Van Morrison ever since you heard Moondance in 1969, or you've caught the freshness of Wavelength this month, you know what kind of soul the man has. Seeing him live will be a special pleasure.

It's Just Jazz

A B.B. King Orchestra vet, a vocal virtuoso, a million dollar rythym section, and, well, you never know who else might be playing...

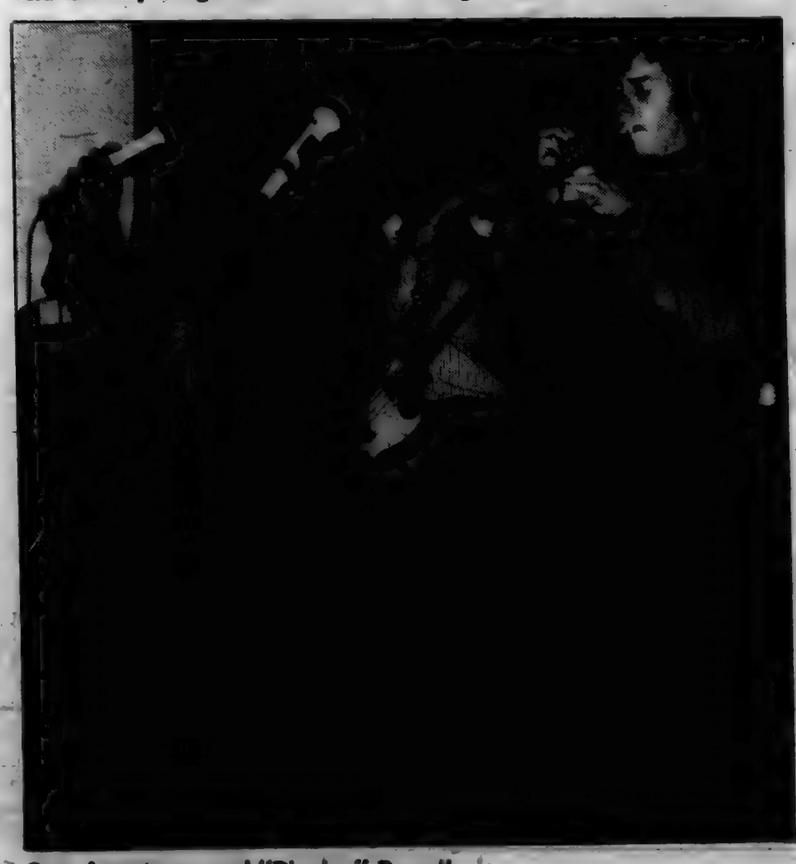
By Tom Nuccio

A tenor sax veteran of the B.B. King Orchestra, a Philadelphia born singer who has been performing in Vermont for 10 years, two UVM pre-meds and their high school music teacher – what could possibly bring these men together? Don't think too hard because the answer is not complicated – it's Just Jazz.

Each weekend, Just Jazz, a sensational Hawk's Point quintet, unites the talents of 5 superb musicians. The group, bearing no single leader, consists of "Big Joe" Burrell on tenor sax, Sam Armstrong (vocals), Dave Morwood (drums), Randy Miller (fender bass), and Bobby Guerrina (piano). From Bird to Benson each member continuously improvises and creates, hindered by no particular style of music.

Tenor saxophonist "Big Joe" Burrell, a performing jazz artist since the 1930's, has had an illustrious career. A musician all his life, Burrell's jazz ventures began in 1939 playing at Alabama State College. After a short tenure with the Army Band, he settled in Detroit where he performed with renowned jazzmen such as vibraphonist Milt Jackson, reed and flute spectacular Willis Evans (Yusef Lateef) and guitarist Kenny Burrell. Joe then hooked up with the B.B. King Orchestra with which he recorded a classic collectors' item "Sweet Sixteen." The most successful and extremely interesting part of Joe's jazz career occurred while he was working with a trio called "Fred Haris, Big Joe Burrell and the Red Tops." One night, this group played at the same club as Count Basie's orchestra. Basie, enroute to the bar, stopped, liked what he heard and immediately invited them to play a four week stint at his club in New York City. After this successful gig, the trio went on a world-wide tour during which they recorded an album. Burrell then recorded some albums as a leader on the presently extinct Hull label. He then left the Big Apple and set roots in Canada performing with a French band for ten years. The Just Jazz experience followed with Burrell filling the vacant tenor spot formerly held by Larry McCrory. Presently enthusiastic about this new group, "Big Joe" seems to have found a new home in Vermont.



Sam Armstrong, a Lou Rawls/Billy Eckstine influenced vocalist, has been singing throughout the state for the past ten years. Just Jazz added him to their previously instrumental ensemble to obtain "dynamism." Armstrong has fulfilled this prophecy by playing the role of "musical spark plug" – an intermediary of vocal communication between the audience and the band. The pinnacle of Armstrong's career appeared in the form of a 1950's album. Silhouettes on the Shades, released from Philadelphia in the late 50's, sold more than one million copies and exposed Sam to a commercial jazz audience for the first time.

The remaining three members are collectively referred to as "The Million Dollar Rhythm Section." Pianist Bob Guerrina began his career in the sixties performing at Resort Clubs in the Massachusetts Berkshires. After graduating from the New England Conservatory of Music he went on to teach at Winooski High School. Possessing a tremendous knowledge of jazz theory, Guerrina's piano serves the function of anchor – keeping Just Jazz together at all times by dictating in which direction the music will flow. While teaching at Winooski High, Bob encountered two talented students, bassist Randy Miller and drummer Dave Morwood, and literally taught them how to play jazz. Together they complement each other and rhythmically stabilize the group. Miller features an ingenious ability to keep every song "walking" while Morwood spontaneously responds to the music with crafty rolls, rides and his forte – the off beat high-hat smash. Both UVM seniors, Miller and Morwood will attend Med. School next year.

Just Jazz, a working unit since last spring, plays everything from "Take the 'A' Train" and "Bye Bye Blackbird" to "On Broadway" and "Copacabana." The key to their success, in both my opinion and theirs, is the way they respond to each other as a group. Jazz, via improvisation, allows much freedom in musical interpretation. Just Jazz exploits this freedom to the utmost extent but at no time abuses it.

Another unique aspect of Just Jazz is flexibility. They constantly invite other musicians to sit in with the group. This common practice allows Just Jazz to experiment with various combinations of instrumentation and gives potential local talent necessary public exposure.

Just Jazz is the finest ensemble of its type in the Burlington area. Offering a wide range of music, musicians and talent, this group is also constantly reviving and popularizing America's only indigenous art form – jazz.

Recent Cuts

No Bubblegum Frailty

By Lori Goodman

Golden Earring Grab It For a Second (MCA)

If you are put off by the sheer appearance of this group on print, look again. This is not the long-buried image of quasi-bubblegum frailties; what we have here is listenable, sophisticated heavy rock with taste. Sure there is enough rawness to keep you alert, but not the type that makes you wonder what third generation nihilists harbor in their brains (or lack thereof).

Golden Earring's title cut is a hot tribute to rock and roll from a Dutch group that first came to British and American attention in the early seventies. "Roxanne" is a nasty-powerful tune about teen Lolita nubiles coming of age, and "Leather" recalls Brian Auger and the Stones, a heavy blues number that wails out, indicating that the Earring hasn't lost a sense of genuine discontented rock propensities. There is solid new wave material on "Temptin'," as well as excellent lead guitar on "U-turn Time" courtesy of George Kooymans. Perhaps the most melodically satisfying cut is "Movin' Down Life," a catchy and well-rounded rock anthem, and you are sure to be lulled by the beautiful vocal and instrumental harmonies on "Against the Grain." And if you share my latent dread of purchasing an album with only two or three good tunes, don't worry. Every song is relevant and exciting without a trace of slipping mediocrity.

All the musicians are survivors of the original Golden Earring line-up. George Kooymans absorbs keyboards to replace Robert Van Stips, and John Zangrando takes over on sax for Barry Hay, who collaborates on the album design. All have looked set for a gold-plated commercial future for sometime. Perhaps this is a definite step for Golden Earring to fulfill that potential.

Computer Rock

By Lori Goodman

Happy the Man: *Crafty Hands

On their second album, Happy the Man synthesizes innovations of Environments and Kraftwork with melodic pontifications of the Pink Floyd type. The best composition, "The Moon, I Sing" bears this out in a deftly cerebral space piece.

"I Forgot to Push It" is a jumpy computer rock piece that genuinely kicks, as does "Service With A Smile." Unfortunately, the first song on the second side, "Wind Up Doll Day Wind" is a fantasy dream vision that becomes seriously annoying and is the only insult on the album.

All instruments speak polymorphically enough to sustain interest, although the futuristic abstractions can tire easily and become a simply programmatic astral-noodle soup. At best, this is alert rock that gets down around the atonality to emerge as windy and romantic with harpsichord, clavinet, and synthesizers. Happy the Man's second LP is, on the whole, an extraordinarily inventive step forward.

Jazz?

By Tom Nuccio

Ronnie Foster: Love Satellite ***

Keyboardist Ronnie Foster makes his Columbia debut with Love Satellite, an album stacked with jazz notables such as Alphonso Johnson, Roy Ayers, Harvey Mason and Paulhino Da Costa. The album possesses so much worthless repetitive music that it probably will result in Foster abandoning his short lived solo career and quickly running back to his previous spot in George Benson's band.

Love Satellite falls far from being considered a jazz album. As a matter of fact it produces a perfectly balanced diet for the hungry consumer of R&B disco. Yet, the fact remains — the album offers only serious indigestion to people who remember Ronnie Foster as a fine keyboardist.

Catch the Vibes

By Tom Nuccio

Gary Burton *Times Square

ECM records continues its fine reputation for uniting talented musicians in creative recording sessions with the album Times Square.

Vibraphonist Gary Burton, a master of the four mallet technique, leads this cut which also includes the talent of electric bassist Steve Swallow, drummer Roy Haynes and the relatively unknown trumpet virtuoso Tiger Okoshi. Tiger adds a pleasant feature to the album by floating melodic lines above a superbly mixed and multi-colored rhythm section. more by bassist Swallow. However, the best cut appears in Jim Hall's classic jazz waltz "Careful." The tune allots solo opportunities for Burton, Okoshi and the amazingly melodic bass of Steve Swallow. The album, in the ECM tradition, achieves high musical freedom without sacrificing structure.

Eat It, Anita

By Vaune Davis

One of the more appropriately titled films released recently is Outrageous!, writer and director Richard Benner's version of an emotional rags to riches story.

Although it concerns the life of a flamboyant female impersonator, Outrageous! is no shocker about the gay underworld. Rather, it is a stunning character study of two people, one gay and the other mad, coming to terms with the fact that they cannot, and shouldn't have to force themselves to, fit into "normal" society.

Craig Russell plays Robin Turner, a gay hairdresser in Toronto, depressed not by his homosexuality itself, but by the limitations it imposes on him. All day, he flatters women he doesn't care about to keep up the salon's straight image. "They live life like it's a can of coke," Robin says after one woman rejects his creativity in making her look like Cleopatra. "They sip it slowly because they're afraid to drink it all at once." It is obvious that Robin has no qualms about being a queer, he just needs to feel free with it.

Hollis McClaren, as the schizophrenic Liza, provides a striking contrast to Robin. Finally released from a mental hospital after eight years, she strives to be normal, frantically fighting off her hallucinations and trying to convince the doctors and social workers that she is stable.

Liza moves in with Robin and, at first, his apparent ambivalence towards her "condition" seems somewhat cruel and heartless. He tells her that she is crazy and not to worry abou it. "I've got other problems," he says. But Robin is the only one who understands Liza's madness, realizing from his own experience that she will never be happy until she accepts herself for what she is.

This uncanny affinity between the two and the way their friendship is portrayed is undoubtedly the film's strongest point. Sometimes tender, often abrupt, but always understanding of each other's frustrations, their relationship is the most peculiar yet honest love story since Harold and Maude. Their platonic love and emotional attachment with each other is touching in its childlike purity, particularly when contrasted with Benner's vivid depictions of the ugly and depressed society around them.

Prompted by Liza's encouragement, Robin finally sets himself free to exploit his homosexuality for all it is worth. He starts to do a drag show in one of Toronto's gay bars. Imitating every female movie star from Joan Crawford to Carol Channing, Robin is an immediate success. His act becomes increasingly more professional and he finally moves to New York City where he is eventually hired by a straight nightclub.

There is a certain joy in Craig Russell's impersonations that Benner captures fully in Outrageous! — not the garish, taunting acts of an angry homosexual, but the wild, free creativity of a man liberated enough from society's conventions to share his life's energy with everyone. In fact, the true shock value of Outrageous! lies not in the actual drag queen act, but in the fact that there is nothing disgusting about it.

Outrageous! may be off-beat, but it is not a cult film, despite the fact that it is in its 60th week in a Cambridge, Massachusetts theatre. It has too much universal appeal for that. While it concerns a gay man "coming out," it is really about the liberation and self-actualization of everyone who is "abnormal." — Now that's outrageous.

Heart

match those of Fisher's, whose guitar jutted out from his hips like a symbolic extension of his manhood. Nancy is obviously not capable of this effect, and her whole appearance seemed rather awkward.

Heart found a much needed sense of direction when they broke into "Magic Man" about thirty minutes into their performance. This song puts all the positive aspects of the band together. It's a tough, strong song with an alluring melody and plenty of room for improvisation. Fisher was more than adequate with his guitar, sizzling along on some very challenging riffs, and Anne's singing style was well grooved and more daring than she sounds on record. It was also the first recognizable effort by Howard Lease on keyboards, who seems more interested in electronically raising his level of consciousness than striking a melody. With this song, Heart had elevated themselves beyond the status of a mere novelty, and they were able, for the most part, to keep this trend going. Mixing old and new cuts, Heart was playing the wild instigator, peaking artistically with "Keep Your Love Alive" and "Magazine," and hitting frenzied climaxes on "Crazy On You" and "Kick It Out." Fisher ran ragged across the stage, and drummer Michael Derocher (who sounds as if he spent ten years in a closet listening to nothing but Led Zeppelin tracks) slashed his drums and occasionally hurled his sticks into the air.

Sometimes, however, the group became too commercial. Explosions and smoke bombs were prevalent, as well as an elevated drum stage that lit up and changed colors. The combined effects from the visual extravaganza, the myth-shattering hype and the deafening music seemed to stun the audience, and was almost cathartic after a while. When Heart concluded its second encore with an awkward version of Harry Nielson's "Can't Live Without You," the audience seemed wearily satisfied with Anne and Nancy Wilson's justification as hard rock's pet sisters. Any further proof would have been overkill.

A Quest Into the Unknown

By Curtis Haynes

The Snow Leopard by Peter Mathiesson, $12.95, Viking Press

Since writing began, travel books have brought back to those less daring tales of exotic lands and unexpected adventure. From the Odyssey to Marco Polo, the theme of the journey portrays man's age old progress across space, through time, and within the mind. For the curious, travel is the best education because it constantly tests the individual in unfamiliar surroundings; the senses are sharpened, awareness heightened. Each day brings new insights, while hardship and death loom over all courage.

In The Snow Leopard, Peter Mathiesson has achieved fusion of thought and experience rare in this era of slogans and immediate gratification. Turning away from Western culture, Mathiesson, his zoologist friend GS, and a handful of native guides set off on a 250-mile hike across the snow-filled mountains of Nepal to the remote Land of Dolpo. The ostensible reason for the trek is to observe the mating habits of the Himalayan blue sheep, and per chance catch a glimpse of the elusive snow leopard. But for Mathiesson, the arduous journey is also a spiritual quest for a deeper understanding of himself.

Nepal today exists much as it did in the 8th century; the West is virtually unheard of, poverty is the way of life, and the bitter cold and rugged terrain of the world's highest mountains are formidable obstacles. Mathiesson, a Zen Buddhist, justifies his trip as a live-for-the-moment search for inner harmony. He derives great inspiration from his beliefs, and for the student of Eastern religions this is an indispensible book.

Though recounted as a daily record, the trek does not become bogged down in routine events. Each day brings new excitement, touching off thoughts on nature, religion, and philosophy: it is life at its most sensitive. From the Abominable Snowman to his wife's death, to past experiences with psychedelic drugs, Mathiesson displays a vivid poetic sense, able to create feelings which say more than mere words.

Like all travel accounts, Snow Leopard is personal and at times reads as if it was not intended for popular readership. The first third of the book is cluttered with names, places, and ideas. This unevenness slows down the reader but forces him to think of his own journey through daily life: going where and why and with what in mind?

The latter part offers more action and is more orderly and inspiring. Yet, the tone of the Snow Leopard depicts a serious, suffering trail to spiritual freedom. Mathiesson relates his impressions as a stranger in a strange land. The reader comes to know Mathiesson fairly well and even wish him success. But the spectacular, unimaginably rugged, and foreign environment defies description. One has to live in a primitive culture in a near barren land to appreciate the slow, contemplative struggle for survival and inner peace.

Mathiesson deserves congratulations for sharing himself and his thought-provoking ideas. This is surely a unique and refreshing book to confront the massive, hurried, and urganized Western lifestyle. Still, the Snow Leopard stands as Mathiesson's quest to solve his mid-life identity crisis, rather than a scientific expedition. Mathiesson comes up short of the final answer: he never actually sees the snow leopard, though he sees its prints and claw marks. The leopard takes on a mythical, divine quality and like God, "maybe it's better if there are some things we don't see."

If we knew everything, if there were nothing new to experience, life would indeed cease to be the ever-worthy Quest into the Unknown.

Catch the Disco Fever

Boogie Down Downtown

It isn't Studio 57, but Burlington's Harold J's provides students with the opportunity to shake their booties. Photos by Rob Swanson

By Ardith Dentzer

Burlington has never been much of a town for dancing, but the owners of the three discos plan to change all that. To assess the opportunities for dancing in Burlington, the Cynic visited the three disco establishments: St. Gambri's on Queen City Park Rd. off of Shelburne Rd.; Friends, 703 Pine St.; and Harold J's, 165 Church St.

St. Gambri's, formerly Arthur's, opened as a disco last year. Upon entering, one can immediately see and feel the vibrations of the dance floor. It is framed on two sides by mirrored walls, and on another side by a seating area replete with plush Victorian-style sofas, soft-cushioned chairs, and mirrored portraits complementing the walls. To the left, a long wooden bar faces a group of wooden tables and comfortable chairs. This area contains a video screen, hanging greenery, and dimly-lighted golden wall-lamps. Several small half-circle tables where a customer may stand to observe the dancing action are also located in this area.

St. Gambri's is owned by Nelson Russell and managed by Brad Cook. "We like to make everyone feel comfortable, no matter who they are. The whole idea behind St. Gambri's is to please the customers, to make them feel good," said Cook.

Friends, located on Pine St., is an unassuming white-washed structure highlighted by electric blue spotlights. The owner is a UVM alumnus, Joseph Parent, who opened Friends in 1977. A carpeted archway lines the entrance to the disco. After circumnavigating the burly bouncers, one finds a lighted dance floor, a seemingly endless bar, and groups of wooden chairs and tables. There is also an intimate couch-lined chamber providing a place to relax. Friends has recently expanded and is in peak condition, according to Parent. Parent crystallizes the meaning of his discotheque by stating, "The whole idea of Friends is to have a good time."

The third and newest discotheque in town is Harold J's. An upstairs bar, Harold J's has a long wooden bar lined with director's chairs, stretching along one side of the room, and dozens of chairs and small tables scattered back towards the entrance. The dance floor is mirrored, and one discovers (before the "Last Dance") that its size is an optical illusion. The principal disc-jockey, Toby Porter, and the manager, Bill Reuss, constructed Harold J's. Reuss mentioned that alterations are in the works, although he would not reveal the specific details. "We want to surprise people," he said. "Everybody thinks we're a disco. We're not. For lack of another name, we call our place a disco. We do a good job, treat our customers well, have a good time, and just want people to relax," Reuss added.

Drink prices run much the same in each establishment, not more than $1.75–$2.50 per drink. There is no cover charge at St. Gambri's, a $1 cover charge on Friday and Saturday evenings at Harold J's, and a $2 cover charge on peak nights at Friends. St. Gambri's opens for lunch at 11:30 a.m. and remains open until 2:00 a.m. every evening with the exception of Saturday, when it closes at 1:00 a.m. Both Friends and Harold J's are open Tuesday through Saturday from 8:00 p.m. until 2:00 a.m., except Saturdays, when closing time is 1:00 a.m.

Desire Under the Elms

Eugene O'Neill's Desire Under the Elms will open the UVM Theatre Department's 1978-79 season. A drama set on a small farm in New England duri.. the 1850's, it concerns five humans struggling with hatred, revenge, and lust. The production is directed by Dr. Judith Williams, newly appointed Assistant Professor of Theatre. Curtain time is 8 p.m. October 18-21. For additional information, call 656-2094.

American Buffalo

Business and ethics from the standpoint of three third-rate businessmen is the topic of David Mamet's play American Buffalo. Set in a Chicago junk shop, the drama follows the activities of three men, the owner, a lacky, and a hood, as each tries to establish his own importance. American Buffalo is being put on by Second Stage Productions in the Billings Apse October 19, 20, 21, 27 and 28 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $2.50 for students and $3.50 for the general public.

John Lincoln Wright

John Lincoln Wright and the Sourmash Boys, not only Boston's liveliest, but also its best country/rock band, should be wailing during their performance at Mountain Greenery October 21st at 8 p.m. Doug McClaren of "Road Apple" fame will be jamming with them, so bring your dancing shoes. Tickets are $3.50 at Bailey's or the door. Call Fremark Artists, 864-0288 for further information.

Outlaws

The Outlaws will be performing in the Castleton State College Gymnasium on Friday, October 20th at 8 p.m. Best known for their driving, make-no-bones-about-it rock and roll, the six man band is making their second appearance in Vermont this year. Tickets are $8 and available at Peterson's Music Store in the Burlington Square Mall. Phone 862-6952 for information.

Mt. Greenery Opening

Construction is finally completed and Mountain Greenery will celebrate the opening of its community performance center at the corner of South Champlain and College Streets this weekend. In addition to folk musicians Kate Wolf, Utah Phillips, Mike Seeger and Bob White, there will be a number of dances, workshops and children's concerts.

Dance to Dealer's Choice on Friday night and the Arm and Hammer String Band on Saturday night. Tickets are $10 for the weekend, $4 an evening ($3.50 in advance) and $1 a day for the workshops. For further information call 862-3057.

Tom Rush, Jonathan Edwards

Three outstanding folk musicians will be performing at the St. Michael's Homecoming Music Festival. Tom Rush, a frequent visitor in this area, balladeer Jonathan Edwards, and Ina May Wool, a singer/songwriter from Boston, will be roaring on Friday, October 13 at 8 p.m. in the Ross Sports Center. Tickets are $4.50 general admission available at the St. Mike's Student Union or Bailey's Music Rooms.

Santana

"An Evening with Santana," the first major concert this year at Dartmouth College, will highlight the college's Homecoming Weekend, an event where the rampant debauchery is only surpassed during the notorious Winter Carnival. Carlos "Devadip" Santana will lug his nine-piece band into the 4,000 seat Rupert C. Thompson Arena on Saturday, October 14 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $9.50 and reservations will be accepted by phone or in person at the Hopkins Center Box Office, Hanover, NH (603) 646-2422.

A Funny Thing Happened...

improving the quality of their music. The girl to my left is playing the drums, using her boyfriend's leg for one piece and my leg for another. Her boyfriend is now very inebriated and no longer angry with me. He thinks the whole thing is hilarious. I concede that it is definitely amusing.

10:35

Forced to stand on their chairs for the second encore, some of the audience finds the going tough and falls into the crowd amongst them. Most of those falling or being fallen upon consider it all very funny. It cannot be said that these people are having a bad time.

10:50

Heart is finished with their performance. It is perhaps the earliest conclusion of a concert I have witnessed. My accomplice and I try to get backstage, but are told by security that we are wasting our time. I consider asking them if they are not doing the same, but think better of it.

11:05

With a sore back, aching ears, and a leg numb from my neighbor's frantic drumming practice, I am set to leave the Forum with my accomplice. On the way out, I step on an empty bottle of Bacardi and twist my ankle. Good Night, Montreal.

Zappa

at the Forum is a tremendously attractive event, always drawing several thousand young Canadians who remain attentive during the music and animated through the intermission.

Toward the end of the concert, Zappa became more involved onstage. He conducted the band through recent crowd pleasers such as "Don't Eat the Yellow Snow," and "Nanook Rubs It In," part of a comical narrative from his album Apostrophe. When Zappa invited audience participation, the response was terrific. Before the evening was over, he and his band were called back to the stage twice by massive ovations.

At best, the new band responded well to Zappa's demanding live arrangements, handling much of the vocal and instrumental work, while Zappa tuned up or just sat listening. At its worst, it was heavy and uninspired, suffering from musical overcrowding which the original "Mothers of Invention" usually managed to avoid.

During Zappa's extraordinary career, spanning a dozen years and at least as many albums, he introduced us to such notables as Roy Estrada of the original "Little Feat" and fusion keyboard player George Duke. Perhaps Zappa needs a rest before going on without the Mothers, but one wishes he wouldn't try to combine it with performances while on tour. As he proved again at the Forum though, the oddest combinations are old hat for Frank Zappa.

Housing : Contracts Cancelled

Because of the overcrowded conditions in the residence halls this fall, the Office of Residential Life has been able to allow students to break their housing contracts for the minimum $50 penalty charge used during the summer months rather than enforcing the more rigid guidelines stipulated in the Room and Board Contract.

As of October 1, only a few men remain to be reassigned although there is still a rather large number of women who have yet to be moved.

October 6 has been set as the last date for men residents to cancel their room and board contracts for the minimum $50 penalty, since most men housed in temporary space have been relocated to regular assignments. Following October 6, men wishing to cancel their housing contract must meet one of the more stringent requirements identified in the Room and Board Contract for 1978-79.

Because women's spaces continue to be needed to relocate those women still housed in temporary space, contract breakage at the $50 minimum penalty will be continued for women residents until further notice.

Any student wishing to discuss contract breakage should contact the Area Coordinator for the residential campus where he/she currently resides.

Voter Registration

The VPIRG voter registration drive will take place in Billings 10–2 and Bailey Library 6:30–8:30 on the following days – Tuesday (10/10), Thursday (10/12), Monday (10/16), Wednesday (10/18), Friday (10/20).

Tables will be set up both times all days.

Early Man Seminar

New York State Archaeologist Robert Funk will lecture on the early life ways of the Paleo-Indian in the Northeast at the Bi-monthly seminar in Archaeology, October 14, 1978.

Dr. Funk will relate the results of his research on the age, distribution and culture of early man to the Vermont locale. The seminars are co-sponsored by the Vermont Archaeological Society and the State Division for Historic Preservation. The Funk talk will be held in room 216 of C Building in the University of Vermont's Living/Learning Complex and begins at 9:30 a.m. The public is welcome.

October 14 is also the date of the Vermont Archaeological Society's Annual meeting, which will be held at the Sheraton Burlington Inn, beginning at 1:30 p.m. Non-members may attend the program; there is a registration fee of $1 and reservations must be made in advance to attend the dinner. Reservations may be made by phone by calling the Anthropology Department at the University of Vermont (656-3884).

For additional information, call Joseph T. Popecki, 655-2000, ext. 2401 (work) or 863-4121 (home).

Archaeological Rendezvous

The Winooski site, stone-built blast furnaces and contract archaeology are some of the varied subjects on the program of the Vermont Archaeological Society's annual meeting to be held Saturday, October 14, 1978.

A report will be made by the archaeological salvage team investigating a Middle Woodland period site in Winooski that will become the parking lot of a new carpet factory. Rensselaer County (NY) historian, Victor Rolando, will speak at the afternoon meeting on the early iron-making industry in Vermont. The after dinner speaker will be Dr. Peter Thomas, who has just joined the Anthropology Department of the University of Vermont as a contract archaeologist. He will describe his work on the Fort Hill site, just across the Connecticut River in Hinsdale, New Hampshire.

The public is invited to attend any part of the meeting which will begin at 1:30 p.m. at the Sheraton Burlington Inn. There is a registration fee and reservations must be made in advance if visitors wish to attend the dinner. Reservations may be made by calling the Anthropology Department at the University of Vermont (656-3884). The presentation by Peter Thomas will follow the dinner at 7:30 p.m.

Complementing the VAS meeting also on October 14 will be one of Bi-monthly seminars in Archaeology, sponsored jointly by the VAS and the Vermont Division for Historic Preservation. The subject of this seminar will be early man in the northeast, and the presentation will be by New York State Archaeologist Robert Funk. This meeting will start at 9:30 a.m. in room 216 of C Building at the University of Vermont's Living/Learning Complex. The public is welcome.

For additional information call Dr. Marjorie Power (656-3884) or Joseph T. Popecki (655-2000, ext. 2401).

Campus Housing

For those students (transfers, readmits, and off-campus) who have been on the waiting list for on-campus housing since last spring, this is a reminder to come to the Office of Residential Life (Mansfield House) before the October 15 deadline to indicate your desire to remain on the list for second semester and to update your local address for our files. Any student who does not contact Residential Life by October 15th will be removed from the waiting list and will no longer be guaranteed housing for second semester.

Students desiring housing for the spring semester who are not currently on the housing waiting list should contact the Office of Residential Life following October 15, 1978. You will be kept informed during the balance of the fall semester with regard to the possibilities of obtaining on-campus housing for the second semester.

Nurses Workshop

Agora Counseling Center of 182 Main Street in Burlington is offering a workshop for nurses on October 21, from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

We will provide a supportive atmosphere in which concerns of nurses and other professionals can be shared. Gestalt, awareness, and role-playing techniques will be utilized to help you with your own feelings, "burn-out," and on-the-job problem solving.

The facilitators will be Donna Dempsey and Charlie Kramer. The fee is $20 and is negotiable for those who can't afford it.

Register prior to October 18 at Agora Counseling Center, 658-4336.

The workshop is limited to 10 people with the option of continuing as an ongoing group. Bring a bag lunch.

Ski Swap

WDW Complex is sponsoring a Ski Swap Saturday, November 4, 1978 from 12 p.m. to 5 p.m. Get in touch with your parents and have them bring up your unused skis, boots, poles, skates, winter apparel, etc. to be sold by WDW in its main lounge. Items may be brought to be sold from 8 a.m. to 11 a.m. on November 4th only. A 10% commission charge will be taken off all items sold by us for you.

Locak ski shops may also become involved, so come on over just to take a look and browse for a while.

For further information call WDW main desk after 4 p.m. (656-2520).

Law Student?

Att: Artists/ Writers

Want to be a famous writer? You've got to start somewhere. How about writing for This Week? I'm looking for students, staff, or faculty who enjoy meeting people, learning new things, and putting it all into words. I'm willing to spend the time with you to give support and advice. You have to be willing to work for the by-line and the glory, because money I don't have. If interested, call Mark Pendergrast at 656-2005.

Want to be a famous artist? Well, good. In the meantime, how about supplying This Week with wonderful graphics, cartoons, doodles, etc. What else do you have to do in the margins of your notebooks, anyway? No pay, but you can put your name on it. Build a portfolio! If interested, call Mark Pendergrast at 656-2005.

Hypnosis

Wanted – students experiencing pressure about grades to participate in a study using hypnosis as a method for improving academic achievement. This study is being sponsored by the University of Vermont's Counseling and Testing Center for University students.

Cats Pounce For Two Victories

... Vermont Slays Giant UMass

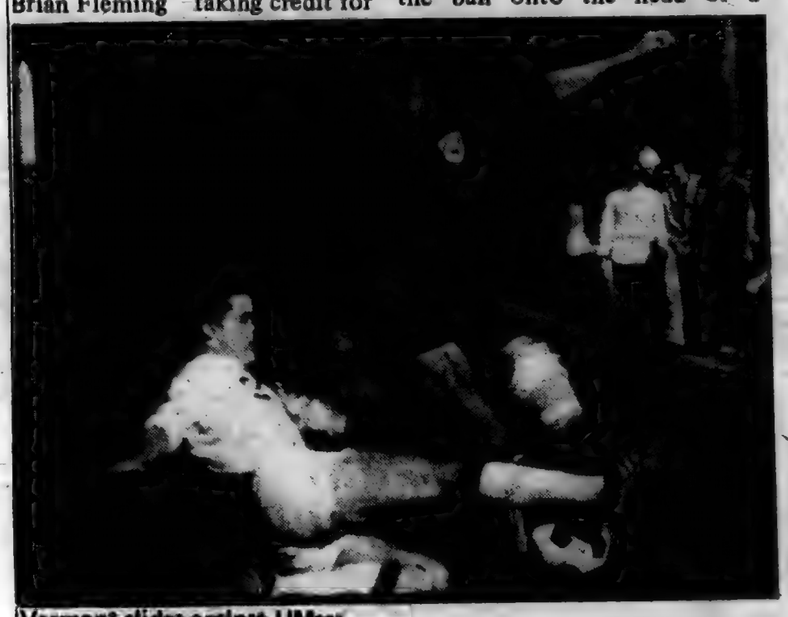
By Hart VanDenburg

Goalie Bart Farley's ability to stifle offensive charges allowed the University of Vermont men's soccer team to recover from a one goal deficit and topple no. 1 New England ranked University of Massachusetts by a score of 2-1 last Saturday at Centennial Field.

Before the game UVM coach Paul Reinhardt stressed the importance of getting off to a positive and determined start. He said that a fast attacking team like the Minutemen would only need the slightest mistake to take control. Their offense led by Tasso Koutsoukos, who also played on an amateur contract for Toronto last summer, has given UMass an unblemished 4-0-0 record so far this year. On Saturday Vermont served UMass their first defeat of the year, though, with halfback Brian Fleming taking credit for both goals.

Initially, it appeared as if the Minutemen were going to walk away with the game. They almost scored right from the kick-off, but the Cats were spared from that humiliation as the shot went just over the crossbar. Four minutes later, however, Wayne Moran fed the ball to Tony G. Diaz who smashed the ball low and hard past Vermont goalie Bart Farley.

An early goal in a soccer contest is usually a particularly unwelcome event because it can easily destroy morale and any chance of building momentum. But the Cat's offense kept fighting and only five minutes later evened the score with the Minutemen. They had a little help, however. When Brian Fleming came forward to take a free kick just outside the UMass penalty area, he dropped the ball onto the head of a Minuteman defender who mistakenly headed the ball into his own goal.



UMass dominated play throughout the rest of the first half, and with only a few seconds left to go nearly took the lead again when Koutsoukos blasted the ball at the Cat's goal from inside the penalty area. Luckily, Bart Farley pulled off a full stretch save to keep the score tied at 1-1.

In the second half the Cats seemed to loosen their play and become sloppy. But they soon woke up when UVM co-captain Danny Bryant fired a fast backpass to Tender Farley that was way out of his reach and only just avoided going into the net.

Farley, meanwhile, had been playing a first-class game. Time and time again he utilized his quickness to clear up defensive

Vermont slides against UMass

... Whips Boston College 3-0

By Steven Larose

Calling upon its blossoming offense to make up for the lackluster play of its defense, the University of Vermont men's soccer team mowed over Boston College 3-0 Monday afternoon at Centennial Field.

In past contests, Vermont has relied upon the goal-tending of Bart Farley and a consistent defensive effort. Yet, against Boston Vermont's defense suffered through a sluggish afternoon where the Cat defenders had trouble marking their men and communicating with each other. Vermont's offense, which could do no wrong, scored twice in the first half and once more midway through the final stanza to seal the victory and boost their record to 4-1-1. Earlier in the week Vermont toppled nationally ranked UMass 2-1, a win which propelled Vermont from No. 10 to No. 5 in New England.

Freshman Larry Stone started the Vermont offensive movement on a feed from Zareh Avakian from the left side of the penalty area. At the 7:16 mark of the first period, Stone took the pass, faked out a BC defender, and boomed a low shot into the near corner for the score.

Brian Fleming corralled a Barry Ryan rebound and slipped it past BC's netminder for the second Catamount goal. The play began on Avakian's direct kick.

The Eagles blew several opportunities to score late in the first half and these, coupled with a series of non-calls by official Charlie Jasman, kept BC off the score board.

Title IX and Its Role at UVM

Attitudes Towards Women's Sports Are Changing

By Joshua Reynolds

In the 1970's, the sports field has witnessed a rapid expansion in women's sports. For the first time women's participation in athletics is socially acceptable. On July 21, 1978 Title IX, part of the Education Amendment Act of 1972 which requires that equal opportunity be given to a deprived group in athletics as well as academics, went into effect. As a result, UVM women's athletic funding has increased, and the facilities are being expanded to better accommodate their needs.

Title IX is the result of a multifold increase in the interest and acceptance of competitive women's athletics. Less than a decade ago, serious devotion to women's sports was taboo. Any female who wanted to pursue a sport beyond the intramural level was something of a freak, an outcast who did not fit within cultural norms.

At UVM as in the rest of the nation, women are now being accepted as athletes. They are recognized on an equal footing with men, and are receiving constantly larger budgets as programs become more organized. In the words of volleyball coach Cathy Schiller, "We can play a more professional game now."

The movement towards athletic equalization for the two sexes began at UVM long before Title IX raised its legalistic head. Assistant Athletic Director Rick Farnham explained, "We had already started to request equalization on our own. Our aim has been to do what's right for everyone at UVM, not simply follow the laws. The changes we are making are gradual, but they will meet the needs of everyone involved in athletics." Tennis Coach Marilyn Chase added, "UVM has always had good women's athletics. In many ways it is ahead of the times."

Funding for women has increased drastically over the last couple of years. Until recently, UVM's female athletics were sponsored by the College of Education and the total budget was approximately $3,000. Currently, some single women's sports will receive that much, and every sport is equipped with the necessities (training and playing equipment, playing jerseys, etc.) as well as money for transportation.

The acceptance of women athletes in high schools has raised dramatically the standard of excellence for many sports.

As Farnham described, "Women's sports are becoming more sophisticated. They (the women) are making more demands on schools and athletic organizations. Students themselves are the catalyst. They are growing more competitive with greater desires to achieve excellence." Both coach Chase and coach Schiller emphasized the increasing aptitude of both high school teams and their coaches. "It has only been three or four years since it has been acceptable for girls to be devoted athletes. Now women are much more willing to make a commitment and as they do, the coaching will improve even more. Today's players are tomorrow's coaches," Schiller added.

Coach Chase and Women's Cross Country Coach Perry Bland added another aspect which has made women athletes more accepted. Bland remarked, "One of the biggest changes is publicity. The media is starting to give females as much coverage as males and people are interested to know about them. The players appreciate the coverage. It has been the change in attitude which has improved both the quality of and the involvement in the game."

Women Handcuff Dartmouth & Williams

By Tom Phillips

With a sizeable home crowd looking on, the UVM women's x-country team of Coach Perry Bland overcame the absence of star harrier Donna Raymond and claimed three of the top four places in handcuffing Dartmouth and Williams, 21-48-68, last Saturday.

The individual honors of the meet belonged to UVM's Judi St. Hilaire. She buzzed around the 3.1 mile home course in 17:34. The pace she set, a sizzling 5:45 minutes-per-mile, was more than enough to finish off second-place Forbes of Dartmouth. Vermonters Amy Bouchard (18:17) and Anne Schiavone (18:21) supported St. Hilaire with their respective third and fourth place finishes, while Robin Snyder (6th in 19:23) and Kristin Wood (7th in 19:30) completed the UVM scoring. Heather Adams (8th) and Sue Choiniere (9th), both of Vermont, were the last of the Catamounts to capture top-ten spots.

Once again, the Vermont girls broke the meet open with their as yet unrivaled depth. In placing seven runners in the top ten positions, UVM prevented either Dartmouth or Williams from challenging for team honors. The Big Green of Dartmouth only had two finishers in the top ten while Williams only had one.

"Our depth was good and solid but we still need to do better. We need to bring our fourth, fifth, and sixth runners closer to the first three so we won't be hurt in the big meets. If you have fifty or sixty seconds between a couple of your scoring runners, there are lots of people from other schools who will fill that gap. The idea is to get good bunching, but this bunch must be fast enough to keep your score low. If you can do that, you'll challenge for championship titles," modestly commented Coach Perry Bland.

One of those meets that Bland is contemplating is the New England Championship meet scheduled for the weekend of Oct. 21-22. There, the Cats will duel with the likes of UMass, Middlebury, and UConn. But, before Vermont battles with those teams, there are a few warm-up meets scheduled.

The Vermont State Meet, scheduled for October 11 (Wed.) at Johnson State College, has unofficially been dubbed the Vermont-Middlebury dual meet. Middlebury has fielded fine cross-country squads in the past, and this year's team is no disappointment. The Panthers are led by Karen Von Berg, a distinguished runner with quick times in her running past. Von Berg should challenge both St. Hilaire and Raymond on the extremely hilly Johnson State course. The recipe for Vermont's winning the State Meet is to display the great depth which has been the Cat's forte all season.

On Oct. 17, the Cats will compete in their final meet of the regular season, an away contest against the University of Maine/Orono. Although this should be a lackluster meet due to a fairly weak Maine team, the Cats hope to be sharp on the flat and fast Maine course. Getting some fleet times under their belts before the New Englands would certainly give the Vermont girls an extra vote of confidence.

Runningmen Edge Williams in Upset

By Tom Phillips

Relying on both a fine individual effort and some improved team depth, the UVM men's cross-country team streaked to an upset over Williams College, 29-30, last Saturday. The victory, which came on a muddy Williams course, is the Cats' fourth win in as many starts.

Once again, sophomore Mike Myers led the UVM charge with a key third place finish. Myers braved the rainy and blustery conditions by recording the fine time of 26:11 for the 4.85-mile course. Teammate Mike Landman, who was fifth overall and second for UVM, recounted Myers' effort. "He was up in front with three Williams guys. Looking at the places during the race, we all knew that he would have to get ahead of one of them if we were to win. It wasn't until about the four mile mark that Myers made his move. It was really great."

Remarkable it was, for his third place finish made all the difference. UVMers Landman, Randy Sightler, Kevin Martell, Tony Bates, Rick Solie, and Tom Beatini seized the fifth through tenth positions, respectively; but this virtual domination of the top ten spots would have gone for naught had Myers not surged for third.

Coach Bill Nedde, pleased with the recent success of his harriers, remarked, "Even though our bunch was behind the first three Williams runners for most of the race, we weren't hurt. Fortunately, we were able to get our seventh man, Tom Beatini, ahead of Williams' fourth man. And that hurt their score." That line of Catamounts after Landman did, indeed, hurt Williams' score. No Williams runner managed to crack this UVM group which was preserving the slim one point margin of victory.

"B" TEAM FALLS TO MAINE

In another meet held Saturday on the campus of the University of Maine, a Vermont 'B' squad fell prey to a powerhouse Orono team, 15-49. Simply outclassed, the Cats had to be content with only three of the top ten places. Kent Karns, the first UVM finisher, not at all inhibited by the wealth of surrounding blue Maine jerseys, ran a strong race. Karns finished seventh overall and less than a minute behind winner Joe Schultz of UMaine and Bellows Falls (Vt.) It appears as if Karns is regaining the form which allowed him to figure in UVM meets in past seasons.

Jack Hart and John Novak, both veteran runners, were the only other Catamounts to finish in the top ten, ninth and tenth, respectively.

The Vermont runners now are preparing for the championship meets that dot the early-November calendar. But, before the Cats get into the thick of those meets, there are a couple of tune-up contests. On Oct. 13, a Vermont "B" team will knock heads with St. Lawrence and St. Michael's on the St. Lawrence course. This promises to be an exciting meet since both St. Lawrence and Vermont have emerged victoriously against a strong Plattsburgh group this season. St. Lawrence defeated Plattsburgh State, 23-26, while UVM whitewashed State, 19-44. However, it has been rumored that Plattsburgh was without some key individuals when they visited the Catamount course.

Middlebury Revenges Racketwomen

By Rich Chalmers

The overpowering strength and finesse of the University of Vermont women's tennis team seemed to fade last weekend as both Williams and Middlebury came away with victories over the Catamounts, breaking their undefeated streak and leaving Vermont with a 5-2 record.

Williams won Saturday's match against UVM 6-3 in what proved to be the Cats' first loss of the year. Second singles player Alicia Good, the number one doubles team of Becky Rich and Kathy Stanton, and the third doubles squad of Kathy Babbott and Jean Plaumbo were the only members of the Green and Gold to come away with wins.

Good defeated Trudy Ten Broche 7-5, 3-6, 7-6 in a tight match. "Alicia did an excellent job," commented coach Marilyn Chase. "She was down 4-2 in the third set tie-breaker but served and volleyed the next three points beautifully to take the match. It was her first time playing in the number two spot."

Rich and Stanton won in three sets 1-6, 6-4, 6-1 in a good comeback effort after a discouraging first set. Babbott and Palumbo won easily over Williams' Kate Dowsey and Barbara Ernst 6-3, 6-2.

Having beaten Middlebury 5-4 earlier in the season, the Cats came up against a newly fired-up Ranther team which man-handled Vermont 8-1.

"The girls seemed to play strongly in the first set of each match," commented Coach Chase. "But after the first set the momentum went to Middlebury and stayed there."

"Saturday's match against Williams wasn't satisfying,"

Field Hockey Whitewashes Williams

By Steven Larose

Linda Peabody scored twice leading the University of Vermont women's field hockey team to a 4-0 win over Williams last Saturday. On Tuesday, however, playing without the services of its two leading scorers, the Cats battled Dartmouth to a 1-1 tie.

Peabody broke through for Vermont's lone goal in the first half against Williams. Lisa Fernandez scored on a corner to make it 2-0 after the intermission while Peabody scored on an assist from Alice Barry. Jeanne Gaudrea put the icing on the cake for Vermont by scoring the fourth goal just before the final buzzer.

"Williams is a well-skilled team with plenty of good stickwork, but they couldn't do much with the ball past the 25 yard line. Vermont was more aggressive than Williams, as we did more shooting for the goal," Vermont coach Janice Lange later remarked. "We passed well and I was surprised that it was so one-sided since Williams has some excellent players. In fact, it was anyone's game at the half. It was only 2-0 with five minutes to go in the game," Lange concluded.

Coming into the contest against Dartmouth, both teams were undefeated; Vermont has never beaten Dartmouth. The Cats played their best game of the season with some exceptional play from Janis LeBaron, who was called upon to replace injured right link Lleverdon, but was still unable to beat the strong Dartmouth green.

"LeBaron had some good saves for us especially since she was playing opposite Dartmouth's best forward. Our defense of Allison Barber, Lisa Fernandez, Sherry Aquirre and Wendy Burrows all were key factors in stopping Dartmouth's powerful offense," said Lange.

Linda Peabody scored Vermont's lone goal on a corner in the first half, giving Vermont control of the game until Dartmouth's right wing scored at 6:50 of the second half. Dartmouth outshot Vermont 14-8 while Vermont had ten corners to Dartmouth's three. Dartmouth had two saves while Vermont goalie Linda Schiffler stopped six shots.

Vermont is now 6-0-3 on the season and faces McGill on Saturday in Quebec. The Vermont J.V. team defeated Dartmouth 4-2 Tuesday, with Dierdre Morris scoring one in the first half and two in the second period. Sue Dodge rounded out the scoring with a goal in the second period.

Allen Injured But Men's Soccer Prevails

By Hart Vandenburg

Co-captain David Allen was carried off the field in the pouring rain on Wednesday at Middlebury College while the University of Vermont men's soccer team shutout the Panthers.

Allen was brought down by a sliding tackle midway through the first half and is now recovering from operations on his right knee in a Williamstown, Massachusetts hospital. He was operated on Friday morning for torn ligaments in his knee and will be out of action for five months. This was the second loss of starting players in one day. Earlier in the day, forward Mike Winstanley quit the team for personal reasons.

Those problems had little effect on the Cats though, who ended their scoreless offense of 230 minutes after only ten minutes of play. Brian Flemming cobbed the ball from the right of the goal to Zareh Avakian waiting on the other side. Avakian hammered the ball past Middlebury goalie Jeff Angers to give UVM a slippery foothold in the game.

The Panthers almost tied the score five minutes later when the ball slipped from Cat goalie Bart Farley's hands after a collision with another player. The ball bounced loose but the follow-up by Middlebury was blocked by a well-organized UVM defense who quickly covered the goal.

After 19 minutes the Cats were back up in the Panther penalty area. A corner kick was not cleared by the defense and Jett Collins passed off to senior Danny Bryant, who knocked in his first goal ever for Vermont. The score boosted Vermont's confidence, even though the relentless rain made the whole outlook somewhat depressing. The Cats struck again ten minutes before the end of the first half, with a corner kick, and this time Barry Ryan sent the ball ripping past Angers in a curve into the far side of the goal.

The second half was more to be tolerated than played. The Panthers coach Ron McGeachan threw a five-man front line at the Cats to no avail. Vermont coach Paul Reinhardt in contrast said, "It was a team effort, we had some fun, and picked up a very important game for us."

Reinhardt stressed that a win for both teams was important. While UVM was 1-1-1 before the start of the game, the Panthers, whom coach McGeachan described as "burned out," were 0-1-1. Reinhardt said that both UVM and Middlebury needed to "experience that winning sensation again." And when the final whistle blew Vermont had the experience and went home to face No. 1 ranked UMass on Saturday.

Soccer Cats Trip UMass

tangles. He also executed some moves that an acrobat would have been proud of while shutting out shots from Koutsoukos and Diaz. After the game coach Reinhardt commended both Farley and defender Bill Neede for playing "outstanding games." Neede played aggressively throughout the game, marking his Minutemen counterparts closely.

The game-winning goal for UVM came with 5.46 left on the clock. The ball was brought up the right wing and crossed by Jeff Merrill to the waiting Brian Flemming, who trapped the ball and hammered it into the UMass goal.

After the game coach Reinhardt was a happy man. "I was really satisfied with the way we played and the teamwork was good," reported Reinhardt.

While the Catamounts were skinning the Minutemen, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Boston University all came away with impressive wins to jam things up in the Yankee Conference race. Connecticut scored two second half goals to beat Yale 2-0, rallied to an overtime goal to edge New Hampshire 3-2. Rhode Island, although shutout by Penn St. (ranked No. 9 in the nation), swamped weak Maine 5-1. Boston University, in the midst of an 0-2-1 stretch, rebounded with wins over Tufts, 2-1, and Syracuse 4-1.

After compiling 38 saves in two games last week, including 22 in the win over Massachusetts, Vermont's junior netminder Bart Farley was named the Yankee Conference Player of the Week. Farley, last year's All-Yankee Conference goalie, recorded 16 saves in the 3-0 shutout of Middlebury (Oct. 4). In the win over UMass, Farley was particularly sharp in the first half when he had 12 saves, including a spectacular one with only one second left on a shot by Koutsoukos, the Conference's leading scorer.

The Catamount win over UMass dropped the Minutemen back to 2nd place in the New England standings. Connecticut moved to the No. 1 spot with an 8-2-0 record. Brown is in third, Dartmouth is fourth with a 3-0-1 record, and Vermont, as of Monday morning, was in the No. 5 spot with a 3-1-1 record.

Men's Tennis Gonzoed by UNH & UMass

By Thomas Cianciolo

Despite outstanding individual performances in both contests, the University of Vermont men's tennis team dropped two discouraging matches against UNH and UMass last week.

The University of New Hampshire's aggressive yet controlled method of play effectively burned the Catamounts last Tuesday. Vermont's Kent Freidman stated later that "UNH did play quite well, but we actually beat ourselves." Another team member Dave MacGavern stated that the loss could be blamed on a poor overall team effort, especially in the doubles matches. Inconsistency appeared to be the culprit as indicated by the close set scores in both singles and doubles play. In no match did UNH decisively down the UVM counterpart. As a result four of five singles matches and two of three doubles matches were not decided until a tie-breaker match was played. MacGavern also remarked, "With a few breaks and more aggressive play, we could have and should have easily defeated UNH."

Saturday's match saw a powerful UMass team outlast the frustrated Cats, who lost four of five singles matches. Although the Cats dominated doubles play by capturing all three doubles matches, the early setbacks came back to haunt them resulting in a 5-4 final match score.

Vermont's Kent Freidman impressively downed Keith Howland of UMass 7-5, 6-7, 7-6 in the most exciting match of the day. The Peter Follet–John Kerner doubles team ousted the Green–Begley duo of UMass in another cliffhanger by scores of 7-5, 6-7, 7-6. UVM's Babbot–Bonfigli and Hanson–Friedman duos easily downed their UMass counterparts by scores of 6-3, 6-1 and 6-4, 6-1 respectively.

In previous play UMass had handily defeated UNH. UVM fielded a much improved team Saturday as opposed to a very poor showing in Tuesday's match. MacGavern noted this improvement optimistically and cited that the team morale was exceptional at Monday's practice despite the Cat's disappointing one win–three loss record.

The Catamounts take on the University of Connecticut Tuesday Oct. 10 at Connecticut in what promises to be an evenly matched contest. The Cats then travel to Kingston, R.I. for the Yankee Conference Championships on Friday and Saturday (Oct. 13th – 14th).

Awesome Maine Steamrolls Vt. Volleyball

By Molly McRoberts

The University of Maine's women's volleyball team massacred UVM last Saturday in Patrick Gym, winning two games against the Cats, 15-7 in the first game and a staggering 15-1 in the second game.

"Maine is an awesome team, with three players over six feet tall. Our inconsistent service killed us during the whole match, and even our steady servers blew their serves," said Coach Cathy Shiller.

Vermont bounced back in a second match with Massachusetts Bay State College, stunning them 15-3 in a first game. Massachusetts stopped UVM 15-9 in the second game, and Coach Schiller commented, "We finally clicked at the end, and should have beaten Mass., in the third game, because we finally started to work our attack well." However, Massachusetts snuck past UVM to win the overall match, with a score of 18-16 in the final game. Vermont's Chris Bua had a good match, by leading and setting up the attack, and co-captain Connie Rockefeller, lacking powerful serves, hit and blocked well for the Cats.

In a match last Wednesday against Potsdam and Clarkson, at Potsdam, UVM defeated Clarkson in a three-game series, 2-1, only to be blown off the court in two games, by Potsdam State, a team with some of the best serving talents the Cats have seen this season.

Coach Schiller takes her team to Keene N.H. on Oct. 17, where they will face Keene State.

Dukette Leads Golfers To ECAC Victory

By Steven Larose

Freshman Mike Dukette shot a 71 to be named runner-up medalist and pace the University of Vermont golf team to a first place finish in the ECAC Tournament last Friday at Dartmouth.

Vermont set a new university record of 299 to place first and qualify for the ECAC Finals this Friday at the Essex Country Club in Manchester, Massachusetts. Along with Dukette's outstanding performance for Vermont was Hank Battles and Steve Pcolar's tie at 74, both of which came as a surprise to Coach Ed Donnelly. "Their performance came as a pleasant surprise to us. It was exceptional for them to do so well with such stiff competition," he said.

Ned Olsen's score of 80 rounded out the Vermont effort. Olsen, who has been leading the Catamounts so far, had a bad day, according to Donnelly.

This victory marks the first time Vermont has won the ECAC Golf regional tourney, and the first time they placed since 1965. Dartmouth and MIT tied for second with a 307 and Salem came in third with a 308. "I attribute our success to the players' ability to concentrate and improve their skills. They make a great sacrifice to be out practicing and still carry a full class load. That's the ingredients that will set a good golf team apart from the others," Donnelly concluded.

Pcolar, Battles and Dukette now proceed to the ECAC individual championships while the team, after hosting the Vermont State Championships on Wednesday, will go into battle with the best college golfers on the East Coast to wrap up the season.

just one step inside the penalty area and no foul was called by Jasman. Three Boston players were given yellow warning cards for protesting too loudly, and BC sweeper back Emerson Davis was heard to complain to Jasman "Why are you not calling the hand balls?" Boston Coach Ben Brewster was visibly upset by the officiating and later remarked that Boston should have been awarded two penalty kicks that Jasman did not call. Jasman's officiating also came under scrutiny during the Vermont–St. Lawrence game earlier this season.

Stone wrapped up Vermont's fine offensive outing after trapping a cross from Fleming and poking a grounder past the charging BC goalie at 28:49 of the final half.

Several Vermont players agreed that the game was probably Vermont's worst defensive performance of the season, especially in the lack of communication and marking opposing players. The Catamount attack, however, has bloomed into a well-orchestrated movement, especially with the play of Fleming, Vermont's current scoring leader.

Vermont took on Keene State on Wednesday and now travels to Rhode Island on Saturday for another important Yankee Conference showdown.

Fun-Run Termed a Success

By Paul Fiederlein

Braving low temperatures and gusty Lake Champlain winds, forty hearty souls showed up at Archie Post field last Sunday to run two- and five-mile courses in the "Rustling Leaves Fun Run."

The concept of the "Fun-Run" was developed several years ago by Bob Anderson, editor and publisher of Runner's World, to compliment the more formal racing events already in existence, such as those put on by the AAU and Road-Runners.

What Anderson proposed was a series of low-key runs which were to be run every week, with no entry fee, and awards given on the basis of participation rather than place. According to the program, distances should be set between one and six miles. A shorter distance of one or two miles, accommodates the beginner jogger, with a distance of five or six for the more advanced. In addition, Anderson recommended that certificates be given to everyone, emphasizing the setting of personal records.

The Rustling Leaves Fun Run followed these guidelines closely on Sunday. The runners chose distances of either two or five miles. Runners for both events ran the same course but the five milers continued on at the two-mile finish. With the drop of a sweatshirt the run which began on the track got underway. The course looped around Redstone Campus, the Newman Center, and the Patrick Gym before returning to the track where the two-milers finished. The five-milers then continued onto the jogger's course, returning to the field for the finish.

In the two-mile run, the times ranged from 11:15 to 17:55 including a middle-aged man and his 11-year-old daughter. In the five-mile, times ranged from 25:48 to 49:56. Of note in the latter run were an elderly couple who race fairly regularly and John Engroff, director of the Living/Learning Center.

The highlights of the day were the performances of the first two finishers in the 5-mile. Chris Baldwin and Kurt Schultz set a blistering pace that was completely unanticipated. Right from the start observers could tell that they were in for something special as they burned around the first mark in a sizzling 4:47. Still running neck and neck at the two-mile they clocked 10:07. At about 2½ miles Baldwin pulled away and eventually finished in 25:48. Schultz came in shortly after at 26:08.

After the race Baldwin said he was very pleased with his performance, but he could have done without the icy wind which made running difficult the last couple of miles. Baldwin is an experienced runner who once posted a 4:19 mile at Middlebury. Schultz, one of the best cyclist in Vermont, has only recently made the transition to running.

After the race Sue Ricci, a member of the Running Program, commented, "We can't help but be pleased. Getting 40 people on a day like today is a pretty good turnout. Also, I think we learned a lot about what putting on a run like this entails. When we put on another run in the spring, we'll be that much more prepared."

Globetrotters to Visit Patrick Gym

The world-renowned Harlem Globetrotters will be on the University of Vermont campus Thursday evening, Oct. 19, for a 7:30 p.m. performance at the Patrick Gym.

The appearance will be sponsored by the Catamount Club, a support group of the UVM athletic program, with all proceeds going toward improvement of UVM athletics through the private funding program of the club. The performance will fall on the eve of the University's 1978 Homecoming Weekend, scheduled for Oct. 20-22.

Tickets for the event, set at $6 for adults and $4.50 for children 12 years of age and under, will soon be available at the following outlets: Nordic Ford, Bailey's Music Rooms, Magrams, Mills & Greer, The Downhill Edge, Tip Top News Room (Essex Jct.) and the athletic ticket office, room 206 at the Patrick Gym. For further ticket information, call the University's Athletic Ticket Office, 656-4410.

"Run for Fun" Scheduled for Oct 13

Final preparations have been made for the first annual UVM "Run for Fun" which will be held October 13th at 4 p.m. The race will start in front of Billings and wind through the campus, around Patrick Gym, Redstone and back through the tunnel toward the main campus green and finish at Billings. A map is available for any would-be participants at Billings Center.

Sigma Nu, Keith Miser, and the Student Activities office have worked together for the past month to stage the event. The race will help sponsor the financially stricken Intramural program. The proceeds will benefit the entire campus and hopefully will bring people together for what should be an interesting race.

Along with all-campus, fraternity and sorority runners will be representatives from the ice hockey team, the Lacrosse squad and other team sports.

The committee of Sigma Nu brothers organizing the event hopes that the "Run for Fun" can become an annual event so that the Intramural program can lessen its dependence on the university for income. Members who have worked on this event are Mike Nardi, Mark Richardson, Pete Christman, Mike Sassi and Alex Pastuszek.

Tickets for the sponsorship fee of $1 are still available at the dining areas. There will be prizes awarded to the dorm, fraternity and sorority with the most tickets sold. The Downhill Edge will be awarding running shoes to the men's and women's first place finishers.

It is hoped that many will participate — registration is at 3 p.m. on Friday.

added Chase. "And we didn't have any time to practice before we came up against Middlebury."

Carol Khachian was the only UVM woman to score a victory, beating Marriss Taylor 0-6, 6-4, 6-1 in the second singles spot. "Carol really came out of a slump and took Taylor, who's a very nice player," Chase noted. Tood led 4-1 in the third set, but her opponent Sara McNealus won the next five games to take the match 1-6, 6-3, 6-4. Khachian had survived a three-hour battle with McNealus in the previous match, 6-7, 6-3, 7-6, which turned out to be the deciding factor of the Catamount victory on September 23.

"Middlebury was definitely psyched for this one," concluded Coach Chase.

UVM will now face Dartmouth away on Saturday. Dartmouth defeated Middlebury 9-0 last week so Coach Chase is expecting a very challenging match.

Title IX

accommodate Title IX are now under way. The number of women's and men's sports are equally divided. In fact, Title IX has benefited the men by expanding their varsity sports from eight to eleven. At the time the Patrick-Forbush-Gutterson complex was built, it was a men's facility. The women's facility was in Southwick. Now the Patrick Gym facilities are being expanded to accommodate both men and women equally, including new locker rooms, team rooms and a training room equally accessible to both sexes.

One of the problems with equal opportunities is the conflicting rules and regulations of the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) and the American Intercollegic Association for Women (AIAW). Women's Athletic Director Sally Guerette admitted, "A few years ago if someone had mentioned that these two organizations should be merged, I would have been furious, but now I know that they should be one." The conflict between the two association's rules create trouble for those trying to provide equal opportunity. For example: Men's coaches are allowed six expense visits to schools, but women's coaches are now not even allowed to talk to candidate players. Competitive recruiting for women is very recent.

UVM has managed a smooth transition to the equalization of athletics. The Athletic Dept. began working towards this goal a number of years ago, and because women's sports at UVM have been good for quite a while, no major problems seem to have occurred. The funding is not quite equal and the new wing is not yet finished, but the coaches are satisfied and the facilities will be available for all in the near future. Perhaps it has been the Athletic Department's policy of "not looking at men and women as separate entities but viewing UVM athletics as a whole" which has helped them make the mandated changes without too much haste and difficulty.

Ski Show to Premier in Burlington

Ski enthusiasts in the Queen City area will be among the first in the nation to preview the 1978-79 skiing season when the Burlington Ski Show premiers at Burlington's Memorial Auditorium on October 20, 21 and 22.

Over thirty national ski manufacturers, ski areas, ski shops and cross country touring centers will be participating, offering a variety of clinics, demonstrations and exhibits of interest to both Alpine (downhill) and Nordic (cross-country) skiers.

And there's more. 1976 World Ballet Champion — Alan Schoenberger, the supreme innovator in the highly innovative sport of freestyle skiing, will bring his "Just Puppet Theatrical Skiing Revue" to Burlington for four shows daily during the three-day event. Schoenberger is being sponsored by the Downhill Edge Ski Shop.

Tickets are $2.00 in advance, available at Bailey's Music Rooms, Church Street, Burlington and at local ski shops... or tickets may be purchased at the door the day of the show ($2.50). For more information, phone 863-5224.

UVM Ski Club Planning Begun

Even though it is just early October, the UVM Ski Club has already started planning for the coming season. The club will be involved mainly with downhill skiing activities. Plans for the future include ski movies and other social gatherings for enthusiastic skiers. The club hopes to ease transportation problems to the areas with a ride board and is also looking into the feasability of weekend buses to Smugglers' Notch. A Skiday, featuring an all-day party, a beer slalom, and a bump contest has been suggested. Another possibility is a trip west during Spring Vacation. The Ski Club is interested in the ideas of individual skiers and will soon hold a general organizational meeting. The date will be announced.

Outing Club Expects Top Season

The Outing Club is underway for another season, one that could be its best so far. Last semester the O.C. made plans to adopt a new approach since, under the old system, the house simply couldn't handle the growing popularity. The O.C. is planning an itinerary for at least a month in advance as well as tentative plans for the entire semester. The leaders for these trips presented themselves at a leadership workshop at the beginning of the semester. The advantage of advance planning is knowing when equipment will be needed, and allowing students time to prepare for a trip.

To sign up, go to the Outing Club House (next to John Dewey Hall). To find out the schedule, check with the Outing Club or its bulletin board which will be on the north wall of the lobby in Billings Center or in the Cynic. The O.C., along with the other outdoor organizations, will try to have something in every week. Aside from trips several other activities are offered: slide shows, workshops, etc. If you're interested in the outdoors, check with the O.C. Chances are they'll have something for you, and maybe you'll have something for them.

Vermont Wilderness Sports Program

The Wilderness Sports program in Living/Learning is designed for members to experience themselves through outdoor activities. Activities are designed not only for enjoyment and challenge, but also to encourage safety and respect for the great outdoors.

The program holds weekly seminars on Wednesdays at 10:00 p.m. in the suite B360 L/LC. The topics range from Alaskan safaries to trout fishing in Vermont, to first aid in the mountains. Every Friday afternoon Steven Boll takes beginners and intermediate climbers rock climbing. Weekend activities include day hikes in the Green Mountains, rock climbing weekends in the Shawangunks, and early morning fishing trips.

Many of the program's activities are spontaneous, but all are open to anyone interested in participating. To find out what is going on, give us a call at 656-4252.

Women's Basketball Tryouts

Tryouts for Women's J.V. and Varsity basketball teams will be held starting Monday, Oct. 23, and ending Friday, Oct. 27. Times of the tryouts are 6–8 p.m. every night. Three out of the five practices must be attended. Girls must have physicals prior to trying out. If you have any further questions, please contact Jean Condon x3240.

Cycling Club

The UVM cycling club is based at the Cycling suite B270 & B280 in the Living and Learning Center. Daily rides and weekend tours highlight the club's activities this fall. An inter-club maintenance and repair course keeps all the bicycles in working order. With colder weather coming, riding sessions will be moved indoors with the use of rollers. Also frequent trips to the Olympic Velodrome in Montreal are planned.

Next spring, the club will sponsor both weekend tours and collegiate competition. A complete team will be assembled in March. For club information on daily rides, weekend tours, etc. call x4249.

Sports Work-Study Student Needed

Director of Sports Information seeks qualified work-study student to help compile statistics and general coverage of UVM's home varsity athletic events. Candidates must be strong academic students, and willing to work nights and weekends. Contact Joe Choquette, Acting Director, Sports information, 656-2005.

Varsity Ice Hocky Tryouts

Candidates trying out for the men's varsity ice hockey team may do so on Oct. 30 and 31 at 7 p.m. at the Gutterson Field House.

All candidates must report to Room 201 of the Patrick Gym prior to the tryout sessions to clear academic eligibility.

All candidates must supply their own equipment, (shin guards, mouth guards, etc.). No player will be allowed on the ice without the proper protective equipment.

What would Socrates think of O'Keefe?

If you question long enough and deep enough, certain truths about O'Keefe become evident.
It has a hearty, full-bodied flavor. It is smooth and easy going down.
And, the quality of its head is fact rather than philosophical conjecture.
We think there's one truth about O'Keefe that Socrates would not question: It's too good to gulp. As any rational man can taste.

Ted Olsen : The Key to Vermont's Golf Strength

By Randy Briggs

It takes a tremendous amount of self-discipline to succeed in an individual sport. The athlete must be able to shoulder both the failures and the successes knowing that he/she alone is responsible for the final outcome. For Ted Olsen, Co-Captain of the UVM golf team, success has been a common characteristic of his play.

Olsen started playing golf when he was eleven. With encouragement from his father and close friends, he became a consistent high school golfer. Playing under the tutelage of Dave Bremner at Champlain Valley Union High School, Olsen's teams captured two league championships.

Olsen had high praise for Bremner and Coach Ed Donnelly. "They have both influenced me," he explained. "Both have been concerned about me and have been available to help me develop my game."

With Charlotte, Vt. being Olsen's residence, it was only natural that he attend UVM. "I like Burlington a lot," remarked Olsen. Although UVM has never been noted for outstanding golf teams in the past, Olsen's arrival has changed that considerably. "With the arrival of such players as Steve Pcolar, Mike Dukette and Tim O'Connell, we have improved very much," he added. The combination of Pcolar, who is the Vt. Amateur Champion, and Olsen, the Cats have an excellent one-two combination. "This year's team has a lot of potential," Olsen pointed out.

"I never quit out there on the golf course. I have a lot of pride in my game."

— Ted Olsen

In his first three years at Vermont, Olsen was consistently shooting in the 80 range. Since then his average has improved to around 75. He recalls the first few years as a time when, "I occasionally had a good round in the seventies, but I couldn't do it consistently."

This year Olsen has been red hot. He posted a 75 in the Yankee Conference championships and a 151 two-day total at the Toski Invitational Tournament. His performance at the Toski earned the team a respectable second place finish.

Golf is such a precision sport it is very difficult to master every aspect of the game. Olsen has had his difficulties as well. "The weakness in my game is putting," he commented. "The mental part of golf is also tough. At times I lose some confidence out there."

Obviously, there had to be a reason why Olsen chose golf as his sport. "The door was open for me. I was shooting well enough to be on the team, and the other guys who were on the squad persuaded me to come out," Olsen reflected. "There are two areas of the game which are my strong points," said Olsen. "I can hit the ball far. This can be a big advantage over someone who is a short hitter. Another advantage that I have going for me is that I never quit out there on the golf course. I have a lot of pride in my game."

Olsen has adjusted well to his home course. He used to play out of Kwiniaska Country Club in Shelburne which has a different type of course than the Burlington Country Club. "Kwiniaska was wide open so it didn't matter where you hit the ball," noted Olsen. "BCC has more trees and your drives must be straight. The greens are really fast. BCC has a really good course," he added.

Often young golfers try to pattern themselves after top pros such as Nickalaus, Watson and others. But Olsen is his own man. "I don't follow anybody's game. I just try to shoot as low as I can everytime I'm out on the golf course." With such determination it appears that Olsen is providing the leadership and skill that might propel the Vermont Golf team to its best season in years.

UMass Sinks Soccer Women

By Molly McRoberts

Debby O'Conner and Hilary Englisch each scored for Vermont's women's soccer team against the University of Massachusetts last Saturday, but the final score remained 4-2, with the Cats losing their second game of the season.

The Cats made several shots on the Massachusetts goalie, but continually fed the ball right into her hands. UMass, with a dynamic half-back line, and while making strong chip passes, took advantage of holes in UVM's defense, to score points on Anne Bartlett.

The loss puts UVM's overall record at 4-2-1, and Vermont meets Brown this Saturday at 11 a.m.

NBA Predictions

By Rob Smith

If you're a sports fan who is sick of baseball in October and fed up with the Sunday—Monday barrage of pro football, then maybe the start of the National Basketball Association's 33rd season this Friday will quench your thirst.

After an off-season in which four teams obtained new coaches, numerous superstars switched teams, most notably Rick Barry to Houston and Marvin Webster to New York, and one franchise changed its owner and home, the Buffalo Braves becoming the San Diego Clippers under former Boston Czar Irv Levin, it appears that the NBA will once again prove that it is the most balanced league in pro sports, with no one team clearly outshining the rest of the league.

With seven different champions in the last eight years, picking this year's favorites is a dangerous job. Who would have dared to pick Washington and Seattle for the final last year?

Whatever the odds against my being correct, here goes. Since it doesn't matter what order the teams finish in, the 12 teams I pick to make the playoffs are as follows:

EASTERN DIVISION

(1) Philadelphia 76ers – The addition of defensive forward Bobby Jones, formerly with Denver, should compliment the style of Julius Erving better than gone and forgotten forward George McGuinness. A maturing Darryl Dawkins, along with the usual consistency from Doug Collins and Henry Bibby, could finally bring a championship to Philadelphia.

(2) Washington Bullets – Even though Elvin Hayes, Bobby Dandridge and Wes Unseld are getting no younger, this team has great depth up front in the likes of Olympian Mitch Kupchak and last year's rookie phenomenon Greg Ballard. If Phil Chenier can stay healthy and Kevin Grevey provides the Bullets with a proven backcourt combination, they may just have the right formula to repeat as champs this year.

(3) Boston Celtics – The acquisition of Nate Tiny Archibald, Billy Knight and Marvin Barnes in the Buffalo–Boston trade should give the Celtics needed scoring up-front and additional speed in the backcourt. John Havlicek will be sorely missed, but a healthy Jo Jo White will bolster the backcourt. Ex-Laker Earl Cowen's chronic back is still a problem, as is the lack of an adequate backup center.

(4) New York Knicks – The excitement created from the signing of Marvin Webster faded quickly when the Knicks were told to send always dependable center forward Lonnie Shelton, and $450,000 to Seattle as compensation. Even so, the Knicks front line of Webster, MacAdoo and MacMillon should be solid. Like a vintage wine, backcourt ace Earl Monroe appears to be mellowing with age. The two key questions for the Knicks will be the ability of sophomore guard Ray Williams to compliment the Pearl's free wheeling style and their bench strength.

(5) San Antonio Spurs – Led by scoring champ George Gerwin and by super forward Larry Kenon, the Spurs have two of the most dangerous scoring machines in basketball. Center Billy Paultz can also shoot adequately; however, like Kenon and Gerwin, he is not known for his defensive prowess. Offensively, this is probably the most complete team in the NBA. If they ever get around to playing defense, they could improve upon last year's record of 52 wins and 30 losses.

(6) Houston Rockets – Along with San Antonio, Houston should be one of the more offensive minded teams this year. The reason for this is the addition of perennial all-star Rick Barry to a line-up which already includes Moses Malone, Rudy Tomjanovich, Calvin Murphy and Mike Newlin. An adequate bench and occasional defensive lapses experienced throughout last season's play could be the main deterrents in the Rockets' championship bid.

WESTERN DIVISION

(1) Milwaukee Bucks – The Bucks are a young and upcoming team which is still probably one player away from a championship. The Bucks hope that the answer to that missing link can be found in second year center Kent Benson, the Indiana star who did not live up to his college expectations last year. In Marques Johnson, Dave Meyers, Brian Winters, and Quinn Buckner, the Bucks have the nucleus for a team which should have the ability to play with anyone. What the Bucks lack in experience and maturity they'll make up in enthusiasm.

(2) Denver Nuggets – Have you ever heard of a team with too much talent? The Denver Nuggets are just that. Between David Thompson, Don Issel, George McGuiness and Charlie Scott, the Nuggets have the ability to score 130 points a game and give up 130 points a game. Denver's inability to play team ball, and in particular team defense is the major weakness which has plagued them the past 2 years and the addition of McGuinness and Scott – two offensive minded players – won't help the situation any.

(4) Phoenix Suns – The Suns have the NBA's premier guard in Paul Westphal and one of the most explosive young forwards in

Red Sox Won First World Series

The Boston Redsox won the first World Series Championship held in October, 1903, after Barney Dreyfuss, owner of the National League champion Pittsburgh Pirates, proposed his team meet Boston, the American League victors, in a post-season tournament. But the next year, John T. Brush didn't want his championship N.Y. Giants to play the upstart AL champs, so there was no series. Brush relented in 1905 and the World Series has been held every October since then.

Redskins Scalp Lions 21-19

Quarterback Joe Theisman brought the undefeated Redskins back from a 12-7 deficit with a 21-yard TD pass to Jean Fugett early in the fourth quarter and another 25-yard TD connection to John McDaniel with 1:24 remaining in the game, to spur Washington on to a 21-19 victory over the Detroit Lions Sunday.

The Lions, getting the support of four field goals from Benny Ricardo, drove 52 yards in 12 plays to get a 6-yard touchdown run by Rick Kane with 5:52 left. Washington, now 6-0, is off to its best start since it began the 1943 season with a 6-0-1 record. Washington has won five in a row over Detroit and now sports a 13-3 record against the Lions.

Herzog May be Rehired

After the Kansas City Royals' third-straight playoff loss to the New York Yankees, Kansas City's manager Whitey Herzog had expressed doubt whether or not he would head the Royals for the fourth full season. "We've talked about it," he said. "They always wait until you get beat in the playoffs until they tell you, and I don't like that."

But now it looks like Herzog will be back in Kansas City next year, general manager Joe Burke said Monday. "It's up to Whitey now. I've hired him twice and recommended him twice. If he wants to manage the Kansas City Royals, he will have the opportunity to do it."

Bruins' Grahame Goes to L.A.

Boston Bruin Goalie Ron Grahame was traded to the goalie-hungry Los Angeles Kings Monday in exchange for the Kings' first round draft choice next June. Grahame signed with Boston last year, giving the Bruins the strongest goal-tending staff in the league, consisting of Grahame, Gerry Cheevers and Gilles Gilbert. One of them had to go and it was Grahame who was given the short straw.

"We figure this is the only way we'd have a chance to get a high first round pick," said Bruins general manager Harry Sinden. Grahame will join Bruins' defenseman Doug Halward who was sent to L.A. a month ago as a part of the deal.

Patriots Bang Up Eagles 24-14

After battling to a 17-0 lead in the second period, the New England Patriots maintained control over the Philadelphia Eagles for the rest of the game and ended the afternoon with a 24-14 victory. New England had 50 running plays, rushing for 207 yards and holding the ball for 36 minutes, 53 seconds against what was previously the leading team in NFC against the rush. "Our offensive line played a big game for us," explained quarterback Steve Grogan, who connected for 12 out of 23 passes for 189 yards and a touchdown. Phily controlled the ball for only 23:07 and could tally just two touchdowns for the afternoon.

NBA Playoff Predictions

second year man Walter Davis. Scoring points will not be a problem at Phoenix with the likes of Westphal, Davis, Don Duse and Alvan Adams. Playing tough defense and getting adequate rebounding, however, may be.

(5) Seattle Supersonics – The Sonics have great versatility in their backcourt with Gus Williams, Dennis Johnson and "Downtown" Fred Brown running the show. Under the boards, last year's super-rookie Jack Sikma, veteran forward Paul Silas and newly acquired Lonnie Shelton should provide adequate rebounding strength. The absence of Marvin Webster will surely be felt up front. However, Lonnie Shelton and former Denver sub Tom La Garde will hopefully provide the muscle needed to carry Seattle back to the NBA finals.

(6) Los Angeles Lakers – When you think of the Lakers you think of Kareem Abdul Jabbar. As great as Jabbar is, the Lakers have not been able to win a championship with him. This year with the help of forwards Adrion Dantley, Kenny Carr and Jamoal Wildes, and guards Ron Boone and Lou Hudson, coach Jerry West hopes to finally bring to L.A. the long awaited championship the owners thought Jabbar would bring them. They have the personnel, it's just a matter of playing team ball and avoiding injuries.

Of these 12 teams it's literally anyone's guess on who will win the title. My pick is the Phily 76ers simply because they appear to have the most well-balanced team in the NBA with the absence of McGuinness and acquisition of Bobby Jones. This may finally be the year when "the Doctor" can operate with a supporting cast which compliments his style.

Pyramid Company Denied Act 250 Permit

By John Letteri

The District Four Environmental Commission released a 65-page decision last Thursday denying Pyramid Co. an Act 250 permit to build an 82-store enclosed mall in Williston.

In rejecting the permit, the Commission emphasized the burdens the mall would place on traffic, roads, and municipal systems in the town of Williston and Chittenden County. In addition, the commission found the Pyramid proposal in violation of the state's regional plan for the area and Williston's Comprehensive Town Plan, which designated the area the mall was to be built as industrial rather than commercial space.

Commission Chairman Duncan Brown said the size and location of the mall were also deciding factors in the rejection of the permit. Brown said his panel was concerned that if the mall were to be built, it would constitute the equivalent of one-third of the shopping space presently existing in Chittenden County, and 80 percent of Burlington's shopping space.

The decision was seen as a major victory by Burlington officials. The city had put up $50,000 to help fight the mall, fearing an estimated loss of $1.2 to $1.6 million in tax revenues. The mall would have been "devastating" to Burlington's economy, said city consultant George Strenlieb.

The future of the mall in Williston is now out of the hands of the Commission. The Pyramid Co. has thirty days to appeal last Thursday's decision to the courts. Pyramid partner Gary Craig said he will be talking with other Pyramid Co. officials this week to plot the next step.

Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vermont), Governor Richard Snelling, and Burlington mayor Gordon Paquette have all recommended Pyramid Co. move its mall to Burlington. Craig, however, declined to comment on the matter, saying the city would have to come to Pyramid Co. and ask them to move to the city.

The decision ends a two-year-long battle between Pyramid Co. and state Act 250 officials. Nearly fifty hearings have taken place over this period, with sewage treatment, then air pollution (denied twice), and finally the traffic congestion laws of Act 250 considered.

"Burlington had put up $50,000 to help fight the mall fearing an estimated loss of $1.2 million to $1.6 million in tax revenues."

It has cost Pyramid Co. an estimated $2 million dollars in legal expenses and other fees to try and obtain the permit. They have been the subject of an inquiry into their advertising practices by the state Attorney General's office, assailed by a variety of citizen's groups opposing the mall, and an "all out" fight against them by Paquette and Burlington.

Pyramid Co. took options on the Williston hayfield they proposed to build on in 1976, won sub-division for approval in July of 1977, and first applied for an Act 250 permit on July 22, 1977.

Candidates Differ on UVM's Appropriation

Telephone Survey Indicates Only One Would Presently Grant Full Request

By John Letteri

In a random telephone poll taken recently by the Cynic, local candidates for the Vermont House of Representatives expressed mixed views about the University of Vermont's request for an increase in their state appropriation.

The UVM board of trustees passed a resolution last week asking the legislature for a $2.18 million increase. If the request is granted, resident tuition will not rise. Anything less, however, will result in a proportional increase in in-state tuition.

Thomas L. Daniels, democratic candidate for the Vermont House of Representatives (Chittenden 4-9), said he would support a "one to two million dollar increase" in the state appropriation to UVM.

Governor Richard Snelling did a "disservice" to the university by only allocating a $300,000 increase last year, Daniels said. He said Snelling was interested in amassing a surplus, and did so at the expense of UVM and other state-funded operations.

For this legislative session, UVM should receive about $1.7 million increase, at a cost of a $50 in-state tuition hike, Daniels continued. He advocated increasing the limit for Vermont Student Assistance Corporation loans from $1500 to $2000 along with the increased appropriation to help Vermonters attend UVM.

Other candidates from Chittenden's Districts 4-3 to 4-9 (all Burlington) expressed differing views of what the possible increase, if any, in the state appropriation would be.

For example, three-term legislator Carmel A. Babcock (D–Burlington) said he doesn't see how a person could "sensibly" support the full 2.18 million dollar increase. Lorraine Graham (D-Burlington) said UVM will get an increase, but "I'm not sure they'll get all they ask for." She said plans on how to spend the state's estimated $8 million surplus have yet to be determined, but "we can't spend it all in one area." Ms. Graham said that the proposed faculty retroactive pay increases (2% per year for five years) were the "hardest pill to swallow."

Several others, including candidates William Cummings (Chittenden 4-6), Richard Hammond (Chittenden 4-7), and Sadie White, (Chittenden 4-7), said they had not yet established a position regarding the appropriation increase. Ms. White said "it all depends on how much money we have to work with when we get there."

J. Daniel Mahoney, democratic candidate for Chittenden 4-3's seat, asked if the appropriation was all that students cared about. He argued that other issues were more important, such as nuclear power and energy conservation, and berated the fact students were so concerned with the appropriation. Mahoney said, however, that he would support an appropriation increase "if UVM becomes more responsible to Burlington."

Ed Granai

Tom Daniels

"J. Daniel Mahoney asked if the appropriation was all that students cared about."

Only one of the candidates reached came out in support of the full appropriation. Edmund A. Bemis, Jr., Liberty Union candidate for Chittenden 4-7 seat, said "the university should get more."

Governor Snelling has not aired his views on the subject. Edwin Granai, however, his democratic challenger, has said he is in favor of increasing the appropriation to UVM and other state colleges.

In an interview this summer, Granai said he can't understand why the state appropriation has actually decreased while the state's general fund has risen in the same period of time.

Mr. Granai is in favor of a "much stronger" commitment to the university and helping other legislators realize UVM is a state-wide institution and not the "University of Burlington."

Danger of Nukes Focus of "Critical Mass" '78

By Ann McGovern

Discussions about the apparent dangers of nuclear energy and an analysis of other energy options highlighted the third "Critical Mass" Conference in Washington, D.C.

The Conferences, organized by consumer advocate Ralph Nader, began in 1972. The conferences provide a medium for professionals and lay people to become acquainted with current energy research, and to disseminate this information among others.

During the conference, several points were established. One being that 94 percent of the U.S. population favors a transition to solar energy. Denis Hayes, chairman of the World Watch Institute, has stated solar power can provide up to 40% of U.S. energy needs by 2000, "at less of a cost per kilowatt than nuclear power." Hayes said this can come about "if the government supports a large solar research program."

The federal government has budgeted $3 billion to the National Co-op bank, and the conference concluded this would be a good source of low-interest loans for community energy projects.

Further, the conference pointed out the deadliness of plutonium and the fact that it remains so for half a million years. The U.S. produces fifteen tons of plutonium a year used mostly for the production of nuclear energy.

Alternate sources were viable, "Critical Mass '78" concluded and offered this closing example. A tenement in the Bronx deserted during the energy crisis was bought by the tenants with the aid of government grants and loans. After insulating it and installing a solar collector 70% was saved on the original heating bill. When they built a two megawatt windmill on the roof to run the circulation pumps, their building was the only one in New York City with lights and electricity during the blackout.

Federal Grants Enable UVM to Purchase New Computers

The University of Vermont has just received three matching grants from the National Science Foundation in Washington, D.C., according to the UVM's Office of Academic Program Support. The grants will enable the University to purchase a variety of computer systems and laboratory equipment.

A $16,600 matching grant for purchasing three mini-computers will bring the department of psychology the equipment that modern psychology research labs utilize. The equipment will be used in the core course, "Psychological Research and Design," as well as independent studies with complicated experiments. The computers will teach students how to develop computer control of experiments, as well as recording and analyzing data. The grant is under the supervision of Richard E. Musty, chairman of the department of psychology and Lawrence Gordon, associate professor of psychology.

A $15,500 matching grant has been designated for Ronald Williams, associate professor of electrical engineering, for the purchase of five microcomputers with terminals and one Microprocessor Development developed within the electrical engineering department, to help students design their own computers.

Prof. Williams plans to offer courses with this new equipment as part of an effort to help educate and update professionally-oriented students in the fundamentals and design of modern computers.

A $10,000 matching grant for improving physiology offerings in the department of zoology. Most of the money will be used to purchase laboratory equipment for use in intermediate level courses, according to David W. Elvin, visiting professor of zoology, who is in charge of the grant. Another portion will be used to complete an audotutorial (self-teaching) program that will supplement lecture material by offering students a chance to test their assimilation of the material at the computer terminals. If they answer the questions based on the lecture correctly they have the choice of proceeding on to the next question or probing deeper into the material that the lecture covered. If their answer is wrong, the computer will direct

Oktoberfest Committees Work to Improve Financial Management

By John Letteri

Since last year's Oktoberfest lost $581 and this year's budget originally called for an $1100 operating deficit, the Oktoberfest Finance Committee has been considering ways to improve management and increase income during the traditional festivities.

Committee chairman Rick Searer said the '78 Oktoberfest has benefitted from an additional $200 allocation from the Student Association for general purposes and a $350 donation from the Family Associates of UVM covering the cost of the cider tent.

In addition, the charge for crafts tables has been raised from $15 to $20, with each additional table costing $10. Searer said last year the extra crafts tables were almost "given away free" to some. The tables generated $765.

This year, however, the committee plans to take in $1300 from the rental of crafts tables, and according to Searer "we're almost there."

As a result, the planned deficit has been reduced to $427. Searer said through the sale of T-shirts and a raffle, to be held, as well as other sources of income, the finance committee is "hoping to get in the black." If Oktoberfest makes back the $200 S.A. allocated to them, then the Oktoberfest Committee will pay the money back. Some controversy was raised over the ethics of the decision to increase S.A.'s allocation to Oktoberfest from $1000 to $1200 this year.

Searer said among the things contributing to last year's poor fiscal showing were the purchase of 1,000 beer mugs, and the subsequent sale of only 200 of these, and the sale of less T-shirts than anticipated.

The total operating expense of this year's Oktoberfest amounts to over $6,700. Of this, more than $1400 is spent on the beer tent with more than $800 spent on the purchase of 36 kegs of beer, without any return income.

Searer said some of the expense of Oktoberfest should be borne by the sale of 1,270 T-shirts. The Finance Committee has budgeted an income of $3,357 from the sale of these shirts.

This, coupled with allocations amounting to $2250 from S.A., IRA, and the Family Associates and $1300 from the rental of crafts tables, should put Oktoberfest approximately $184 ahead, if all goes as projected.

Kansas Senator Robert Dole at Oktoberfest

Students Express Concern Over Housing Squeeze

By Sarah Bailey

In an attempt to alleviate the critical off-campus housing situation, two UVM students began Tuesday a research effort under the auspices of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG), the Student Legal Service, and an Environmental Studies course.

Senior Doug Greenhous and junior Lewis Heyman outlined their course of action in a meeting on October 17, starting with an attempt to get an accurate picture of the housing situation here in Burlington. They will also contact and receive information from other colleges similar in size to UVM in towns with populations roughly equal to Burlington.

"At this point, all the university will say is that the problem of over-crowding is due to the baby boom roughly twenty years ago," stated Greenhous. "But in the four years I've been here, they've always had the problem. The fact that it will eventually go away is no help now."

All off-campus students will receive a questionnaire asking them to rate their present living situation in terms of physical appearance, size, rent, utilities, services and restrictions upon the tenants. The results will be placed on file both at the Billings Student Center and in the library to be used as a reference by any student looking for a place to live. It will be updated yearly to give an ongoing assessment of the housing situation.

Greenhous and Heyman are working with the Student Legal Service to give student tenants the best possible information on tenants' rights and hazards. They plan to update the Tenant's Rights Handbook and make it available to all university students.

The feeling among those at the meeting was that the university has failed to take responsibility for the overcrowding situation present in the past few years. Some suggested courses of action included the university either buying or building some form of multi-unit housing and retaining landlordship over them with controlled rent.

"... the university has failed to take responsibility for the overcrowding situation present (in Burlington) over the the past few years."

Concern over the housing situation extends into the Burlington community as well. The Burlington Tenant's Organizing Committee plans to hold a forum on housing in the near future. They are concerned with the disappearance of low-income housing in Burlington because it is being taken up by UVM students. "The university is a major property owner in Burlington," explained Heyman. "It's a joint problem for both the city and the university."

At present, the lack of housing is driving students to outlying areas for housing. This can be impractical for many because it generally requires some form of transportation, usually a car. The parking situation at the university is already crowded, with no room for an increase in the number of daily drivers.

Greenhous and Heyman hope to induce the university either to take some stand on the housing situation in Burlington such as advocating and working for rent control, or to develop their own housing to relieve the pressure. These however are longer term projects – the results of the present action. "At this point," clarified Greenhous, "our main priorities are the mailings to the off-campus students and to other colleges, the updating and distribution of the Tenant's Rights Handbook, and the Housing Guide to be on file for students. These alone should keep us busy through the remainder of the semester."

Many environmental, social, political and economic questions have been raised about the construction of another hydroelectric power plant on the Winooski River in Winooski.

The Burlington Electric Department proposed the $15 million dollar, 10.6 megawatt plant as part of its alternate energy package presented to Burlington voters March 7.

A series of articles looking at some of these questions appeared recently in the Burlington Free Press. Free Press staff writer William H. Braun talked with Winooski city officials, fisheries biologists, a sanitary engineer and others to define the important issues surrounding construction of the proposed hydro plant.

The main concern of Winooski officials and others is, according to Braun, the question of who should be able to use the river for how much of what. Seven towns and IBM presently use the river as a dumping ground for their sewage. Two hydroelectric plants are located on the river just upstream from the proposed plant site.

People enjoy boating, canoeing, and fishing along the river. The city of Winooski has plans to revitalize its waterfront and downtown area.

The issue directly affecting the most people is the potential sewage disposal problems. Reducing the flow of the river by damming it causes less oxygen to mix with the water as it tumbles over the rapids areas.

The reduction in flow would lessen the river's ability to break down effluent from sewage treatment plants along banks of the lower Winooski River. The reduction in oxygen would also be a threat to fish in the area.

Green Mountain Power Corp. owns and operates the existing dams at the Gorge just east of Winooski and at Essex Junction. Both sites are upstream from the proposed plant. Concerning the allegation that the proposed plant would create sewage disposal problems, Robert Young, Superintendent of the Burlington Electric Department, said that Green Mountain Power's dams were, or would be, the culprits. "We're not changing the situation by the sewage treatment plants because ours is essentially a run-of-the-river dam. Green Mountain Power is doing the ponding upstream," he said.

Water quality officials have come up with a minimum low flow level (the least amount of water that can flow in the river) of 146 cubic feet (1,100 gallons) per second. Young said of the proposed plant's observance of the low flow limit, "Our figures are based on keeping the minimum low flow... We're working with the state people. We're trying to comply."

Winooski City Manager Peter Clavelle notes that the set low flow level is only 10 percent of the river's average flow.

The major economical problem surfaces in relation to the reduced flow of the river. The city of Winooski is in the process of revitalizing its downtown area. According to Winooski Deputy Community Development Director Michael Richardson, "the fact is, we've gone out and hustled $20 million in the last ten years to turn this town around."

Winooski officials are concerned about possible loss of revenue if there was no river flowing through the downtown area. Richardson said annual rental fees of two buildings to be converted into apartments and others would be cut by 50 cents a square yard if there were no river passing the building. For a 350,000 square foot potential apartment house, this would mean an annual "loss" of $175,000.

Recreation in the river would become a thing of the past if the river flow were drastically slowed down or stopped. Richardson noted that by order of the federal Energy Regulatory Commission, "There can be no recreation at all in the riverbed..." He asked "How are you going to keep kids from going down there and playing?"

The Burlington Electric Department's alternative energy package includes also an $80 million ($40 million of which will come from the federal government) 50 megawatt wood chip burning plant, and a $10 million steam producing trash burning plant. The $65 million bond issue was approved March 7.

VPIRG is involved this semester in gathering data about the three plants and compiling a schedule of the hearings that must take place during the issuing of permits.

Candidates for Lieutenant Governor to Debate at Simpson

By John Letteri

Madeline Kunin and Peter Smith, respective democratic and republican candidates for Lieutenant Governor in Vermont, will debate the campaign issues on Oct. 23 at 9:00 p.m. at Simpson Dining Hall on the Redstone campus of the University of Vermont.

Ms. Kunin, a veteran of the Vermont House of Representatives, favors increased state aid to education and a revision of the process by which localities are awarded that aid. She has called her opponent naive to the ways of politics because, according to her, he has had no real legislative experience.

Mr. Smith is a past president of the community colleges of Vermont. By defeating republican incumbent lieutenant governor T. Garry Buckley in the primaries, Smith pulled off what has been referred to as a "major political upset." His stands on the issues are not as well known as Ms. Kunin's, and it is speculated he expects to ride Snelling's coattails into the state house in November.

The debate was arranged and sponsored by the Student Association and Christie Hall. S.A. President Charlie Clark will be the moderator of the debate, which will feature a panel of four questioners. The debate is free and open to the public.

Develop or Conserve: Alaska's Critical Decision

By John Letteri

The underlying political struggle in Alaska today is whether to develop or conserve the land in America's largest state, said Joseph Fitzgerald, member of the Federal and State Land Use Planning Commission, and Alaskan statesman since 1949.

Speaking Tuesday night as the first in a series of Vermont Seminars on land use, Fitzgerald said the situation in Alaska is a "potential first rate political donnybrook." He said America needs the vast mineral resources available in Alaska, but the state's equally vast wildlife and natural beauty need protection as well.

The discovery of oil in Prudeau Bay, the largest potential source of oil in North America, the building of the Alaskan oil pipeline and the resulting large inflow of cash revenue (estimated at $400 million a year), have made Alaska a "boom state," said Fitzgerald. He said more money means more people, and more people means greater environmental strains on the state.

Yet, Alaska is also a very poor state. It has the population of Vermont, but the land area equivalent to more than ten times that of New York State. Much of the wealth in minerals is inaccessible, due to the dominance of rugged mountain ranges, and the high cost of getting through them. As a result, without the exploitation of these minerals, Alaska will remain a relatively poor state.

In addition, much of Alaska remains inaccessible by conventional means of transportation. No major roadways exist in Alaska, and the upper areas of the state are Arctic tundra with severe conditions of cold and darkness.

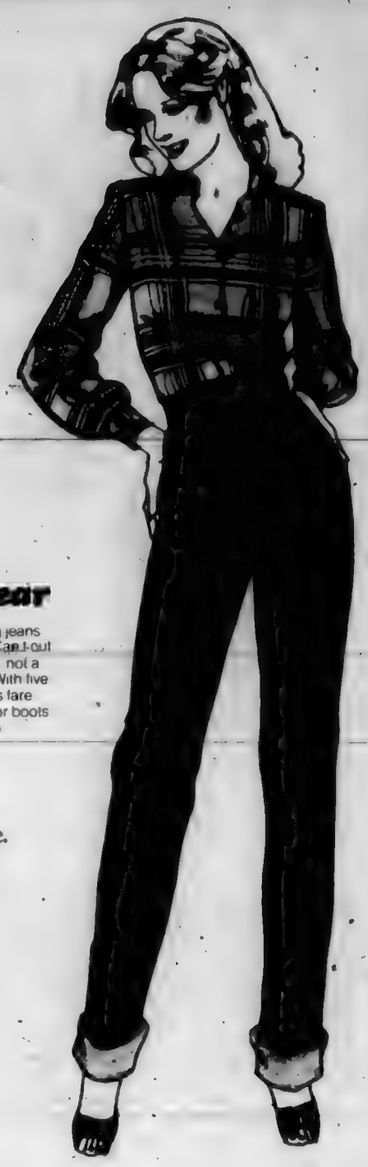
H39, a bill before the U.S. Congress this session, called for the preservation of 146 million acres of Alaskan land. It was killed, however, as it was not acted upon by the Congress before adjournment last week. Fitzgerald said H39 would have been excessive. He said a bill proposed by the Carter administration called for the preservation of 92 million acres, a measure Fitzgerald called "a good bill that if passed would make a lot of us in Alaska very happy."



Fitzgerald said before the Congress acts on any bill preserving land in Alaska, thorough studies should be done to determine the economic impact of such a move, as well as considerations for the native Eskimos and Indians of Alaska.

In addition, tourism should replace mining as the number two industry in Alaska before long, said Fitzgerald, and any preservation action by Congress should provide for this as well. He said the creation of too many wildlife preserves would be detrimental to the tourist industry in Alaska.

Responding to a question in the audience about the concerns of the Eskimos and Indians in Alaska, Fitzgerald said they have received close to one billion dollars for oil rights on their land, and will be receiving a share of the royalties from oil flow in the future. They have formed a corporation, and according to Fitzgerald, "understand the system as well as anyone."

Fitzgerald also elaborated on

Serious Planning Neccessary to Save Small Farmer

By Morris Earle Jr.

The family farmer is a declining species and federal planning is necessary to protect both him and his environment, according to Karen Hansen, former chairperson of Rural America, Inc.

Speaking at the Living/Learning Center Monday night, Ms. Hansen said that small family farms are the backbone of rural life, but until 1976, the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) worked mainly for big business interests. Hansen called Nixon/Ford agriculture secretary Earl Butz the "Secretary of Agribusiness." She pointed out that his background was with "Purina Chow," a large corporate food producer. The number of farms in America, she said, has fallen from 5.4 million in 1950 to 2.8 million today. By 1969, 5.5% of the farms controlled over half the land.

Hansen emphasized the importance of federal planning to control rural development and maintain the quality of rural life. "Every year, two million acres of farmland are lost to urban sprawl," said Hansen. That is an area one-third the size of Vermont (6,144,000 acres). The Rural Development Act of 1972 was a first attempt at such planning, Hansen said, although it was not really implemented until 1976. This act created, in the USDA, an assistant secretary for rural development who oversees family farm policy and planning for rural land use, housing, education, health, transportation, and the elderly.

In addition, Hansen said that President Carter has set up a task-force on rural development. Carter's Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland understands the plight of the small farmer, coming from a small farm himself. She estimated that 50-75 million Americans live in rural areas which she defined as towns under 25,000. She acknowledged that Vermont is at the forefront of such rural planning efforts, and praised our defeat of Pyramid Mall last week. Through government actions such as this, Hansen feels rural America can be saved.

Hansen is currently director of the New York State Farmers' Home Administration (FHA), which doles out $700 million a year in rural loans. Rural America, Inc., which she left in 1976, is a non-profit organization devoted to promoting rural welfare and values. Hansen spoke as part of the Vermont Seminars series on rural issues. She replaced scheduled speaker Clay Cochran, who was sick.

Aging Water Works Pose Serious Problem

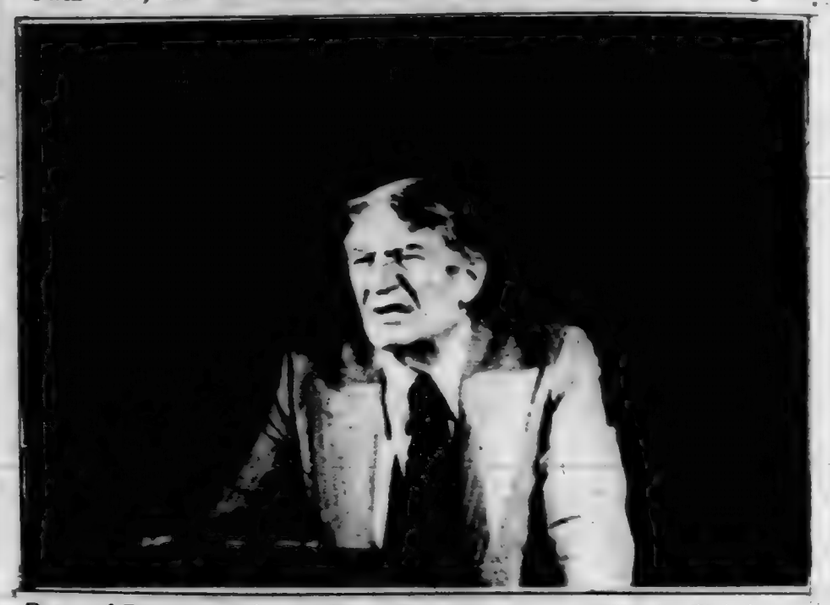
By John Letteri

When a metropolitan area grows short of water, either for drinking or sewage, it must look to a new source to complement the inadequate supply. Often, this new source of water is already being used by another metropolitan area, or a smaller town. A problem often ensues, therefore, when the area in need of water tries to divert another area's supply for its own purpose.

Bernard Berger, professor emeritus at the University of Massachusetts, addressed this problem during his speech entitled "Interbasis Water Diversion: Issues, Conflicts and Resolutions," as part of the Vermont Seminar Series at UVM.

For example, the Colorado River Basin serves seven states. Each of the seven claim part of the water of the Colorado as its own. Yet, due to overestimates of flow when original state needs were determined, Arizona came up short.

To relieve this situation, the upper four states (Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, and New Mexico) tried to get the needed water from the neighboring Columbia River Basin. However, Senator Henry Jackson (D—Washington) used his influence to prevent such a diversion, said Berger.



Jackson finally relented, but put conditions on the project. In order for Columbia River water to be diverted to the seven states of the Colorado River basin, the states had to pay compensation for economic losses incurred through the loss of water by the Columbia River Basin.

In recent years, however, the Supreme Court has intervened in these cases, often to the advantage of the state or area in need of the diverted water. The attitude of the court has been that the necessity of life (water) supersedes economics.

Today, another factor has been entering into decisions of the court. Since most water distribution systems were built many years ago, they have begun to leak and water is being wasted as a result. If a party in need of water is found to be wasteful, Berger said, they are often told to repair their old system before they can divert from new sources of water.

Professor Berger listed five words he sees as solving the resulting water problem in this country: inventory; audit conservation; allocation; and re-capture. Through inventory, older, unused sources of water might be resurrected. With audit and conservation, the use of any water would be checked and careful. Applying allocation and re-cap ure, both parties would have a stronger voice in what happe is to the water in question.

Be ger said these words are easil espoused, but difficult to implement.

Mountaineering #6.

LORE & LEGEND

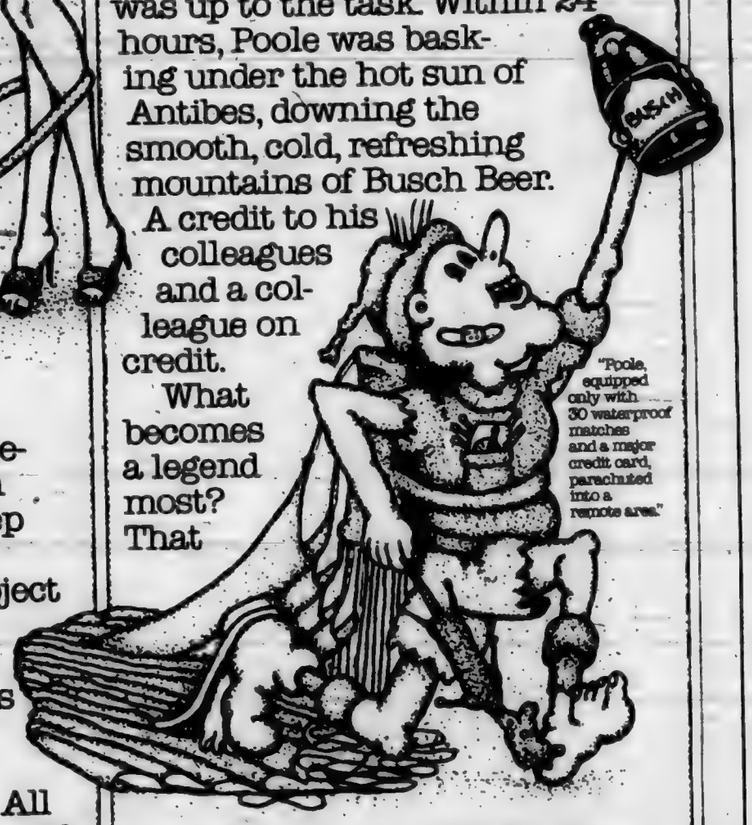
Mountaineering' is an oral tradition. Over the years, it has been passed down from teacher to pupil, father to son, package store owner to customer. As a result, a folklore – a mythology, if you will – has formed around the mountains of Busch. You, being a student of mountaineering, no doubt wish to acquaint yourself with these truths and half-truths, these stories both accurate and apocryphal. A wise decision. And, as luck would have it, this ad is just the ticket.

One of mountaineering's earliest legends is Bennington Baxter-Bennington. Adventurer, international bon vivant and inventor of the phrase "your check is in the mail," it was he who perfected the finer points of expedition financing. While other mountaineers resorted to such bizarre extremes as gainful employment, Bennington subsidized assaults on the Busch mountaintop with creative economics. An amalgam of paper schemes, franchised dreams, dummy corporations and corporate dummies kept him in clover for nigh on 20 fiscal years. Asked at the culmination of his career to reflect upon the secret of success, Bennington revealed his first rule: "Keep all your assets liquid."

"paper schemes, franchised dreams, dummy corporations and corporate dummies kept him in clover."

Another frequent subject of mountaineering lore is the wildlife. Numerous tales abound, but perhaps the most famous story is that of the 1973 Muncie Mathematics Convention. All 75 prodigies, whiz kids and befuddled geniuses initiated an after hours expedition. It began harmlessly enough. But soon, the Busch mountaineers reached the Mobius Strip, a racy nightspot catering to highbrow hijinks. Before the evening was over, several of them were bending the slide rules. Others were smoking big cigars and telling every woman in sight they were agents with an eye for figures, claiming,



"Before the evening was over, several of them were bending the slide rules."

"I can make you a mathematical model, baby." Talk about your wildlife!

But when looking for sheer courage, W. Dexter Poole must rank in lore among the top mountaineers. Fond of saying "The road to truth goes through bad neighborhoods," Poole enjoyed skirting with danger and approached mountaineering as a test of survival skills. In his most famous challenge, Poole, equipped only with 30 waterproof matches and a major credit card, parachuted into a remote area known as Cleveland. He was up to the task. Within 24 hours, Poole was basking under the hot sun of Antibes, downing the smooth, cold, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer.

A credit to his colleagues and a colleague on credit.

"Poole, equipped only with 30 waterproof matches and a major credit card, parachuted into a remote area."

What becomes a legend most? That is (one) a matter of subjective judgment and (two) in a constant state of flux. Keep in mind legends are created every day. So when you flex your mountaineering muscles, be true to the tradition. At best, you'll be part of history. At least, you'll be a near-myth.

[1] Mountaineering is the science and art of drinking Busch. The term originates due to the snowy, icy peaks sported by the label outside and perpetuates due to the cold, naturally refreshing taste inside. The above mountaineers and these scenes of their exploits are legendary, any similarity to actual people, living or dead is purely coincidental.

The long-awaited public debate between this year's candidates for the position of Lt. Governor in Vermont will be held Monday, October 23rd in Simpson Dining Hall at 9:00 p.m. Republican candidate Peter Smith and Democratic candidate Madeline Kunin have agreed to the debate, which is being co-sponsored by the Student Association and Christie Hall. Liberty Union candidate Dashivelle Barney has also been invited to debate, although there is no definite word on her attendance at this point.

All students and Burlington residents are urged to attend this debate, especially those who are registered voters in Vermont, since this race is likely to be one of the closer contests in November's general election. A question and answer period open to the audience will take place following the formal debate.

South Africa Information Program

In cooperation with Minority Student Organization (formerly Third World) and the Center for Cultural Pluralism, the SA will be sponsoring a forum on South Africa and apartheid on Wednesday, October 25th in the Billings Center. The program for this forum is currently in the planning stage; however, the movie The Last Grove at Dimbazi and a pro-con discussion concerning UVM's role in its South African investments, are scheduled to be included in the program at this time. All students are encouraged to attend this forum and learn more about the impact of apartheid on all those involved in business and political relations in South Africa.

Vermont House of Representatives Debates

A debate between the four candidates running for the two seats for the State House of Representatives from Burlington District 4-9 is tentatively being planned by SA Vice President Missy Burke. This district, which extends from South Prospect St. to St. Paul east-west and from Main St. to the city limits north-south, includes Redstone Campus. Thus all students living on Redstone and registered to vote in Burlington will be eligible to cast their ballots for two of the following four candidates on November 7th. The candidates are: Tom Daniels (Democrat), David Mitiguy (Democrat), Torrey Carpenter (Republican) and Ted Rieble (Republican). For more information concerning this planned debate check this column next week or call the SA office at x2053.

SA Committee Appointments

After several meetings discussing how to best develop an effective and strong senate, SA President Charlie Clark, VP Missy Burke and Treasurer John Myers have completed their appointments of all recently elected SA senators to standing committees for 78-79 academic year. The committees are as follows:

Communication Committee: Henry Chamberlain, Christopher Chandler, Pat Danaher, Keith Fleischman, Linda Peabody, Tricia Turner, Peter Vanderbilt.

Finance Committee: Alison Gardner, Mike Gilbert, Leon Heyward, Suzanne Kelly, Henry Peterson, Brian Zecchinelli.

Special Affairs Committee: Lynn Ackerman, Arthur Adams, Ray Bateman, Bill Bogasky, Mark Guyette, Anne Harris, Peter Riegelman, Maura Schwartz, Holly Zecker.

Student Action Committee: Jeff Beckerman, Laura Callan, Vaune Davis, Betsy Day, Michael Deutsch, Linda Jeffries, Helen Pelzman, Bill Scheer, Bill Short, Susan Hagan.

Student Activities Committee: Jesse Gadson, Susan Kimball, Pam Rogal, Glen Turner, Wilda White.

SA Club News

The Women's Referral Center is sponsoring its second Self-Defense Workshop with Kyong Ae, master of Tae Kwon Do, on Tuesday, October 24th, 7:00 p.m. in Marsh Lounge in Billings. Everyone is invited. There will be a discussion of self-defense and then a demonstration and teaching session conducted by Kyong-Ae himself.

Also on Monday, October 23rd, at 7:00 in Marsh Lounge there will be a general meeting for the Woman's Referral Center. Everyone is welcome to attend.

Living/Learning Center Second Skills Seminar, October 23—November 17.

Topics to be discussed during these seminars include note taking, how to read a textbook, exam strategies, how to predict exam questions and information mapping. Registration for this seminar is October 17-19 from 10—4 p.m. at Room B-161 or at x4200. There is a limited enrollment.

the prohibitive geographical features of Alaska as reasons for its current state of underdevelopment. He said the mountains, which cover much of the state, the extreme weather conditions, with temperatures of more than 110 degrees below zero, and the winter season, with 24 hours of darkness, contribute to the high cost of living and prevent serious development efforts in Alaska.

He explained the Alaskan population resides mainly on the coastline, subsisting on fishing and business interests in Anchorage. He went on to say Alaska contains some "true natural treasures," including the 16 tallest peaks in America, and the move to save some of them is not "sentimental malarchy."

New Pope Elected

On Monday, Cardinal Karol Wojtyla was elected Pope of the Roman Catholic Church. This is the first time in over 4½ centuries that a non-Italian Pope was elected.

A new era in relations between Communist countries and the Catholic Church may have been triggered by the historic event. The Polish government reacted with a statement that the election was "a special sign for Poland."

The election of the 58-year-old archbishop of Krakow came as a complete surprise. The new Pope took the name John Paul, as did his predecessor.

Pope John Paul II has played an important role in keeping the church alive in Poland, which has been surpressed by communist rule for over 30 years.

The new Pontiff made his first appearance to the huge crowd in St. Peter's Square, saying that he had feared being chosen but accepted "in the spirit of obedience to our Lord."

The election came on the seventh or eighth ballot. Pope John Paul II is the 264th Pope of the 700 million member Roman Catholic Church.

The last non-Italian Pope was the Dutchman Adrian VI, whose reign was 1522-1523. When Adrian's election was announced, Roman mobs stoned the Cardinals as they emerged from the Conclave. This time the election was met with cheers.

The new Pope is the youngest of this century. The previous Pope John Paul I recently died of a heart attack after only reigning 34 days.

Gifts To Vietnam OK'd

It is now possible to send gifts worth up to $200 to communist Vietnam without first obtaining special U.S. Government approval, the Commerce Dept. said Monday.

A requirement that written permission was needed was being lifted due to "humanitarian reasons."

It is now possible to send a gift to any individual, or to any religious, charitable or educational organization in Vietnam.

Nazi's Win in Supreme Court

A lower court decision was allowed to stand by the Supreme Court Tuesday. The decision dealt with the unconstitutionality of attempts by Skokie, Ill. to ban Nazi rallies. The action does not have any immediate effect, since the Nazis have moved their rallies to Chicago. The ruling is predicted to affect future clashes between the city council and the Nazis.

Rhodesian Peace Conference

Due to an apparent shift by Rhodesia's coalition government, the Carter administration invited Prime Minister Ian Smith and his colleagues to new talks in the U.S. These will be aimed at setting up peace conferences with guerrilla leaders.

The dramatic turn about was announced at the state department Monday. Only a week ago, the meeting between Smith and Cyrus Vance was said to have been void of progress.

Smith, who is in the middle of a U.S. tour to gain public support, said, "We'd like to think it's because we've had an impact on the people in the street. But more important, an impact on the senators and leaders who were wrongly briefed on the situation."

Britain and the U.S. have in the past denounced the Salisbury government as illegal. They have also demanded that leaders of the guerrilla group based in Mozambique and Zambia be included in shaping the peace plan.

Administration officials insist that the only alternative is more violence and white flight from Rhodesia. Rhodesia is made up of 230,000 whites and about six million blacks.

Shortly after the state department announced the all-party conference, Bishop Abel Muzowere, one of the moderate black leaders, and Chief Jeremiah Chiran of the Rhodesian executive council voiced sharp disagreement to the idea of an all-party conference.

Progress On Mideast Peace Proposal

The wording for the Egyptian-Israeli peace settlement is being worked out by Egyptian, Israeli, and American legal experts. They "have achieved just about as much as anyone could have predicted," said a spokesman Monday.

The only official spokesman for the three parties, George Sherman of the State Dept., said "all sides are very pleased."

The talks were held on the two floors of the Madison Hotel occupied by the delegates. There was no formal meeting due to the Jewish holiday of Succot.

Sherman would not disclose the actual substance of what was discussed, but did say the meetings were part of an evolution where accepted principles were transferred to paper.

Israeli and Egyptian military are actively involved in the drafting effort. It was disclosed that the leader of the Egyptian delegation, Lt. General Karnal Hassan Ali, met with Israeli Defense Minister Ezra Weizman.

Trudeau's Party Loses Seats In Election

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's liberal party lost five parliamentary seats in by-elections. 15 seats were involved in the Ontario district elections. The results may forecast Trudeau's defeat in the general election next year.

Ed Broadbent, leader of the National Democratic Party, claimed the outcome of Monday's balloting reflected Canadians' anger with the state of the economy.

Although sagging economy had been a big issue, the separatist movement in Quebec, along with Trudeau's leadership, were said to be key issues also.

Simon Awarded Nobel Prize for Economics

Hubert A. Simon, a Carnegie-Mellon University professor, was awarded the Nobel prize for economics. A professor of computer science and psychology, Simon received the Noble for his work on business decision-making. In making the award, the Swedish Academy of Science said, "Modern business economics and administrative research are based largely on Simon's ideas."

Dollar Continues to Fall

Once again, the U.S. dollar fell against the West German mark. It also dropped sharply against other major currencies. This occurred despite the final passage of the U.S. energy plan and the realignment of European currency.

Dealers hoped that the rise in the value of the German Mark against the other European currencies would take pressure off the mark and help stabilize the dollar. The American currency spurted in early overseas trading, but the optimism didn't last, and the dollar resumed its decline.

Experts said a major factor in the steep plunge of the dollar was Japan's announcement that the trade surplus with the U.S. had widened.

The report from Japan was most worrisome, according to one European analyst, since the U.S. does not import oil from Japan. If the U.S. continues to run a big deficit with Japan, the implications are very serious, he explained.

The U.S. energy package was dismissed by traders. "The energy bill was too little, too late. Six months ago, it might have mattered," commented a New York trader.

A European observer said, "the problem is plain and simple. Trust in the dollar just doesn't exist."

Midday Tuesday the Federal Reserve System intervened, bolstering the dollar. The Fed later pulled back, and the dollar resumed its plunge.

The Times or Not the Times

Pessimism was the mood Monday at negotiations to discuss the prospects of getting the New York Times out by the end of the week.

Both sides agreed on one point — that it was doubtful either the Times or the Daily News would be out by Sunday. Earlier there was optimism that the strike would end by then.

Confusion was the word Monday when New Yorkers went to buy their morning papers. A newspaper looking just like the New York Times was there, except its name was Not the New York Times. The parody paper consisted of 24 pages of humorous articles in the Times' style.

A host of celebrities have been associated with the spoof, though none would admit it. They included Watergate reporter Carl Bernstein and former National Lampooner Christopher Cerf.

The $1 price tag was attributed to costlier than expected union settlements. The non-Times is supposed to go on sale in Boston and Washington this week.

Seals Saved By Green Peace

Monday, environmentalists' pressure forced the British government to call off the slaughter of 4,900 gray seals off Scotland's north coast.

Norwegian sharpshooters who had been hired for the kill were withdrawn Monday, according to Bruce Millan, Secretary of State for Scotland. The kill had already been postponed one week due to public concern.

The hunt was to reduce the seal herd to preserve dwindling fish stocks in the area.

The government move averted a perilous situation between the hired gunners and members of Greenpeace organization, the environmentalists against the kill. The activists had vowed to stand between the seals and the highpowered rifles.

Woman Charged With Human Slavery

A woman has been accused in court of enslaving, beating, and humiliating 50-year-old Betty Jane Pelletier for more than 13 years. The woman refused to discuss the case, which one judge called "a shocking example of human serfdom."

South African Divestiture

Point

An Unsound Policy

By Henry Chamberlain

Divestiture is a word rapidly becoming synonymous with opposition to the Republic of South Africa. With its policy of apartheid towards its black residents, and with little perceived progress towards a more egalitarian society, world pressure is mounting to withdraw economic support for the nation which has been expelled from the United Nations. Much of this pressure emanates from students at universities across the nation, including the University of Vermont where the issue was debated at a recent board of trustees meeting.

Views such as these are fine, but there are several realities which have to be weighed before acting. In the first place, the Republic of South Africa has begun moderating its policy of apartheid. Secondly, there is the reality of the need by western nations for minerals which the South Africans possess. Thirdly, there is the ever present threat of Soviet domination of Southern Africa, especially in light of the latter's involvement in Angola and Mozambique. Finally, economic instability would not topple the regime. A civil war would still have to be waged against a well-armed South African army, causing mass death and destruction.

From the beginning of discrimination in South Africa, when in 1922 white miners struck to gain financial rights over blacks, a policy of segregation evolved. Aparatheid, a policy of political and economic discrimination against blacks, formally began in 1948. This policy splits the black population up into two areas: the urban blacks around the cities, and the "Homeland" blacks, who like the American Indians, live on rural reservations.

In the past, blacks had to show work passes to leave the black areas, something which is currently being relaxed. At the same time, the segregation of all facilities, reminiscent of the American South in the early part of the twentieth century, is being abolished in contemporary South Africa. With these first moderating steps which have ended "petty apartheid," the ruling National Party has taken a step forward.

Indeed, it is small in light of the prevailing physical apartheid of the cultures, but that too is changing. Property ownership restrictions are being relaxed to allow blacks to own some property. Policies evolve slowly, remedies take place gradually.

Something which is often overlooked when discussing South Africa is that it is a developing nation with a GNP in 1975 of only $29.6 billion. Of that figure, 58 percent depends on foreign trade. There is a lack of internal production, something that foreign investment helps to rectify. With such a small gross national product, the whites claim the lion's share, leaving the blacks poor. Without the cheap black labor, South Africa would be a depressed region indeed.

However, the exclusive nature of the skilled jobs for the whites is something from the past. The South African economy is expanding internally, making for an increased demand for skilled labor which the whites are not able to fill. Blacks are needed for economic expansion, and the country is moving to incorporate them. To help remedy salary discrepancies, the government has dictated that white wages should go up at 70 percent of the cost of living, while the black wages should increase by 100 percent. At the same time, the foreign companies including Ford and General Motors are training blacks for upper level jobs for which they receive appropriate salaries.

Foreign firms are also educating the children of black employees, leading to brighter futures. The foreign firms are doing a lot of good for the blacks working internally, something which would disappear if they divested. From their important internal positions, they can influence future policy, something which would also not happen if they departed.

Another aspect of reality is that South Africa is almost an essential source of certain minerals for the world markets. It has enough diamonds, which are used by industry, to control the market. There is enough gold to be influential in the international monetary system, as well as enough uranium to make it a major producer of nuclear fuels in the future. All this is not to mention that South Africa holds the majority of the world's chromite reserves, used by the steel industry. It is fine to be philosophical, but when jobs are cut by industry, philosophy has to meet reality.

There is also the threat of a Soviet-backed black regime taking power if the country should collapse as a consequence of business pull-outs, and the resulting economic instability. After the fall of Angola and Mozambique, NATO has been considering a South African base to protect against possible super tanker interference by the Soviets as the ships round the Cape of Good Hope. Presently, the South Africans have a massive maritime monitoring system, the Silver Mine Facility, which tracks shipping over the twenty-five million square miles of ocean between Venezuela and India. Its strategic location cannot be overlooked.

Finally, foreign divestiture would eventually create a state of war. The guerillas working out of Angola and Mozambique would tie in with dissident blacks to create an open civil war. To combat this, the white South Africans could counter with a powerful, well-equipped force of one quarter of a million men. The resulting carnage is not something which anyone can really be working towards. War is not a justifiable means to achieve an end.

Counterpoint

Apartheid And UVM —Time to Divest

By Eric Kilburn

There is no doubt that apartheid is a racist and repressive social system. The key issue in South Africa is the black demand for power, and the mechanisms by which black majority rule can be most quickly and peacefully brought about. Africans are not working and dying to modify or somehow slowly improve apartheid; they want nothing less than total abolition of the system in favor of a new government based on popular participation. To propose change on any other terms would be superficial.

Unfortunately, the Sullivan Principles, a U.S. corporate employment statement regarding South African investments, is one such case of diversionary rhetoric in action. Developed by Rev. Leon Sullivan, a member of General Motors board of directors, and initially endorsed by 12 companies (now 103), the principles call for: (1) nonsegregation of the races; (2) equal and fair employment practices; (3) equal pay for all employees doing equal or comparable work for the same period of time; (4) training programs for blacks and non-whites in supervisory/management positions; (6) improving the quality of workers' lives outside the work environment.

On paper, the Sullivan principles read like the Commandments; in reality they are far, far less. The catch lies in both the inherent triviality of the principles and the inadequacy of their enforcement. By examining the past record and present directions of corporate involvement in South Africa, and the circumstances surrounding the creation of the Sullivan principles, it is hoped that the issue may be discussed with greater clarity.

To begin with, the Sullivan principles do not demand any change in the fundamental structure of apartheid. There is no mention made of black political rights and no commitment to negotiating with black labor unions. South African authorities are put under no pressure to alter existing laws.

Amazingly, the principles were endorsed by the South African government, a fact which clearly indicates how serious a threat they constitute to apartheid. Even so, it took Rev. Sullivan 18 months to persuade twelve corporations to accept the principles, surely a testimony to the companies' unwillingness to oppose apartheid. In addition, the declaration was not announced until it had been reviewed by the South African ambassador to the U.S. A key phrase, stating that "where implementation requires a modification of existing South African laws and custome we will seek such modifications through appropriate channels," was deleted at his request. The final draft eliminated any declared intentions of changing laws and customs, and referred only to modifying "working conditions."

The Sullivan principles are primarily revisions aimed at improving the workplace, yet when one examines the record, their effectiveness is questionable at best. Economic necessities — primarily the shortage of skilled white labor — and not altruistic virtues are the main reasons why companies are training blacks in more skilled work. However, the Sullivan declaration of "equal pay for equal work" has been subverted through a variety of techniques. These methods include redefining or fragmenting jobs to create "new" lower paying job categories for the black workers. Thus, when blacks do not have access to equal work "equal pay for equal work" becomes a malevolent Catch 22. Although one might regard these tactics as racist, they have been indisputably effective in keeping black wages down. The New York Times recently reported that black wages were less than one-half that of white workers in a South African Ford assembly plant, even though Ford Motor company has endorsed the Sullivan principles.

Despite the much-ballyhooed salary increases for black industrial workers, the income disparity between blacks and whites has actually widened. Even though blacks have gained more percentagewise than whites, the original base income was much smaller. In 1969, an average white industrial worker earned $259 more per month than his black counterpart. By 1975 the difference had risen to $463 per month.

All the original corporate signatories of the principles have actively aided the government of South Africa by providing capital, technology, skills and know-how. Many U.S. businesses have government contracts, providing goods and services that directly and indirectly support the existing system. As a spokesman associated with the National Council of Churches recently pointed out, "Citibank is a signatory of the principles, yet Citibank has made loans of over $300 million to the South African government; IBM is a signer yet IBM places no restrictions on computer sales in South Africa which could be used for repressive purposes (i.e. surveillance); Mobil is a signer yet Mobil apparently still provides oil for Rhodesia and sells petroleum to the South African military... Ford still sells trucks when asked to by the South African military."

When the South African police can use IBM computers (which they may have purchased with the help of a Citibank loan) to monitor black citizens and then send soldiers to put down a racial disturbance in a Ford truck fueled with Mobil gasoline, the U.S. corporate role in perpetuating apartheid becomes transparently obvious.

Beneath the wall of statistics one encounters in dealing with the South African issue, several crucial questions inevitably surface. Can corporations expect to play any role in influencing the policies of foreign governments? Can companies operating in South Africa affect meaningful change by remaining in the country? What role can the University of Vermont play in bringing about an end to apartheid?

Any argument that foreign corporations cannot and do not influence the internal and external policies of most governments is ludicrous. This has been amply demonstrated in Chile (see Cynic Sept. 21), Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Indonesia, the Phillipines and many others. With foreign investment constituting a major percentage of the nation's economy, it is not unlikely that a determined

WHAT'S AN NSA CAREER?

Take the PQT and find out.

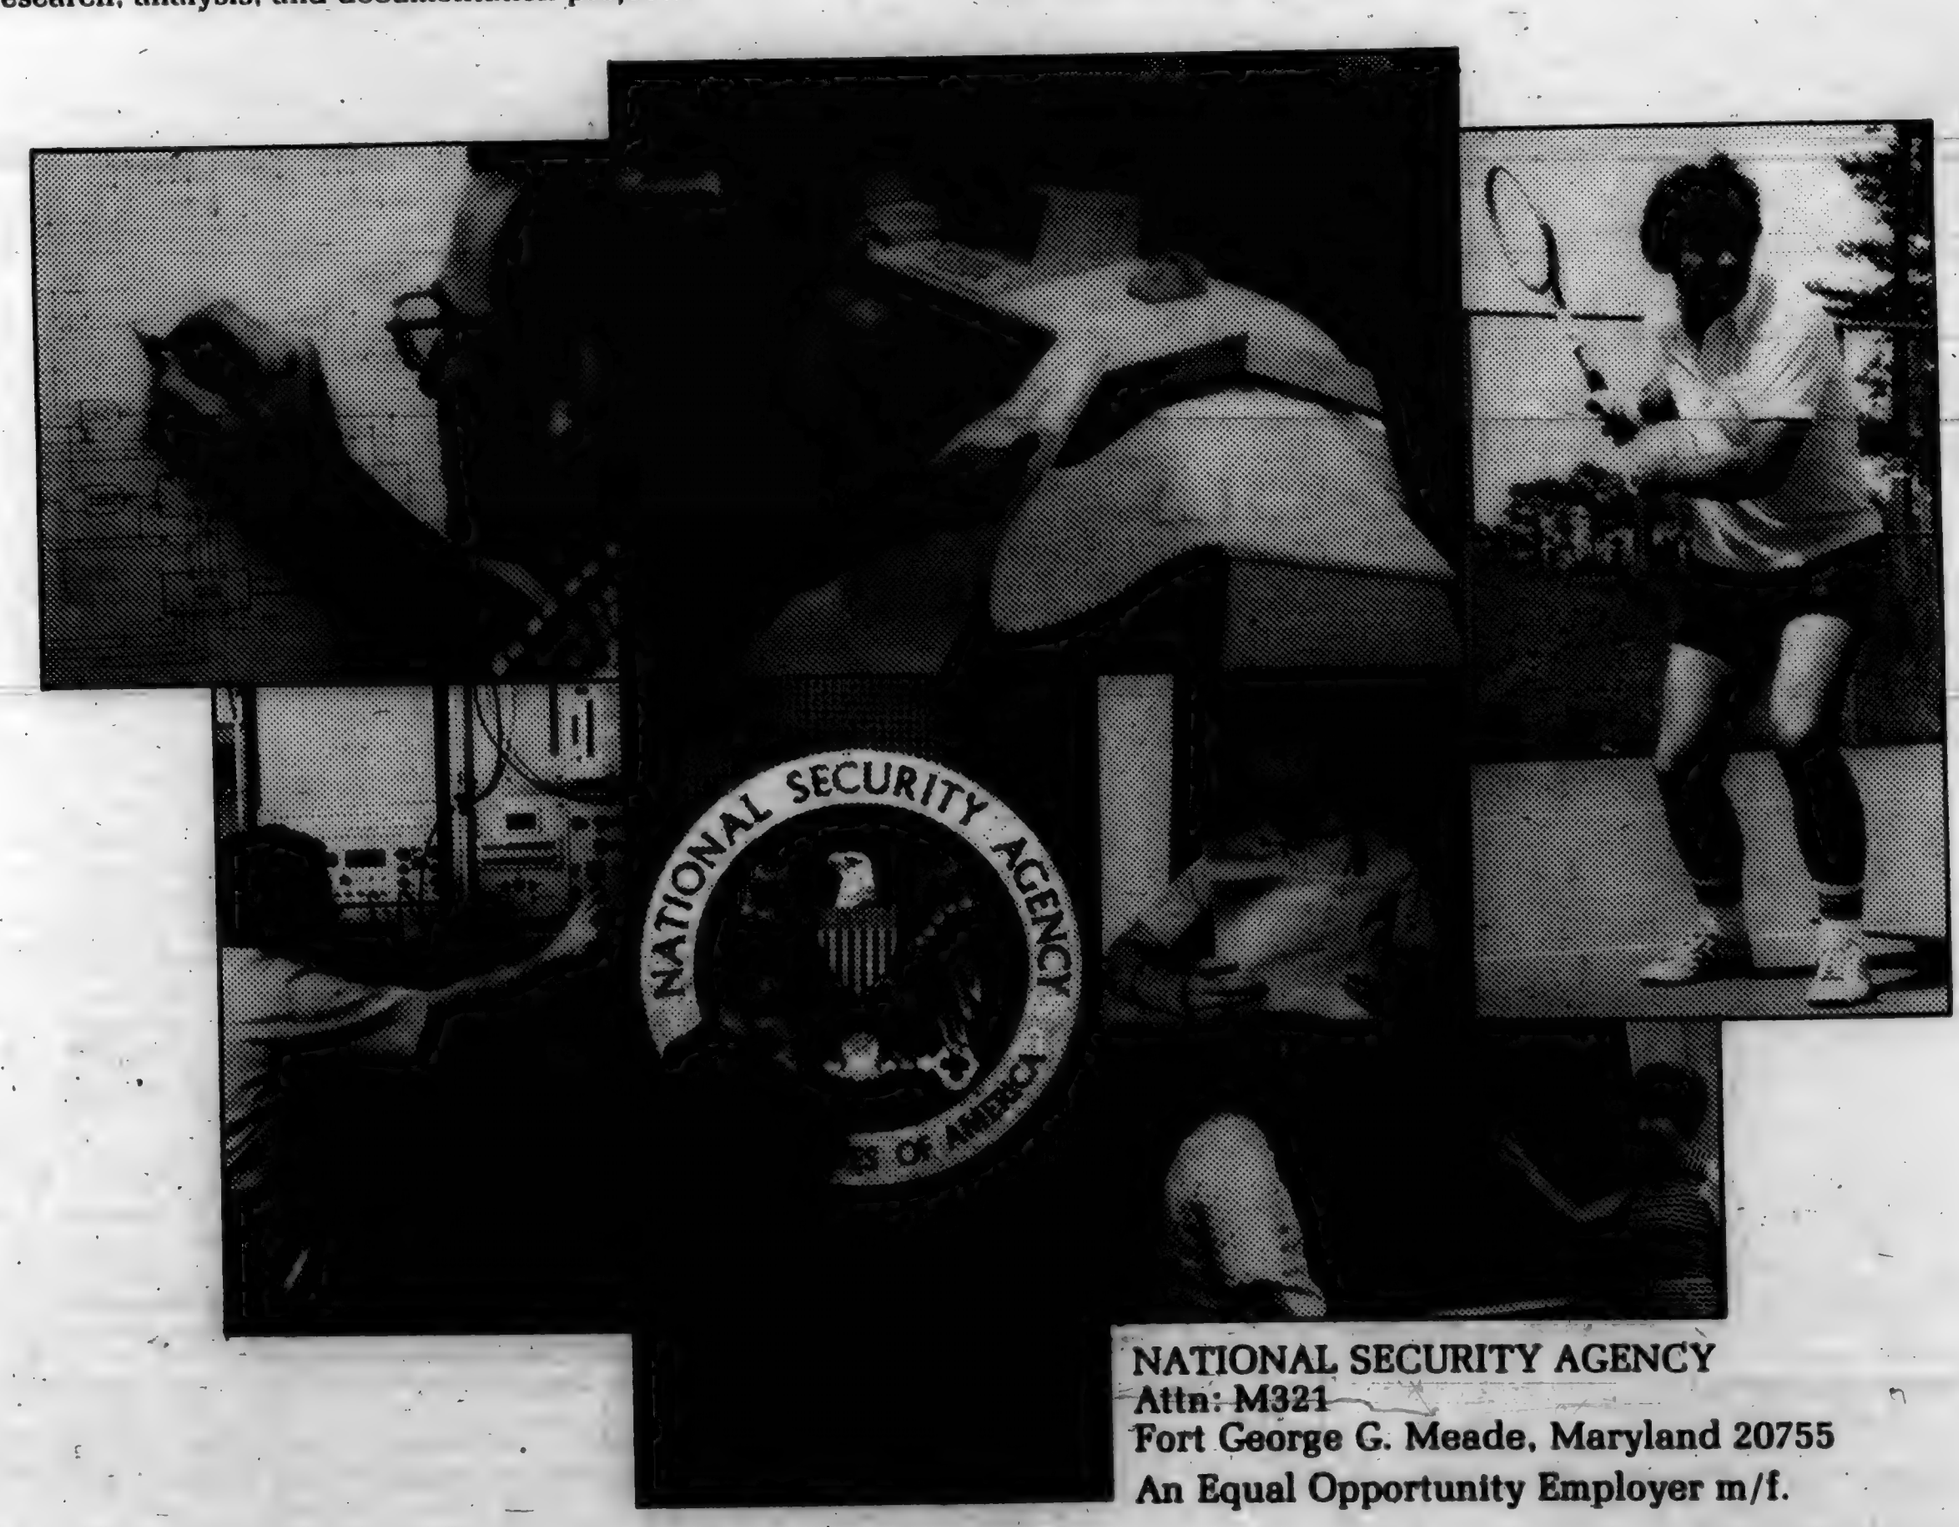
Graduates from a broad spectrum of academic disciplines may now enter challenging career training programs with the National Security Agency. If you are receiving a liberal arts, business, or mathematics degree before September 1979, the Professional Qualification Test (PQT) could be your first step toward employment in one of these programs.

You must register by November 4, 1978 in order to take the PQT on campus. It will not be given again during this school year. By scoring well on this test, you will qualify for an employment interview. During the interview, an NSA representative will discuss the specific role you might play in furthering this country's communications security or in producing vital foreign intelligence information.

The PQT helps to measure your potential for career areas such as:

PROGRAMMING — Our vast communications analysis projects could not be effectively managed without the latest computer hardware/software and people who know how to use them.

LANGUAGES — Foreign languages are valuable tools for research, analysis, and documentation projects. Advanced training in language (perhaps a new language) can be expected.



COMMUNICATIONS — Scientifically devised, tested, and managed cryptographic systems insure the maximum degree of security in transmitting sensitive information around the globe. Since cryptography is a unique pursuit, the training of new employees here is extensive and esoteric.

OTHER OPPORTUNITIES — A limited number of applicants will also be selected from the PQT fo enter our Information Science, Logistics, Resource Management, Security, and Personnel fields.

PICK UP A PQT BULLETIN at your college placement office. It contains a registration form which you must mail prior to November 4 in order to take the test on November 18. There is no registration fee.

Electronic Engineering, Computer Science, Slavic, Mid-Eastern and Asian language majors and Mathematics majors at the Masters level may interview without taking the PQT.

U.S. Citizenship is mandatory. A thorough background investigation and medical examination are also required.

To Yell Or Not To Yell "Terrorist"?

William Kunstler Talks of the Berster Trial and Its Implications

By Nelson Hockert-Lotz

When William Kunstler takes a legal case, it becomes a political event. It becomes news, it becomes theatre, and finally, it becomes history.

Kunstler is a sensationalist, in the sense that it applies to a genre of media expert. His name elicits an emotional response from the public, stemming from the barrage of press coverage he uses to politicize his cases. His media image places him at the center of storms of conflict so often that the outcome is often overlooked. He is clearly one of the best trial lawyers in America today. The people he defends all have one thing in common: they have been acquitted.

Kunstler became a national figure when he defended the Chicago Seven against conspiracy charges stemming from the demonstrations which surrounded the 1968 Democratic Convention. He had become well-known in activist circles in the 1960's for his defense of civil rights leaders, notably H. Rap Brown and Martin Luther King, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize.

Since the Chicago Seven, he has championed such causes as the defense of Russell Means, head of the American Indian Movement during and after the occupation of Wounded Knee, S.D.; JoAnn Little, charged with murdering a jailer who tried to rape her; and perhaps most dramatically was the negotiator for the prisoners who held Attica yard. Most of the friends and clients he represented in the prison yard were surrounded by an array of National Guardsmen and later shot to death along with their hostages in a murderous guard assault on the rebellious prisoners.

His present client, Kristina Berster, was picked up by a U.S. customs officer about fifteen feet inside of the United States. At that time, she claimed she had crossed the border unintentionally.

A fingerprint check identified Berster as a student wanted by the West German government. She had been charged in 1971 with associating with extreme leftists. She had been living underground in France and Canada since she failed to appear at her trial in 1973.

Since her arrival in the U.S. Berster has denounced the West German regime's treatment of political prisoners. She is now seeking asylum in the U.S.

Kunstler quickly came to her defense, being long concerned with the treatment of accused terrorists and their lawyers in West Germany.

Kristina Berster was judged guilty long before the trial when the FBI called her a "most-wanted" terrorist. It was an inflammatory indictment, reminiscent of the 1960's, when the FBI set out to destroy the civil rights movement. Kunstler, the lawyer of movement leader Martin Luther King, is convinced that the FBI planned and financed King's murder, after all other efforts failed to discredit the "Black Messiah."

Last week the Cynic interviewed Kunstler on the Kristina Berster case. The interview was held in the Burlington apartment where he is staying for the length of the trial. The small apartment was crowded with members of the defense committee and friends. A baby cried intermittantly in the next room. The interview closed as Kunstler sat down before the television in the bottom of the sixth inning of a not-so-closely contested Yankee – Dodger game. Kunstler, an outspoken critic of television sports, noted that the play-offs were "only once a year."

"The use of the term 'terrorist' by the FBI... I think was done soley for whipping up public support for increased appropriations..."

Cynic: I understand you don't want to go into the origins of the passport Kristina used to get into the country.

Kunstler: No, because I think she'll be testifying as to that. I don't want to give anybody, in advance, what she is going to say.

Cynic: She will be testifying, to that effect?

Kunstler: I think so.

Cynic: Kristina's been labelled a "suspected terrorist." Is there any doubt in your mind that she might possibly be that?

Kunstler: There's no doubt in my mind, from what I know of her. But it wouldn't really make any difference one way or the other because there is absolutely no proof. And the use of the term "terrorist" by the FBI – who not only branded her a terrorist, but branded her three co-defendants as possible terrorists – I think was done solely for the purpose of whipping up public support in this country for increased appropriations for the FBI. They had announced several months earlier that it was now going to be taking up the subject of terrorism, and that terrorism was about to come to the United States. I think that the Berster episode is all the bureau needs to push that campaign over. And I think that is why they let out the false information, not for one day, but for three days running (July 20, 21 & 22). They issued press releases, couched in the words of William Webster, the present director of the FBI. This was a rather high-powered effort to discredit her; but I don't think for that purpose alone. It was also for the purpose of creating public clamour and support for an FBI anti-terrorist appropriation.

Cynic: If you suspected that she had engaged in any number of things the West German government might call terrorist activities, given the political climate in West Germany, would you still represent her and support her plea for asylum in the U.S.?

Kunstler: Absolutely. It would make absolutely no difference to me, because what we're fighting here is not the question of terrorism, but whether anyone who is labelled a terrorist, whether that person is or is not, can get a fair trial and fair treatment in West Germany today. I think the universal answer is no, not only by us, but by every writer who has considered the subject. There are articles appearing in almost all of the relatively established magazines, like Harper's or N.Y.U.'s Journal of International Politics, Esquire, New Yorker, and Civil Liberties. There is also strong support in the United Nations, which is demanding an explanation from West Germany as to what they're doing to their so-called "outlaws" – the people they've labelled "terrorists." So far, to my knowledge, West Germany has not responded to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights demands.

It doesn't matter, therefore, whether one is a terrorist or not. The treatment will be different than that accorded all other Germans.

Cynic: I understand that the charges Berster faces in Germany are not charges that would hold up in any court in the United States. Would that have any effect upon prospective extradition proceedings?

Kunstler: I think it will have a great effect. The charge against her is that she associated with people who are, according to the West Germans, known terrorists. An associational crime is under our law not permitted. It's called "guilt by association," and there's always been a concern in this country that that should not be permitted. It would not be a crime in this country, and therefore I don't think it is an extraditable crime.

Cynic: There is more security connected with this trial than one would expect, particularly in Burlington. For instance, it's rumored that the judge's house is under 24-hour guard for the length of the trial. Could that prejudice the outcome of the trial?

Kunstler: I think that there's a paranoia associated with these trials that manifests itself in excess security. But it's more than just this irrational response or paranoia. There is also a desire to convict certain people; and I think she fits that category. Because underneath is an American fear of terrorism. We've had a great number of really gory examples of terrorism throughout the world. In this country people really fear it. Therefore, I think that when anyone is even called a terrorist, particularly when it's done by an agency such as the FBI, many people are prone to believe it. At least the suspicion is planted that she might be a terrorist, or why would the FBI go to the trouble of calling her one? That, I think, generates a lot of reactions in the minds of people. They want to get her. They want to get her for the most understandable, but irrational of reasons. She's been called a terrorist, ergo she must be a terrorist, and it would be better for the whole community if she were put away in jail for a long time, so that every would-be terrorist that would come to the U.S. or would operate as such in this country would get the message. That's all irrational, unreasonable, and unconstitutional. But it is understandable. That's the way people are.

Cynic: Could this kind of "irrational" reaction take place anywhere as it's taking place in West Germany, and to a lesser extent here?

Kunstler: Oh, I think it has happened everywhere. There are some people, or some activities, which so frighten the general population that they will tolerate any type of treatment of them. Even though that treatment, as in the days of the Third Reich, may be gassing Jews, putting people in concentration camps, or anything that you can think of. They will justify all of that if they can be convinced that that is what it takes to prevent these

Robinson Hall takes a second crack at their solar greenhouse

By Sue Harvey Kashanski

Yes, it is true that Burlington, Vt. is one of the cloudiest cities in the United States. But that is no reason to disregard solar energy as a viable energy source for this region. So if you see Robinson Hall residents banging away on their solar greenhouse, don't think they're misinformed – they're just optimistic about the future of their creation.

Last spring, a core of determined Robinson residents decided to construct a solar greenhouse on the southeastern side of the dorm. The work began and, despite minor setbacks, the building was completed in time for the May 16th Sun Day celebration.

Unfortunately, a hot summer and rainy fall have taken their toll on the plastic walls of the structure, and all that presently remains is a sturdy wooden frame... and a nice challenge.

Under the direction of Jon Weidman, the greenhouse revitalization project will soon begin, this time in a race against the winter. The dilapidated plastic walls will be replaced by Kelwall, an opaque fiberglass, on the outside, and heavy plastic on the inside, with the necessary dead air space inbetween.

For the solar greenhouse to work, there must be a south to south-westerly exposure, heat storage areas, an angled roof and insulated structure, and dead air space within the collecting surface. The Robinson greenhouse, if built as planned, will have it all.

50-gallon drums, painted black and containing water, will be set facing the sun inside the greenhouse walls. The water in the drums will heat up and store energy from the daytime sun, releasing this heat slowly back into the greenhouse during the night or periods of cloudy weather.

According to Weidman, the major stumbling block to the greenhouse project is money. "We have lots of people who are excited and want to do work," Weidman claims, "but financing the purchase of insulation, plastic, and the Kelwall is a problem."

In an effort to raise money, Weidman and some of his co-workers went to pick apples last weekend for selling and making into baked goods, but the crop this year was poor at the selected orchard. The greenhouse crew is planning to sponsor other fundraisers soon, so that work on the greenhouse can be completed by the first major snowfall.

–All that presently remains is a sturdy wooden frame... and a nice challenge.

Inspiration and practical ideas for the project came from the New Alchemy Institute which Weidman visited last spring. Located on the Cape, this establishment houses alternative energy systems including complete biosystems, fish and all, within various solar units.

Although the Robinson greenhouse will be a far cry from a complete biosystem, if successful it will be another example of the feasibility of solar systems in Vermont.

A Place in the Country

A short story by Chris Mercer

In a corner of New England rears a mountain with a human face, The-Man-Who-Looks-at-the-Sky. From the top of The Man, you can see across a carpet of green hills to a broad silver lake and the pale blue mountains of another state. By the lake sprawls the metropolis of Renton with its overflow suburbs of checkless population, prosperity, and mediocrity. Each year, Renton inches closer to The Man despite the wild barriers of the hills protecting their monarch.

As seen from Renton, The Man's profile stares skyward, uninterested in earthly affairs. To the south, The Volcano, with its cone-shaped summit, threatens Renton's valley with visions of belching hell fire and brimstone.

Perhaps the most objective view of the area is found on the hill behind Houghton House, half-way between Renton and the mountains. To the left, the water towers of civilization; to the right, massive ridges patiently waiting to be worn down and washed into the lake. The hill is a rude upsurge of limestone boulders covered with junipers and dying elms: a pimple on the earth's face. Below the Pimple, a large rundown brick house with twin gables faces the road. In front, a fence of Lombardy poplars has turned brown like great shafts of wheat.

One October morning, an old pick-up bounced along the drive through mud-splashing potholes. Behind the wheel loomed the determined face of an elderly woman, deeply lined and seemingly frozen into a permanent frown. She parked among the collection of aging autos scattered around the house. Inside, she climbed a bare oak staircase to a narrow hallway leading to several bedrooms. In the hallway stood a modest table badly in need of varnish. She opened the lone drawer and gathered up a pile of white envelopes, each with the brisk inscription: Juno Jenkins Rent October $80.

Downstairs in the kitchen, Rupert Haynes was saying to Jason Clarkson over coffee: "Do you think she will ever sell this place? She talks and talks about the cost of keeping it up, and the taxes alone must be $5,000."

"Yeah," Jason answered swallowing. "But understand that complain as she does, it's her choice. She could sell out tomorrow and retire to Florida, only then she wouldn't know what to do with herself. Struggling comes naturally to Juno, she's been doing it for so long; and you have to admire her. She won't be put away in a nursing home; someday, she will collapse in the barn while milking her cows."

"And Wentworth will be first in line to purchase this place and parlay it into a fortune," Jason concluded with a bitter sip.

"Perhaps," Rupert's eyes narrowed as he raised his hand prophetically. "One of us or a bunch of past residents will put up the money to return this dilapidated mansion to its former splendor or at least retain it as a haven for indigents, transients, and dreamers."

The hill is a rude upsurge of limestone boulders covered with junipers and dying elms: a pimple on the earth's face.

The two young men shared a hearty laugh and let their thoughts wander into wistful hoping.

In the next room, Bart Wentworth was busy breaking land, selling authentic New England farm houses, and pushing retirement plots in Paradise. He resembled an overfed, overbeered, red-faced, red-mustached German burgher; the waxed curls of his mustache and his swaggering walk gave him an air of authority. Yet, a sense of humor preceded Wentworth like a sign held to an audience with the message: Laugh!

To reach the bathroom from his office, Wentworth had to walk through the kitchen. With familiar bluster, he entered upon Jason and Rupert in solemn meditation.

"Why don't you guys do something productive today? Why don't you buy a few beers, get loose and happy, and wash these floors?"

"Because we go to school, Bart," Jason grumbled, and abruptly farted to emphasize his academic burden.

With a low grunt, Wentworth went about his business and retreated back to the world of finance.

"Be productive," Jason scoffed. "He's nothing more than a land pimp, a middle man, a vulture. Yesterday, I heard him gabbing on the phone to some guy who had just lost his job. Wentworth was sympathetic for a moment "aw that's too bad" and then stopped playing around "so when are you gonna sell your house?"

"Then there are those SOBs from Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey who have more money than brains; and because a place in the country is the "in-thing," they're all too happy to let Wentworth rip 'em off."

"What can you do?" Rupert posed his coffee like a cocktail. "He's not the only one in the business."

"That's the problem. Besides, the natives can't afford to refuse the crazy prices. Pretty soon we'll be caretakers in one large resort: a National Park complete with rustic specimens."

The sound of footsteps coming downstairs ended the conversation.

"I thought I smelled something cooking," Rupert heard before seeing a wizened face half smiling atop a wiry, shabbily clad figure.

"You must be Juno," he said. "I'm your new tenant, Rupert Haynes. I live down the hall on the right."

"And paid too," Juno nodded in her squeaky voice.

"I sure enjoy living here," replied Rupert with a smile.

"I'd live here if I could," Juno squeaked plaintively. "But I can't afford to. No, all I do is get older."

That was her final decision; and though she visited weekly to check her cows out back and inspect the house, she never decided to evict the tenants and retire. Juno didn't even have the heart to kick Wentworth out of his real estate office. Once a month, Juno threatened him, but he always talked her into letting him stay.

"But what about your farm on the other side of Renton?" Rupert asked, as if to convince her to sell the farm and move into Houghton House.

"It gives me something to do. You spend Thanksgiving and Christmas with your family, don't you? I spend mine in the barn with the cows; they're good company."

"Well, you're eating, and I've got to feed my dry heifers out back," she flatly stated. "Eat up now."

As she moved to go, Rupert spoke politely, "I'm glad to have met you," to which she answered silently, touching her hair nervously like a young coquette. She was not a grandmother, nor a hag, nor an invalid: she was a spirit who had outlived her flesh.

That afternoon, Rupert sat on the cracked, sun-drenched porch hunched against a post and writing a letter to Ellen Caldwell, his off-again, on-again lover. The Indian summer of mid-autumn had rekindled in Rupert a longing to see the woman who, though lost, had inspired him as no other woman had before or since.

His letter was interrupted by a middle-aged Connecticut couple in a Lincoln Continental asking if Wentworth lived there.

"Nope," Rupert drawled, imitating the yokel these down-country folks expected. Sucking on his pen as if it were a pipe, he continued, "Wentworth lives next door. But his office is here; I think he's in."

The pair confusedly thanked Rupert and cautiously made their way inside as if at any second the old house would give up the ghost and crash down upon them.

"I hope Wentworth doesn't try to sell them this place," Rupert snickered. Then he grew serious as he recalled a story of when a woman had come to the house asking if this was where she had bought all that fine antique furniture at such a ridiculously low price. If the price was right, Wentworth would sell anything, even if it didn't belong to him.

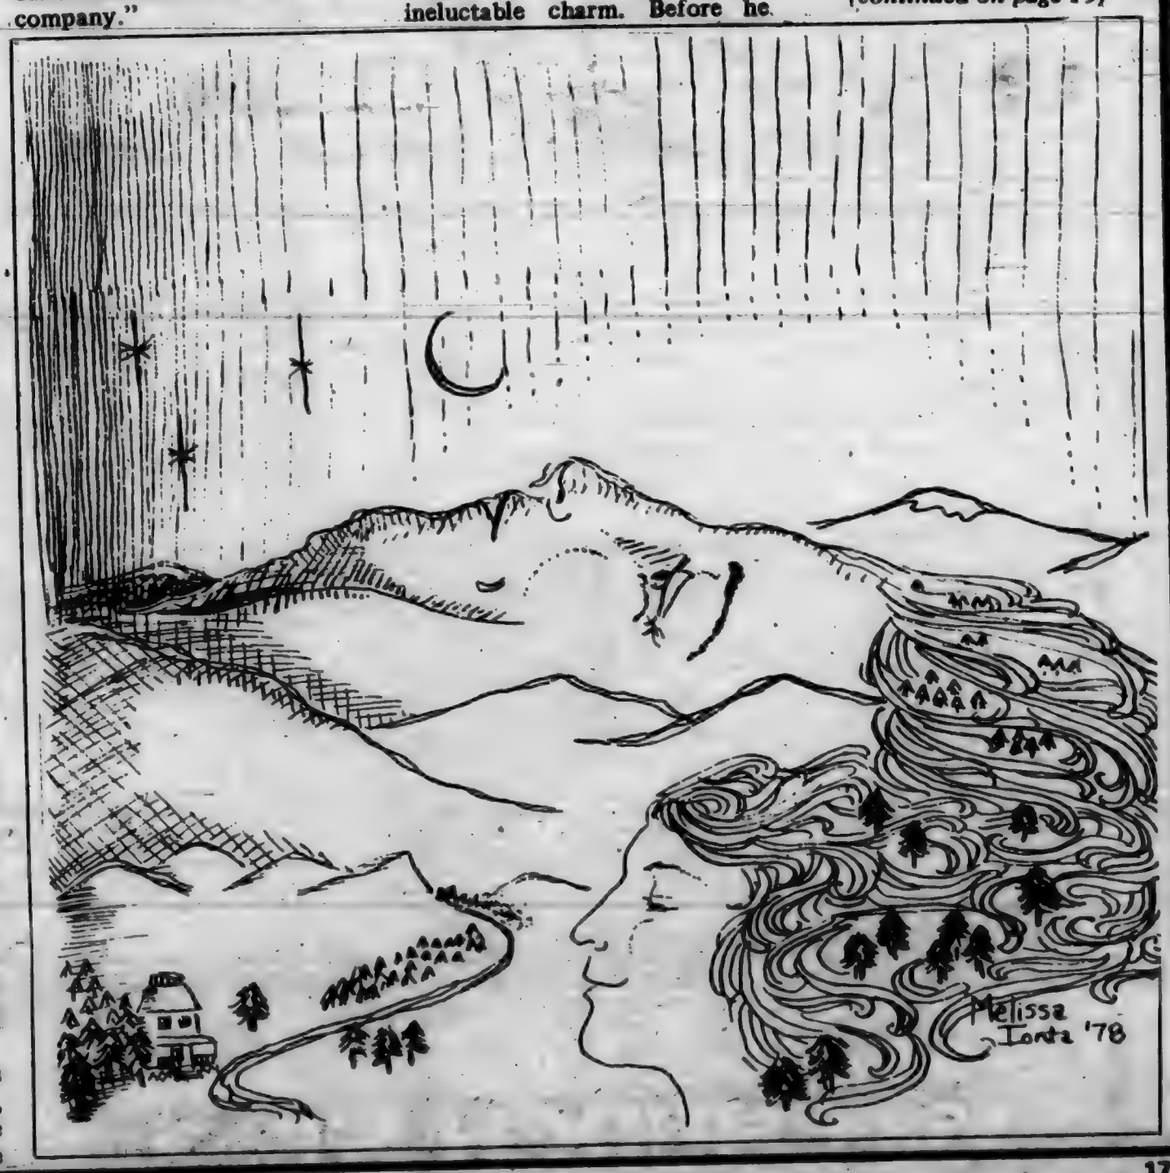
In the middle of his memories, a red sports car turned into the drive. At first glance, Rupert understood, in an excited shock, who it was and what she meant. She should have been hundreds of miles away, yet she was still drawn, still curious.

Ellen parked and emerged smiling wonderfully. In her over-powering way, she raced to Rupert and embraced him with ineluctable charm. Before he could talk, she kissed him long and deep. As a drowning man flails at the water, so did Rupert protest her assault and with equal success. Ellen's appearance was his wildest wish, a refreshing challenge of spirit and spontaneity; Rupert recognized but one choice: here we go again.

He broke away long enough to whisper, "Let's go inside," and with the respect of a noble, he offered Ellen his arm. In a ceremonial procession, they passed through the front door and upstairs into the inevitable room.

Downstairs, Wentworth was entertaining the Connecticut couple with phony stories of the modern ranch house they were about to buy. Wentworth's favorite tale about how the builder's ghost was driven off by marijuana smoke was cut short by a discordant moaning and regularly pronounced creaking.

In keeping with his lecherous tendencies, Wentworth issued a wide knowing grin. The couple, however, were less than impressed. Noticing their chagrin, Wentworth suggested a stroll in the fresh air and the couple quickly agreed. But as the trio came out onto the porch under Rupert's window, the wailing and earthmoving reached a peak.



In total disgust, the couple hurried to the refuge of their car, threw Wentworth a meager "Thank you, er, some other time," and sped away.

Ordinarily, Wentworth enjoyed a raucous good laugh, but this time he was the victim. Not being a good loser, especially with money at stake, Wentworth did not wait for his would-be clients to leave before he unleashed a torrent of swearing. With red-faced sputtering rage, Wentworth blew back inside and upstairs.

Ellen and Rupert were unprepared for Wentworth's visit. Still coupled, they were soaked in sweat, and breath and blood thumped in their ears.

"God damn you stupid, horny, sex-mad, freaks!" Wentworth shrieked as he ripped open Rupert's door. He moved to pummel the two, but realizing

In the third and final part of this series dealing with urban renewal in Burlington, we are going to explore the waterfront area of Burlington. Presently, this area, which includes about nine thousand one hundred linear feet (roughly equivalent to the area between Cliffside and North Beach), is virtually untapped economically or residentially except for the shipment of oil and related products to the storage tanks which dot the area. With some careful development, including a greatly improved means of access, the area will prove a boom to the tourist industry as well as the enjoyment of the residents of the Queen City.

Recently, most cities blessed with waterfront property have found it decaying. In Burlington's case, its original waterfront development revolved around the lumber industry. As that industry faded away, so did the utilization of the lakefront area. Later, some scattered industry moved in, finally bringing in oil tanks for the trade in that commodity.

With the decline, the Burlington shoreline gradually became an unusable eyesore. As a consequence of the haphazard industrial development of the area, the waterfront was divided into numerous separate areas, making lateral movement extremely difficult along the region. Without access to the area, the public forgot about it.

So, when the city began urban renewal in the 1960's, much of the rubble was taken to the obvious area, the waterfront. By this time, the region between North Beach and Cliffside was virtually unused by the public. This does not include the ferry dock or its immediate area.

What to do? Basically, nobody knew what to do with this immense, untapped natural resource. The Lake with the Adirondaks in the foreground were to be viewed from above, not from below. This was evident in the fact that the waterfront region of Burlington wasn't mentioned in 1964 when Burlington came out with its comprehensive plan for development of the city.

It was not until 1973 when the Comprehensive Plan was revised, that the waterfront was included. The Plan stated that: "To the extent possible, the waterfront should be divided into the following areas of use: passive recreation, active recreation, low, medium and high density residential, commercial and industrial uses. The public should have access to the waterfront both physically and visually." 1973 was to mark the beginning of renewed interest in the area.

By 1976, a Waterfront Development Board was in full operation out of the Burlington Planning Commission. The Board asked for $10,000 from the Planning Commission's Federal Community Development Grant in August of 1976. Money from the Grant was to develop a land use plan that would spell out the development for the area along Lake Champlain.

Earlier in June of 1976, the board had wanted $45,000 to develop their plan. The National Endowment for the Arts had granted $20,000 to the project to be matched by Burlington, with the remaining $5,000 to have been for the services of Planning Commissioner Randall Kamerbeek. Operations were in full swing.

By June of this year, the City had a Municipal Development Plan. It stated that: "The provisions of this plan are further designed to create an urban environment which serves to maintain the quality of life that makes Burlington what it is." With a purpose, and a context, the plan began to unfold.

For the immediate future, ten acres of the waterfront area (between the foot of College Street and the Shell Oil tanks) are slated for construction by Triad Corporation at an estimated cost of $22 million. The plan calls for the construction of about four hundred and twenty upper-income condominiums which will range in the area from $45,000 to $80,000. That cost excludes low income occupancy from that part of the project.

However, in the same area, a grouping of moderately priced rental units are also planned for construction. Work will begin on

Creative Sound offers carefully selected stereo systems We'd like to introduce you to our new matched SYSTEM $379

Our stereo systems have become known for the high quality and value that they present. It's taken over 12 months to find just the right products to achieve such a fine system, priced under $400, and yet worthy of your ears. System $379 will bring years of high fidelity performance to you, with the same high standards of performance that you might have paid twice as much for several years ago. In this sense, System $379 is truely a value breakthrough.

System $379 consists of the new Technics SA80 receiver, it features a powerful 30 watt RMS output, and an FM tuner that is as sensitive as many receivers costing more. And it has many of the same high performance characteristics that are found in even the most expensive Technics receivers, such as: flat group delay IF, phase-lock-loop FM, 90dB phono S/N radio.

We've coupled this first class receiver to the Fisher MS 135 passive radiator speaker system. These very efficient speakers will surprise even the most critical ear, for their high clarity and accurate base handling response are very good. When you listen to System $379, you'll agree that these speakers are far from ordinary.

Last, but not least, we've included the BSR2260 automatic turntable. It comes equipped with the QLM 30 MDIII stereo cartridge. The BSR2260 is a very reliable performer. It features cue control as well as auto eject at the end of a record. It can also be operated manual as many audiophiles prefer.

Upon credit approval System $379 may be purchased for as little as $37 down with $17.10 a month for 24 months (A.P.R. 18.11%)

four acres of the area for construction of between ninety-five and one hundred and twenty of the units in the condominium. This should take place soon. The money, which aided in the planning of this project, came from an Urban Development Action Grant from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Preparation of the area will be somewhat extensive. For example, the breakwater will have to be extended to allow it to protect better, this especially in light of the planned one hundred slot marina to be constructed along the site. The oil tanks should be removed following the expiration of their leases on January 1, 1978. Central Vermont Railroad owns the right-of-way along the entire length of the waterfront, making its cooperation key to any development. Plans call for a sixty year lease of the land from the Central Vermont Railroad.

Other work which has to be done includes the clean-up of the area. Cement blocks and other objects which were dumped in areas will have to be removed. One even more important problem is the creation of pedestrian access to the area. The Municipal Development Plan states: "The confused array of paved areas, fences, rail lines, etc., does not encourage the pedestrian to go to the water's edge. Provisions for clear pedestrian access to appropriate locations along the waterfront shall be made as well as a public way immediately along the shoreline in specific areas."

That public way refers to a thirty foot public right-of-way on the waterfront which will be constructed by city ordinance as development of the area progresses. Currently, plans call for a public way to extend from North Beach to Red Rocks. This whole aspect of the project will give the residents of Burlington a massive new recreational area.

Other plans in the future for the area includes the conversion of the jetty at the foot of College Street to be turned into a city park. This will give a specific access to the area from which pedestrians can wander about. The whole Church Street route to the Lake, as well as that of King Street, will be kept clear as "visual corridors" of the city.

Finally, arrangements have to be made for the motorists. In the past, the King Street dock was swarmed with automobiles needing a place to park. At present, a southern connector is being debated which would give vastly improved access as well as potential parking along its length for commuters. However, there is no need for despair. As part of the planning and coordination of the separate renewal plans including the Church Street Mall, the Civic Center, and Waterfront Development, a transit loop has been organized to service the area. It will come down College to Battery Street and then back up Cherry Street leading to easy access.

Renewal began in the 1960's with the Model Cities Program and the efforts of local municipalities around the nation. Vermont statute Title 24 Chapter 117, granted "authority to municipalities to regulate land use and land subdivision." Burlington began its ambitious program for the future with federal, state, and local funds. The result may well be a pedestrian mall on Church Street, a civic center for twenty-five hundred people, a revitalized waterfront, and an innovative transit loop for a small city. Clearly, Burlington is moving to create a bigger, better, and leading New England community.

Rupert's superior strength, he refrained.

Unaware of what they had done, Ellen immediately wrapped herself in a sheet and rolled away toward the wall. Rupert, however, knew all too well of Wentworth's yen for vicarious pleasures.

"I'm sorry to disturb you, Bart," Rupert said getting up, his naked body shining wet. "Let's talk this over later," he said approaching the intruder. But Wentworth was gone with a snort.

An hour later, Rupert kissed Ellen into her red sports car and returned inside to Wentworth's office. Wentworth was hanging up the phone as Rupert entered.

"I'm talking to Juno about buying Houghton House. She's too old to keep track of the place and she could use the money. Besides, I can't operate a decent business with you degenerates running around here." Wentworth grinned at last.

Rupert froze. The auspicious ending of an era passed through his mind. "Huh, I see," Rupert muttered almost choking. "I got studying to do. See ya later."

He raced up the squeaky staircase and then up through the attic to the widow's walk. Narrowly surrounded by a paintless grey balustrade, the walk resembled a box at the theatre. Westward, mountains hung in purple ripples, and the lake blinked a soft silver. Rupert disregarded the foreground, a gaudy jumble of aspiring suburbia, and turned south to Wentworth's old yellow farm house and the intervening expanse of gnarled trees, brown trampled grass, and intractable iceberg boulders. The Pimple, forever undevelopable, held the only promise of seasons past and future. Rupert fought his imagination of houses cluttered on the pasture sloping away from Houghton House to the stream and barbed wire boundary. The clear sky, now becoming starry and moonlit, closed like a lid over The Man, The Volcano, and the silent landscape.

"What you see is what you own," Rupert grandly waved. "Not a bad show for 80 bucks a month. If only it could last...

CITY BIRDS

When I get lonesome and homesick for the country,
And feel as if I must have some space to call my own,
I go up to the rooftop
and survey what lies before me.
To my left looms brick buildings, to my right, others like bars in a great cage reach towards the sky, and air vents grow like viruses from the tarred and sooty roofs.
Before me the only sight is rows and rows of rooftops and a myriad of chimneys belching soot.
And behind, buildings cut off the sun.
When at last my mind, is black with despair,
because there is no place for it to wander,
I sight a flock of pigeons
soaring on the breeze,
They circle in play, first to the left
than back again,
now dipping behind a wall reappearing higher then,
gliding so daringly close,
to each familiar wall,
each time reappearing, eyes shining more insanely than before.
I imagine it must amuse them,
to be so fragrantly free,
while below we must be content,
with our illusions of reality.

Eggs, Cholesterol, And Atherosclerosis

Editor's Note: This article, printed last week, was so butchered by our trusty staff that it is being run again in its correct entirety. Our sincerest apologies to Mr. Gustin. A rebuttal by Dr. Carew will be offered at some later date.

By Barry Gustin

Recently, a disconcerting report was published by a prominent member of the University of Vermont's faculty, Dr. Lyndon B. Carew. The article entitled "They Aren't Such Bad Eggs" appears in the August 7th and 14th editions of Feedstuffs, a magazine of the animal feed industry. The content of this paper forms the basis of information he presents to an impressionable group of students in the university's most popular nutrition course.

In the report, Dr. Carew presented evidence from three scientific studies which showed that the addition of one or two eggs to the diet of healthy subjects produced no significant overall increase in blood cholesterol levels. He concluded that eating eggs will not contribute to the development of atherosclerosis, a disease of the blood vessels, which normally progresses in the presence of "elevated" serum cholesterol levels.

These conclusions assume the soundness of the premise that present-day average blood cholesterol levels in the U.S. are normal. "Average" does not necessarily mean "ideal."

Population Studies

A comparison of vegetarians and primitive people having a low incidence of atherosclerosis to Americans having a high incidence gives an indication of what "healthy" blood cholesterol levels are.

Studies of rural Guatemalan Indians and Kalahari Bushmen whose dietary cholesterol intake is sharply lower than in westernized societies, have exhibited blood cholesterol levels that rarely exceed 180mg/dl. (Mendez J. et al American Journal Clinical Nutrition 10:403,1962) (Miller K. Arch. Intern. Med. 121:414, 1968)

Studies of the Seventh-Day Adventists, a vegetarian church group in the U.S., reveal serum cholesterol levels significantly lower than those of the general population, the level coinciding closely with a decreased consumption of saturated fat and cholesterol. (West R.O. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 21:853, 1968). The incidence of coronary heart disease has been reported to be approximately 40% less among the Seventh-Day Adventist males than among males in the general population of the U.S. (Wynder E.L. Cancer 12:1016, 1959)

It is usually the case that when the mean serum cholesterol levels of populations are very low (e.g. 140-175 mg/dl), clinical coronary heart disease and severe coronary atherosclerosis are rare. (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 163)

In America, at least 30% of the population have plasma cholesterol levels greater than 250 mg/dl. (Reiser R. Amer. J. Clin Nutr. 31:865, 1978). The renowned Framingham Study indicated that plasma cholesterol levels above 180 mg/dl constitutes an ever increasing risk for coronary heart disease in adults (Kannel W.B. et al Ann. Intern. Med. 74:1, 1971). A majority of adults in the U.S. with coronary disease, in fact, have plasma cholesterol levels of 220 mg/dl or above (Connor W.E. Prev. Med. 1:49, 1972)

Unfortunately, the American "norm" is anything but ideal and carries with it a several-fold increased risk of developing atherosclerotic heart disease when compared with the incidence of the disease in relatively unaffected cultures. In other words, average American serum cholesterol levels are already pathogenic; that is, they are sufficiently high as to result in the present-day epidemic of atherosclerosis in the country.

Hereditary factors as a primary cause of high blood cholesterol levels for all but a few percent of those at risk, have been ruled out by human migration studies. Those individuals who migrate from an area of low cardiovascular disease to an area of high cardiovascular disease rapidly acquire the high blood level characteristic of their host population. This has been demonstrated with Japanese migrants living in Hawaii or California (Keys A. et al Ann. Intern. Med. 48:83, 1958)

Close inspection of Dr. Carew's paper shows that he is quoting studies which have an inherent defect in their approach. This defect tends to invalidate the conclusions he derives from the data.

Dr. Carew assumes that because the feeding of one to two additional eggs per day produce no increase in blood cholesterol levels, the cholesterol of eggs is not a factor in the pathogenesis of atherosclerosis. This is an erroneous assumption. Dr. Carew fails to consider that the subjects of these studies may have already exhibited a near maximum response to a diet previously high in cholesterol. An additional egg or two would then have no significant effect.

Evidence has elsewhere been presented which postulates a dietary "threshold" of cholesterol intake above which no simple linear effect of diet on serum cholesterol levels is exerted (Connors W.E. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 31:727, 1978). Connors reports that most Americans already ingest dietary cholesterol above this threshold. Metabolic studies have shown that this dietary threshold appears to be within the range of 500 to 600 mg. per day (two eggs). (Beveridge J.M. J. Nutr. 71:61, 1960). These threshold observations are consistent with the data presented by Dr. Carew but are not consistent with Dr. Carew's interpretation. The importance of this observation is that as most Americans age and show ever-increasing maximum response levels to diets high in cholesterol, atherosclerosis becomes an inevitable consequence. Autopsy studies in Americans clearly demonstrate that coronary atheroscherosis is virtually omnipresent in our adult population (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 47).

Cholesterol

Numerous detailed studies in humans have indicated that dietary cholesterol in amounts ranging from 200 to 1000 mg/day will produce a 15% to 30% elevation in blood cholesterol only when the base-line diets have been low in cholesterol (summarized by Connors, Amer. J. Cli. Nutr.) One study showed that blood cholesterol levels in subjects ingesting a diet containing an amount of cholesterol equivalent to two to three eggs a day increased approximately 25% over levels measured on a cholesterol-free diet. (Mattson F.H. Amer. J. Clin. Nutr. 25:589, 1972). This elevation will in many cases match average American adult levels and will conclusively increase the risk of developing atherosclerotic heart disease.

Animal Experiments

To conclude the analysis of the data, it is useful to examine experiments performed on animals. In dozens of species, high cholesterol diets, in combination with saturated fat or alone, have produced atherosclerosis. An important study was conducted with rhesus monkeys, a close biological relative to humans.

A high saturated fat, high cholesterol diet which approximated the average American diet was fed for 17 months to thirty monkeys. Ten were sacrificed and extensive atherosclerosis was observed. The other twenty were split into two groups: one ate a low fat, low cholesterol diet; the other ate a high fat, low cholesterol diet. After 40 months, all animals were sacrificed. The researchers found a tremendous reversal of the atherosclerotic lesions as compared to the original ten animals for both groups. The low fat, low cholesterol group had the greatest regression with a blood flow increased by 400%. But what concerns us here is that even the high fat, low cholesterol diet caused regression to occur although only 65% of the total regression encountered in the low fat, low cholesterol animals (Armstrong M.L. Circ. Res. 27:59, 1970 and 30:675, 1972).

Thus dietary cholesterol contributed to the development of atherosclerosis and its removal from the diet caused the plaques (cholesterol buildup on artery walls) of atherosclerosis to regress. Recent studies have also shown that atherosclerotic lesions were substantially reversed in human patients by adopting a diet low in saturated fat and cholesterol (Barndt R. Ann. Int. Med. 86:139, 1977) (Wissler R.W. Ann. N.Y. Acad. Sci. 275: 363, 1976).

All of the above is powerful evidence linking dietary components to atherosclerosis. The consumption of eggs is one important factor in the genesis of high blood cholesterol. There is, however, a select minority of people on a global scale that have an especially efficient internal feedback mechanism capable of keeping blood cholesterol low even in the presence of a high dietary input of cholesterol. The Masai tribe in Africa, for example, have a diet high in saturated fat and cholesterol yet their serum cholesterol levels remain low. The catch-22, however, is that atherosclerosis is still quite extensive. Thus, it appears that the composition of the diet is the primary consideration in spite of serum cholesterol levels. Data from animal experiments support these facts (Stamler J. Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 58).

"Close inspection of Dr. Carew's paper shows that he is quoting studies which have an inherent defect in their approach."

Dr. Carew suggests that it would be better to test the response of a particular patient before assuming that serum cholesterol will increase when whole eggs are included in the diet. This is a worthy consideration, however, it is irrelevant and unrealistic. No matter what the serum cholesterol levels are, atherosclerosis seems unavoidable when a diet high in saturated fat and/or cholesterol is consumed. Besides, an effective screening program designed to reach all individuals cannot at this time be successfully implemented. The cost factor is too great.

A more favorable cost-efficient approach would be mass prevention, the ultimate objective being the formulation of a diet that would not result in elevated serum cholesterol levels for the majority of the population. This approach could be implemented at all levels only if Federal and State governments adopted a national nutritional policy that would have as its top priority nutritional health instead of the present-day model tainted with corporate interests.

From a base-line diet low in cholesterol, eggs have been shown to cause highly significant increases in serum cholesterol levels. This is scientific fact. The levels arrived at in collaboration with saturated fat encompass the American average — a pathogenic average. In fact, no culture in the world has a high rate of coronary heart disease without a diet rich in saturated fat and cholesterol (and the high blood cholesterol levels such a diet usually produces). Eggs, when part of a diet already containing large quantities of red meat, and whole fat milk products could only compound the danger. This risk is also increased when hypertension, diabetes, overweight, cigarette smoking, and a positive family history for the disease are present. But it is well to note that diet is the key factor among the multiple factors involved in the etiology and pathogenesis of atherosclerotic disease. Without the nutritional prerequisites for atherosclerotic disease (i.e. high saturated fat — high cholesterol diet), hypertension and cigarette smoking ceases to be coronary heart disease risk factors. Thus, they are secondary to dietary considerations (Stamler Preventive Cardiology, 1967, p. 126 and 140).

Perhaps this rebuttal will have shed additional light on the controversy.

Kunstler Interview:

people (whether you're talking about terrorists or Jews), a hated people, from damaging the state and all the individuals who live within it.

Cynic: So the price of freedom is eternal vigilance, no matter who you are, where you come from, or what your political views are?

Kunstler: It's more than that, the price of freedom is not only eternal vigilance, but it's eternal fear. Because to live in even a relatively free society, you must understand that it, by itself, creates dangers. Because if people can speak and write and associate freely, then it is possible for crime to develop.

You could eliminate all crime in the U.S., I would imagine, by quadrupling all the police forces, ending all restrictions on the police: electronic interception, spike mikes, and all the other methods they have for listening at people's doors. Put a policeman on every floor of every apartment building in the country, and in every backyard, and you could virtually eliminate crime. But what a price you'd have to pay for it. You'd have to totally give up your privacy. You could have a television screen in every room, which transmits everything you do to a central agency. You could practically eliminate crime, though I'm not sure that isn't a hell-of-a-lot worse than having the dangerous type of freedom that is possible.

Cynic: Getting back to the Berster case, what are the ramifications of the trial internationally, specifically in terms of U.S. policy concerning other repressive regimes?

Kunstler: Well, if we can get the type of hearing we want, we can introduce evidence of what they've done in West Germany to people who are labelled terrorists. I think that would have international repercussions because it would mean every such person seeking sanctuary in the U.S. could raise the same defense. It all depends on whether the judge permits us to base the defense on the multi-lateral treaty which states that people classified as refugees can break the immigration laws of a country.

Cynic: President Carter has come out very strongly on the issue of human rights, accusing the Soviet Union and others of political repression. Do you see this trial as an indicator that he is not willing to make the same commitment at home that he is willing to make abroad?

Kunstler: Well, he's very selective... but of course it's a fraud. He's picked the Soviet Union, and I think the very evening that we're doing this interview, he also cut off all aid to Uganda on the same grounds until they can demonstrate their solidarity with the concept of human rights. But Carter makes no mention of the Willmington Ten, and the Charlotte Three in this country, and so many others in countries which are friendly to the U.S., including West Germany.

The concept of human rights is just a political football in the U.S. It has nothing to do with morality, or with any other concept he may try to claim he's utilizing.

Cynic: I wondered if you would be willing to draw any parallels between Solzhenitsyn, a Soviet political refugee living in Cabot, Vt. and Kristina?

Kunstler: I regard Solzhenitsyn with a great deal of scorn, because I really believe that socialist countries are a grand experiment in trying to eliminate the evils of capitalism. He's spending all his time criticizing a socialist country. While he may have some just grievances, for all I know, I happen to believe that he is a traitor to his country.

Cynic: What sort of impact do you envision an innocent or guilty verdict as having on the popular mind? Would a guilty verdict, for instance, confirm fears of terrorism?

Kunstler: It might. All that people know about Kristina outside of people in Vermont who read about her every day is that she's regarded as a terrorist. I talk to people and say, "I'm representing Kristina Berster," and they say "Oh, who's she?" I explain that she's the young woman who is alleged to have crossed over the... "Oh yes, you mean the terrorist."

And I think that the (media) bombarding was not confined to Vermont by a long shot. The New York Post had headlines two-inches high, saying "terrorist caught." So I think if she is convicted people are going to say, well the terrorist got what she deserved. However, if she's acquitted, it might have served to explain to people something that they should learn: that they cannot take at face value everything they read or hear.

Cynic: Have you formed any opinions yet on Judge Coffrin's handling of the case?

Kunstler: He's mild, and I think most of the time he seems quite together. He seems to be able to control his courtroom. I guess as a human being he is probably a likeable man, easy going... But I think when push comes to shove, he understands that he is supporting the system, and that he will rule accordingly. I find that most judges will rule against the law, unless they just cannot afford to for one reason or another. They will rule against the law in any of these discretionary rulings, against what they ordinarily would do, if they feel that the powers that be want it that way. Everybody in America seems to know his or her place, and what to do to advance, or even to stay in good grace. And I think he will want to advance or stay in good grace. He will heed the whispered, even the silent, voice of the dominant population. He will understand what they expect of him, and I think he will do it. It's a very rare person that will not.

Cynic: If he rules in your favor, do you think there is a possibility of negative repercussions for him?

Kunstler: Certainly, I think if you took a poll in Vermont you would find that most people are against Kristina, just because they've been so permeated by the press. I think that if Judge Coffrin does not do what the dominant majority of the people want, then he will have some personal problems.

Cynic: This week the A.P. saw fit to call it news that 'Kristina's lawyers deny that she is a terrorist.' It's been three months now since anyone has called her a terrorist, since the German government denied it. Is the trial by press over?

Kunstler: It's hard to tell. I don't think we'll begin to answer that question until the jury comes in. Even then we won't be able to answer it. It's hard to tell how deep these opinions go, and how people are permeated by what they read in the newspapers or hear in the electronic media. It's insidious. It's so pervasive that people don't even know... they don't even know that they buy a certain toothpaste because they've heard it so many times, even though rationally they know that toothpaste will not alter their sex lives for the better, or whiten their teeth overnight. But somehow they want to believe things, and it's pushed on them to such a degree that they do believe them. So I don't think we'll ever really be able to tell.

Point

Over three hundred of Forbes' top five hundred corporations have interests in South Africa. This group has a substantial voice in the internal racial policies of South Africa for the future. If they were to divest, the progress they have made would be lost, as well as to create a situation which would inevitably lead to civil war. An end to apartheid is going to happen gradually through internal efforts, any physical battle to quickly change the racial set-up would be disastrous.

Counterpoint

business boycott could wreak similar havoc on the government of South Africa, thus aiding in the abolition of apartheid.

Even if corporations remained in South Africa and actively campaigned for wider social reforms, it is unlikely that the present government would listen. When asked in October 1976 whether blacks would ever exercise political power in South Africa, Prime Minister Vorster replied, "I cannot foresee such a day at all." Vorster's successor Pik Botha follows a similarly hard line, making future social changes unlikely. Perhaps this is the reason why Rev. Sullivan himself has conceded that U.S. corporations probably ought to withdraw from South Africa.

This leaves the University of Vermont, a piddling $2.6 million invested in corporations with South African holding, faced with tough choices. Should we hold on to our stock and vote that the companies withdraw from South Africa? Previous shareholder efforts to this effect have failed, in part because the profit motive has obscured moral considerations, at least in the minds of major stockholders. (There is no argument that South African investments are quite profitable. The only question is, at what human costs are these profits made?) Because the university has a moral obligation to uphold basic standards of human rights, at whatever level its influence can affect, divestiture is the only logical option. No other alternative is reasonable, honest or effective.

Money And Morality

Next Wednesday night the Student Association is sponsoring a workshop to inform students of UVM's investments in South Africa and the moral and ethical issues they raise. We strongly urge students to attend this meeting, to become aware of the issues, and offer insights to guide the S.A. in taking a stand. For our part, as a prelude to the workshop, this week's Commentary page (13) is featuring a point-counterpoint debate offering views pro and con divestiture.

In our view, it is critical that no more time be wasted in organizing student support for divestiture. UVM has over $2.5 million invested in companies with South African holdings which help perpetuate apartheid – or separate economic development – and its inherent suppression of the black majority. And, while there are numerous arguments for both sides, many, we feel, are confusing and need clarification. Since it can hardly be denied that South African economic livelihood is directly dependent on foreign investment (17% of which originates in the U.S.), it must follow that these external investors either support apartheid as acceptable social policy or find their relationship with it insignificant and not cause for concern. We find little difference between the two.

Unacceptable is the argument stating that since UVM's investments constitute such a small percent of the South African GNP, that divestiture could hardly make any difference in instituting political change. Such logic is flawed and tantamount to an individual who justifies not voting on the grounds that his ballot is only one in millions. Viewed from this limited perspective, indeed it would be difficult to identify the actual positive effects of UVM's withdrawal. But surely it is true that any political or cultural consensus which calls for and achieves action would be meaningless if broken into its constituent parts. It is cohesive action which is important here; and such would be impossible if people failed to believe that their individual recognition would be lost in the process. Such views are dangerous, and in their extreme would fundamentally undermine democracy.

The issue with regard to South African investments is clearly one of moral conscience versus economic pragmatism. Are the age-old values of equality of men and representative government more important than returns on investments supporting a system which violates those beliefs? Unquestionably, yes.

In light of this, student trustee Butch Crandall's statement at last week's Trustee meeting saying that even if the trustees might disagree with apartheid, their "fiduciary responsibility" to the university is greater, assumes a wider significance. Such a selfish and amoral point of view is, we believe, unconscionable. Clearly, the trustees must try to invest university funds in the most lucrative possible ways, but not when investments mandate sacrificing ideals which are – or at least should be – intrinsic to any American institution of higher learning. Furthermore, evidence indicates that UVM could maintain a similar return on investment in companies with no South African holdings. (Details forthcoming in future Cynic issues.)

Another commonly promulgated argument against divestiture is that American corporations can do more to help initiate change by staying in South Africa with enlightened employment policies. Such a policy would result in only a gradual restitution of political and economic opportunity in South Africa. A didactic analogy might be drawn here from looking at the Emancipation of our own slaves in 1865. The ensuing gradualism has resulted in our own society still suffering from the hatreds of prejudice over 100 years later. Clearly, the blacks in South Africa have waited long enough.

Agriculture: The Need for Objectivity

To the Editor:

I am writing to comment on the article in the October 5 Cynic entitled "Is Bigger Better," that reported on the efforts of the group calling themselves SPADE (Students for Progressive Agricultural Development). I commend the group for their interest in some of the important policy issues relating to agricultural structure in the U.S. and in Vermont. However, in the interests of objectivity I would like to correct some of the statistics reported in the article.

It was reported that "in 1945 there were 30,000 farms in Vermont, now there are just 3,000." If we go to the 1974 Census of Agriculture, we find that in 1945 there were 26,490 farms; in 1974 there were 5,906. This is a 78 percent decrease, significant enough, but not the 90 percent decrease reported in the article.

Furthermore, in the article it was stated that "in the United States, farms continue to disappear at the rate of 2,000 per week." This is a gross exaggeration. USDA statistics show 3.25 million "farms" in 1966 and 2.78 million in 1976, a decrease of 474,000 over a 10-year period. This figures out to be a decrease of just over 900 farms per week over the period. If we look at "farms" with gross sales of $10,000 or more per year, there actually was an increase of 47,000 farms between 1966 and 1976.

I suspect the person quoting the statistics was referring to people on farms, rather than farm units. In this period the number of people on farms declined by 3.3 million or something over 300,000 people per year.

The issues are important, but we cannot discuss them intelligently without a certain amount of objectivity. As an example, the title to the article "Is Bigger Better?" causes me some problems. "Better" is a highly subjective term, and I would ask, better (or worse) in what respect?

As a faculty member in the College of Agriculture, I look forward to a productive dialogue with the promoters of SPADE, but one that is based on an objective analysis of the issues.

Sincerely,
Robert O. Sinclair
Professor and Chairman
Dept. Agriculture

Keeping Tuition Down

To the Editor:

We strongly support the Cynic editorial of October 12 concerning UVM tuition rates. The editorial calls for Vermont legislators to demonstrate their commitment to holding down tuition for Vermont students at the University of Vermont. By voting for a $2.18 million increase in the state appropriation to UVM, legislators can prevent another rise in in-state tuition.

For the first time in recent memory, the board of trustees, the administration, the faculty leadership and the student leadership have joined together in support of a fair and equitable budget. According to the proposed budget, tuition for out-of-state students will increase by 10 percent to track inflation. Without the $2.18 million increase in the state appropriation, in-state tuition will increase by 10 percent also.

Vermont students are already paying some of the highest prices in the nation for their state university. We do not want Vermont students to be priced out of the University of Vermont. We do want the quality of our education to be maintained. It is only through adequate state support that these objectives can be accomplished.

What is the "Real World?"

To the Editor:

In reading MGT's letter last week, I was amazed. I too am Jewish, have been at UVM for three years, and am not uncomfortable here.

MGT, you stated that out of a student body of 7400, there are 7270 so called WASPs. I kindly ask you to cut that number down to 6670. UVM is approximately 9% Jewish (check the Dean of Students' office).

You criticized Mr. Heyward (not Howard) for saying UVM prepares you for the "real world." You might be right, but I ask you what is the "real world?" Is your idea of a "natural mixture" a "wealthy suburban town composed of blacks, white Jews, Catholics, and Protestants?" Mr. Heyward stated in his article that the "real world" for him or many other minority students is a community which is composed mostly of minorities. I ask him, is that the "real world?" I come from Portland, Maine – an area twice the size of Burlington. The "real world" for me has been a small but well-established Jewish population, with the rest of the community being made up of white Catholics and Protestants. There are almost no blacks or other minorities. I ask you is that the "real world?" When you find the "real world" MGT, please let the rest of us at UVM know.

I feel sorry for you if you are not happy at UVM because of peoples' reactions to you being a Jew. I too have put up with people at UVM (and many other places) asking me questions ranging from "Do you have to eat bagels every day?" to "When is your Christmas?" You are right; people are ignorant. A majority of them, like me, have not lived in a community where a sizeable portion of the school was missing when the Jewish High Holidays came around. Many of them have never really met a Jew before coming to UVM.

If you feel so uncomfortable

Higher Education

By Scott Sartorius

Higher education in America is in trouble – and UVM's ongoing financial troubles are a reflection of the crunch U.S. colleges and universities are having to bear. Operating expenses for many institutions are rising at a rate higher than the Consumer Price Index (CPI), forcing increased tuitions as well as cutbacks in programs and personnel as attempts to offset year-end budget deficits.

What's worse than the current problems being faced by these institutions are the potential future ones. Experts have predicted that between 1979 and 1992, the number of 18-year-olds in the United States will drop from 4.3 to 3.2 million. Since most college freshman classes are made up of 18-year-olds, this decline represents a first-year class size that is 26 percent smaller. Some even predict that by the year 2000, the 18-year-old population will have shrunk by as much as one-third.

Peak enrollment for U.S. colleges and universities is estimated to be 7 million – a figure which will be achieved in 1980. But over the course of the next century, one less-than-optimistic researcher predicts that 500 of the nation's 1,500 colleges and universities will be forced to shut their doors due to financial insolvency.

Even with enrollments booming as they are now, institutions such as UVM are having to retrench. At the University of Missouri, operating costs over the past five years have risen 94 percent – with the CPI rising only 47 percent over the same five years. To help fight this increase, Missouri is not renewing the contracts of 17 non-tenured faculty members.

At the University of Pittsburgh, which, like UVM, is accustomed to receiving state money, tuition is rising steadily because of no increased support from the Pennsylvania legislature over the past three years.

The University of Michigan is currently in a hiring freeze.

This retrenchment by institutions trying to cut costs has created worries over the quality of higher education. With cutbacks being made in courses, faculties, staff members, and janitorial services, concern has been raised over whether or not the student will be getting what he is paying for.

In addition, schools are closing down old buildings that are too inefficient to heat and are following less conventional avenues to try to raise more money. George Washington University in the heart of downtown Washington D.C. constructed some high-rise buildings on its valued turf and has leased them out to business enterprises. Kent State University has launched a $50,000 ad campaign, which includes television spots, to try and recruit new students – and tuition dollars. Some institutions have aimed at the over-25 population to fill their gap encouraging them to enroll in night courses. In 1972, the over-25 population was about, 2.5 million students and last year, it was 4.1 million.

The recruitment of women as potential students has also begun to play a larger role in filling college ranks as evidenced by the fact that over the past five years, women accounted for 63 percent of total enrollment growth.

The University of Vermont is not in a high growth region of the country, and is likely to feel the crunch – already being felt now – as severely as any similar-sized institution in the region, if not worse.

If UVM keeps asking the state legislature for more money every year, as has been the case in recent history, it's going to be like getting blood from a rock after a while. With the likes of such thinking as has been displayed with the tax-cutting initiatives of California's Proposition 13, sooner or later additional state dollars won't be available.

If continued tuition increases are used to offset deficits, the cost to attend these hallowed halls won't make it worthwhile. UVM is as expensive as the most selective institutions in the country for an out-of-state student, and the UVM administration uses in-state tuition as a kind of blackmail to hang over the state legislators – a tactic which will lose its potency eventually.

In a way, it seems that UVM is keen to ask the state for as much money as it needs, but it would be a grave mistake to rely solely on an increased state appropriation in the long run to continue to bridge its fiscal gap.

UVM has to face reality. In the next twenty years, unless its present popularity among high school and prep school seniors doesn't wane, enrollment will decline. Thus, there will be a need for a reduced curriculum and fewer personnel. UVM has to determine now where such cutbacks can be made and it has to put the gears in motion.

With tuition too high for both the in-stater and the out-of-stater, and with a continually increased state appropriation a dim hope, something has to be done. The most likely alternative is to make cutbacks.

The latter is not an easy process and it is certainly not done overnight. These cutbacks will eventually – and inevitably – have to be fairly sizeable. The belief here is that the UVM administration knows all this, but it would be foolish for them to delude themselves – or the students – into thinking that some cutbacks aren't going to have to be made soon. After all, the year 2000 is only 22 years away.

Swords Into Plowshares:

The Need for Arms Reduction

By Eric Kilburn

"The belief that it is possible to achieve security through armaments is, in the present state of military technology, a disastrous illusion."

Albert Einstein said that twenty years ago, and military technology has advanced considerably since then. Yet, for many of us raised on the cold war rhetoric of "preemptive strike capabilities" and "multiple independently-targeted reentry vehicles" (MIRV), the concept of arms-reduction is about as appealing as the Russian flu. In recent years, however, church groups and other organizations have campaigned against large military expenditures, using the argument that monies earmarked for defense reduce the funds spent on human services. Particularly since October 23-27 has been designated World Disarmament Week by the United Nations, an examination of the arms race and its global implications seems in order.

"The care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction, is the first and only legitimate object of good government," said Thomas Jefferson, one of America's first pacifist-radical types. Our country's founders would undoubtedly be somersaulting in their graves if they knew of the current global arms situation, and with good reason. World military spending will top $400 billion in 1978, which calculates to just under $1 million per minute. In the United States, 45% of our tax dollars go to past, present and future wars. (Stuff that up your nose, Howard Jarvis.) Since World War II, the U.S. has spent an incomprehensible two trillion dollars on "defense." Clearly, something has gone wrong.

Much of the past and present escalation in military spending stems from tensions between the U.S. and Soviet Union. Never an extremely sensible phenomenon, the arms race – particularly the development and production of nuclear weapons – has progressed to absurd proportions. The Center for Defense Analysis reports that, "Our (the U.S.) nuclear stock pile, which can be launched from submarines, bombers, and land-based missiles, is equivalent to 615,000 Hiroshima bombs; with 9,000 strategic long-range weapons in mid-1978, the U.S. could destroy every U.S.S.R. city of over 100,000 more than 35 times. The U.S.S.R. with 4,500 strategic weapons could destroy each U.S. city of that size more than 28 times..."

Apparently U.S. and Soviet defense analysts missed the transparent assertion that it makes no difference if you're killed once or overkilled twenty-five times; you're still just as dead, because we continue to build nuclear bombs at the rate of three per day.

The logic for continuing the present rate of arms production and military expenditures generally takes the form of the "balance of power" theory. In other words, if the U.S. and Soviets build enormously powerful and ultrasophisticated weaponry, we insure that these will never be used, because we'd all be wiped out in the process. Naturally, the argument follows, if America reduced its stockpile of nuclear weapons and cut the defense budget (now at $117 billion for 1979) the Russians won't hesitate to rain H-bombs over every square of apple pie and motherhood in the U.S. (Obviously, we've got to be strong so we can kill them first.) Unfortunately, even if one assumes that a nuclear war can be won, such analysis fails to consider the realities of the arms race and the alternatives to high military spending.

The first problem is that the arms race is a self-perpetuating treadmill. Historically, every time the U.S. has developed a new and more sophisticated instrument of death, the Soviets have come up with one of their own, and vice versa. The cycle costs tax payers billions of dollars annually, and shows no signs of reversing. Excellent future examples of this can be found in the development of the cruise missile and M-X missile, which unfortunately space does not allow ample discussion of.

The second issue is one of more emotional, hypothetical contrasts. On a planet where 700 million people are illiterate, it is incredible that the world spends an average of $15,000 in military funds for every soldier, and only $249 for the education of each school-age child. With over 500 million chronically malnourished people, one must wonder why the worldwide budget for United Nations' programs in food, health, education, labor, etc. is outspent every two days by the global military budget.

In contrast to military outlays, human service expenditures are a veritable bargain. According to the Rockefeller foundation, the cost of one Trident submarine (a recent addition to the U.S. arsenal) equals the cost of a year's schooling to 16,000,000 children in developing countries. A vaccination program to give protection against infectious diseases to all infants is a mere $600 million. If these calculations make little sense in contemporary American culture, consider the following equivalency: how many cases of beer would $400 billion supply to every man, woman and child on earth?

Ultimately, weapons systems that aren't used are wasteful, weapons systems that are used are insane. The need for citizens to grasp this inherent contradiction in military spending becomes increasingly crucial if the world is to alter its impending date with Armageddon. In the short space of an article it is impossible to fully discuss the ramifications and social cost of military spending. Thus, the responsibility of education falls upon the reader (that's YOU, folks). The price of understanding the issue is a few hours; the cost of ignorance is potentially apocalyptic.

Giving The C. Y. O. A Chance

at UVM (you must – you did not even sign your name), I ask you if you have taken the opportunity to seek out other Jews here. There are many Jews on the faculty and in the student body. There are a few courses that deal with Judaic issues. There is an active Hillel on campus, and if you want something more, there are three synagogues in the area.

Lastly, you are right not all Jewish girls are JAPs (nor are all Vermonters – hicks, Rugby players jocks, computer science majors nurds, etc.) I have never heard the one about Bloomingdale's and if you want to hold a WDW Chanckah party, I would like to come.

Sincerely,
Kenneth Wilner

To the Editor:

I mentioned my plans to some friends, "I'm going to check out the CYO meeting." They eyed me, "What" they said, "The Communist Youth Organization. You're a communist? Now what about Russia, Viet Nam...?" Well, I'm not a commie. But I knew that last year the CYO held a forum on the Bakke issue and fought against the university's and Saga's refusal to pay minimum wage. The CYO seemed active, and I was curious.

So, I attended their Thursday evening meeting. The first part encompassed future plans, while the second part developed into a discussion of communism. The group discussed various political crises and events including the liberation struggle in Africa, the Mideast, China, U.S. foreign policy (notably imperialism) and Russian foreign policy (notably imperialism). I must admit, the discussion was more intellectually stimulating than some of my classes.

If you're interested in political debate, here's a challenge. If you think that communist ideology (is) narrow, why not give the CYO a hard time. Play the devil's advocate.

In any case, they're a friendly group and they invite all to come to their meetings. The CYO has weekly meetings Thursdays at 7 p.m. in conference room C, second floor Billings. There's even an incentive to give the group a try. They serve "FREIHOFER'S."

Sincerely,
Lewis-Heyman

No More Sci-Fi

To the Editor:

This letter is to officially inform you of my decision to resign as SF reviewer for the Cynic. This is not a decision which I make lightly but one which I am forced to make.

I do not feel that I can continue my column under the policy changes which you are planning. As you know, those changes will, as well as other things, result in my column appearing only once every third week. This policy change will, in my opinion, result in format changes to my column which will be a detriment to the column.

I would like to express my thanks to my readers who have supported me over the last year and a half, as well as a special thanks to those readers who have written or talked to me about the column. (Including "Nova K. Atkins" if he is still around.)

I have always maintained that I was writing the column to turn you people on to good SF books that you should read. If there were any way for me to continue the column I would. I do not, however, feel I can do justice to the genre of SF nor my readers under the plan which you propose.

I will still be around and willing to talk SF with anyone who is interested. Write or call me if you have any questions about current or forthcoming books.

Biased For BoSox

To the Editor:

Again, the need to comment on the Cynic's poor choice of sports reporters is evident. America's greatest sports event, the World Series, is in full swing this year. Why then is there no mention of the Series or the playoffs? Rob Smith's comment: "If you're a sports fan who is sick of baseball in October," is a typical paradox used by these biased reporters. How can one be a true "sports fan" and not be interested in the World Series?

In the section marked National Sports Briefs (page 46), five mini-articles appear. Three articles deal with Boston teams (one is even historical, not dealing with current sports!) with only two dealing with other events. It seems to be Regional Sports Briefs, rather than National Sports, as the misnomer reads.

The infamous Vermont Cynic quotation on page one is hard to digest: "Nice show Reggie – STRIKE THREE!" Not only has Reggie Jackson been the mainstay of the Yankees in October, in terms of hitting, but he is acknowledged to be baseball's finest hitter in post-season play!

A more fitting quotation would be "Nice show Yaz – POP IT UP!!!" It's good to see Carl say that he'll play two more years, because his family does need the money! But do the Red Sox need an old, has-been in their field, with a Yankee dynasty in the making. Perhaps Yaz could take lessons in "senior citizen" hitting from Roy White, a true clutch hitter!

God knows (along with the student body) that if Boston had lucked out and beaten New York in that final game, we would be bombarded with pictures and articles in the Cynic until the sports section engulfed the entire paper.

Let's have a more balanced approach in the Cynic! I hesitate to use the word "please," only because in the past it hasn't worked! If you intend to be a paper of the University of Vermont, and not an affiliate of the Boston Globe, direct your format to reporting, not opinionating!

The more I read your paper, the more I realize that the only section devoted to non-BoSox reporting is in the "Letters to the Editor!" When the Yankees win the World Series this year, I hope to read about it in the Sports Section, not one week after it happens, in the "Letters" area!

Sincerely yours,
Jeff Beckerman

P.S. Ron Guidry deserves the MVP award (and will receive it)!

Go Redskins

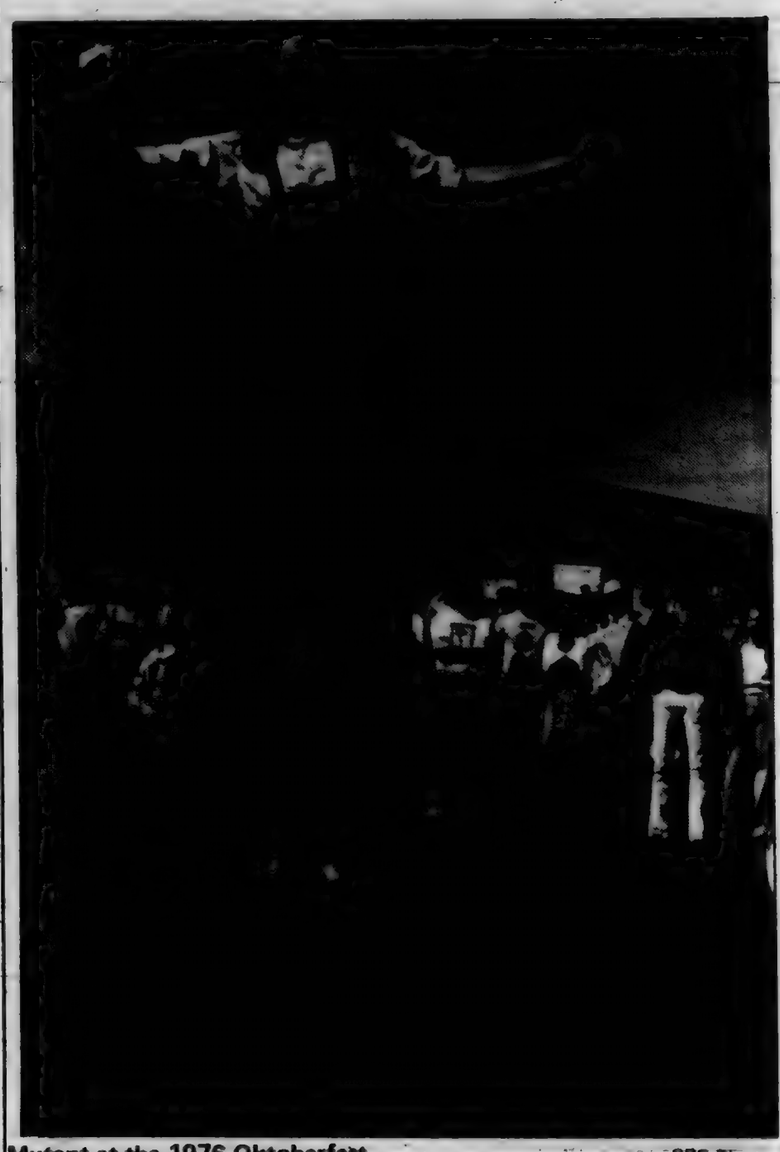
To the Editor:

I would like to thank both you and Rich Chalmers for the article on the Washington Redskins–Dallas Cowboys Monday night game ("Redskins Stifle Cowboy Offense," Oct. 5), and for previous "Sports Briefs" mentioning the Redskins' undefeated record so far this season.

Having lived in the Washington area(Bethesda, MD) all my life, I have been an avid Redskins fan ever since I can remember. It's a fever one catches if one spends any amount of time in and around Washington, DC.

A lot of people fail or refuse to recognize the talents and abilities of the individual Redskins players or the team as a whole. To many, it was simply a prejudice against the former head coach, George Allen, but now, with Jack Pardee in charge, maybe some people will start to give the Redskins the recognition they deserve. Anyone who saw the Redskins–Cowboys game would have to admit that it was not just luck that won them the game. Their performance was superb.

Chalmers mentioned in the last paragraph of his article that the team that played Dallas on Monday was a new Washington ball club. I tend to disagree – it's not a new Washington team, but the same old, if somewhat rejuvenated, Redskins team we've always known and cheered for.



Hail to the Redskins.

Sincerely,
Carol A. Specht

P.S. Dave G. – Eat your heart out.

Oktoberfest? No, Unsoberfest

By Vaughan von Davis

"It's going to be a very festive atmosphere, in a small way – a very small way – like something out of a Fellini movie," said Rick Searer, Redstone Campus area coordinator. "Of course," he added, beaming with nervous anticipation, "the later it gets and the more people drink, the more it's going to be that way."

But with an expected 7,000 to 7,500 students, parents, faculty and alumni swarming onto the Coolidge-Redstone Hall green this Saturday, united by a common cause – rampant feasting, drunkedness, and innumerable other varieties of debauch merrymaking – UVM's Seventh Annual Oktoberfest probably won't even be that refined.

IGNORE THIS PARAGRAPH

But why Oktoberfest? Why not Novemberfest, or possibly even an Aprilfest? In-depth historical studies have revealed that Oktoberfest originated not in the Lowenbrau publicity department, but in the fall of 1810 when the Crown Prince of Bavaria married Princess Saxe-Hildburghausen. A soldier organized horse races, rifle competitions, and other festivities in their honor which were so well-received that they were repeated every year. This however has nothing to do with the reason UVM celebrates Oktoberfest (there isn't even a visible German ethnic group here) and details like this are really nothing but the basest of space fillers.

THE REAL REASON

Actually, UVM's present day Oktoberfest originated back in 1972 when Dean of Students Keith Miser, then director of residence halls, and the students and staff of Redstone Campus met to plot a massive keg party. Under the guise of "Oktoberfest" they had a quaint, age-old tradition to celebrate by; and the fact that it was really just another drunken affair, so typical of Redstone both then and now, was discreetly covered up.

The death of the football program revolutionized Oktoberfest. Combined with both Homecoming and Parents' Weekend, Oktoberfest soon swelled from a mere beer blast to a bona fide "Campus Event." Craftsmen, folk dancers, German food, musicians, and contests were gradually added to the itinerary, not to mention hordes of dazed parents and alumni.

1976 was a peak year for Oktoberfest as an estimated 10,000 attended, according to Miser. While some say the success was due to the beautiful fall weather, others claim that people came because Vice-Presidential candidate Robert Dole was there, surrounded by vicious S.S. men and shaking hands. Last year, however, it rained and the festival had to be moved from the Redstone Green to Gutterson fieldhouse. Not as successful, only 7,000 people came, the beer ran out early, and the frenzied atmosphere was suspiciously like that of fall registration.

BACK TO THE ROOTS

Nevertheless, despite the hype, the roots of UVM's Oktoberfest are still a major focus of the event. Forty kegs of Busch beer – four more than last year – will be tapped throughout the day in a 265 seat beer tent, complete with a genuine German "Oompah" band. Rick Searer said that he doesn't think the beer will run out much before five, adding that "by the time it does run out, it will probably be just as well." Regarding the choice of brands, Searer said that, at twenty-one dollars a keg, the Busch is a tremendous bargain. "I have the feeling that, except for the few connossieurs out there, it doesn't make any difference."

Most of the 90 concert security guards will be faithfully fortifying the beer tent, Searer said, preventing little brothers and sisters from copping beers. In the past, people were able to sit down and have pitchers of beer served to them, but because

Van Morrison Back On the Road Again

By Pablo Conrad

It took nearly the whole night for Van Morrison and an unusually hesitant UVM audience to finally loosen up. But when the stiffness finally departed, Saturday night turned out to be a stellar performance. Perhaps it was the presence of a doubled security force, unnecessary for the "more mellow crowd" that S.A. Concerts had predicted, but the usual sweaty hospitality of Patrick Gym was missing throughout most of the sellout Saturday night show.

The evening opened with a deafening forty-five minute set by Dave Edmunds' Rock Pile. Moving quickly through one pounding rocker after another, the four-piece British band met with little enthusiasm in its double barreled attempt to bring New Wave to UVM and new life to Patrick Gym.

Dave Edmunds' sound was an intentional mix of the energy of early Jerry Lee Lewis and Chuck Berry with the rude, unrefined sound of a high school rock band practicing in a metal garage. Onstage, bass player Nick Lowe (who produces Elvis Costello) enjoyed himself the most, grinning at the audience while he laid down an unrelenting thunder on songs like "I Knew The Bride (When She Used to Rock and Roll)," and "I Love the Sound of Breaking Glass."

It appeared the crowd at Patrick Gym didn't love the sound of breaking glass or of anything else that had much to do with Rock Pile's punk message. To the band's disappointment, people remained seated throughout most of their set and only showed signs of excitement at the once familiar Chuck Berry hit, "Jet to the Promised Land." Rock Pile continued unencouraged and undaunted, Nick Lowe commenting, "It's a little like a morgue out there," and tousling his hair with both hands, under the lurid green and red stage lights.

As part of the vanguard of New Wave, Dave Edmunds and Nick Lowe avoid the synthesized theatrical pretensions of other U.K. rock groups like Queen and Mott the Hoople, preferring to sound as raw and unaffected as possible. The product is too simple and rough to sustain much interest in LP form, but at Patrick Gym, Rock Pile badly wanted to make an impression, to stir up some kind of response. The audience that came to hear Van Morrison, though, remained unimpressed.

It was a relief then, when the lights dimmed after a twenty minute intermission and acoustic guitar chords eased into the cool swing of Moondance. Walking out to a standing ovation, Van Morrison seemed indifferent and almost stiff. Poker-faced as always, he stood at the microphone and sang "Moondance" gently, snapping his fingers and just barely swaying with the beat. He appeared relaxed and confident while singing, holding a lit cigarette ready for a casual drag, glancing back at his band and out at the audience as though trying to gauge what kind of a night it would be.

Backed by the band with which he recorded his newest LP Wavelength, Van Morrison played much of that unfamiliar material, featuring the additional strength of two young women backing him on vocals. On the ballad "Crazy Love," he left the stage and had one of them come up front to sing a beautiful solo. The gospel back-up that graces most of Van's albums radiated.

The support of Peter Bardens on keyboards and Bobby Tench and Herbie Armstrong on electric and acoustic guitars was good, but lacked the shiny punch of the horn sections that Van Morrison usually works with. Bobby Tench, known for his work with Jeff Beck before joining Van, kept himself in check on stage, occasionally growling out a good, scratchy solo on new songs like "Lifetimes" and "Natalia."

The band was rehearsed enough to follow the most subtle signals from Morrison's direction, but the arrangements from the LP on those new songs left little room for freshness of improvisation. Luckily, this was not true of the two supporting singers, who provided the "liveness" lacking in those

Flicks

Woody Allen: He's not so funny anymore.

"Interiors" It Could Be Your Family

By Scott Sartorius

Interiors is a movie with a story-line that you'll either love or hate, but no one can argue that the film is not well-done. The actors and actresses are brilliantly cast and all seem to fit their roles almost too convincingly; the direction, filming and subtleties are the product of a film-genius. Yet the script is filled with the hundred dollar dialogue of a (very) rich, WASPy, New York-Southampton-Connecticut family of artists/intellectuals that has more problems than they do money.

What's more, because Woody Allen is behind this movie, the potential viewer might enter the theatre looking for some laughs. Interiors, however, is not funny as it contains only a brief sequence of humor, which provides comic relief from an otherwise completely serious movie.

If you enjoy Ingmar Bergman movies, you'll enjoy Interiors. There are camera shots that gaze listlessly into the ocean, around perfectly sculptured rooms, and into the eyes of an actress performing a soliloquy on the demise of a mother who wanted everything just too perfect. It is no secret that Allen has always wanted to make an "Ingmar Bergman Movie," yet it is not often that a leader of one genre jumps over to try out another. No doubt, there are few film-makers, writers or other such artists who have the capability to make such a move — and survive — but Allen has little to lose — and succeeds.

We are introduced to the family one-by-one and gradually learn the interrelationships that exist between them. We grow to know each family member from different sides, but only by their first names.

The mother, Eve (Geraldine Page), is suffering from a variety of things including a split with her husband (E. G. Marshall) which has led to a nervous breakdown and periodical visits to a "rest home." Eve's face twitches from time to time to the extent where she really does look capable of a breakdown, yet only rarely does she outwardly lose all of the dignity and poise that have marked the early stages of her marriage. Even as she attempts suicide, she is dressed in a long black dress that flows to the floor as she gracefully lays down on a couch for what she believes will be her last breaths.

Unfortunately for Eve, her husband has said that their separation will be just a trial one, and as Eve waits for a reconciliation, Dad is off in Greece lying on the beach with his new bride-to-be, Pearl (Maureen Stapleton). Father is a man who has finally begun to feel too boxed in by the structured life his wife has set up for the family, and is afraid Eve will over-react if he tells her a reconciliation is impossible.

Naturally, each of the three daughters has her own role in preventing or contributing to the eventual demise of their mother — a demise which has taken a back-seat to the artistic careers they all feel they must pursue.

Renata (Diane Keaton) is an apparently successful poet who has, of late, run into a severe case of writer's block. Added to that is her new preoccupation with death — a preoccupation that is one of Allen's favorites. Renata and her novelist husband, Frederick (Richard Jordan), live secluded in their comfortable Connecticut house. Frederick's problem centers around his feelings of inferiority to his wife — both sexually and career-wise — and he has begun to drink a little too much.

Renata has always been mother's favorite and makes a habit of encouraging her through the roughest of times, while her sister, Joey (Mary Beth Hurt), has always been Dad's favorite. Joey's problem is that she doesn't have all of the artistic talent that she was supposed to, and has resultingly been stuck with taking care of Mom. Joey is not as encouraging to Mom as Renata, though, but is the

Something Old, Something New

Ina May Wool

By Vaune Davis

Acoustic music, not beer or bongs, highlighted St. Michael's Homecoming Weekend, as Tom Rush, Jonathan Edwards, and Ina May Wool were brought together for a fine concert at the Ross Center Friday night

Playing with the relaxed self-assurance of a musician who has reached a certain level of excellence and then stopped there, Tom Rush was the only disappointment of the evening. Although almost anyone would have seemed subdued after the high-charged energy of Ina May Wool, Rush was much too businesslike and well-rehearsed for there to be any sense of spontaneity or excitement during his set.

This is not to say, however, that his music wasn't good – it was, only there were no surprises. "Who Do You Love," and "Mint Julep" were whipped off with the same steady, rhythmic guitar playing and strong, almost arrogantly confident voice that have characterized Rush's sound for years. It was as if the emotional quality in his tunes was so well practiced that he didn't have to feel it anymore. It was depressing to see such a talented musician as Tom Rush stagnate.

Rush was on the verge of losing his audience throughout the concert, particularly during his slower, deeper songs such as "A Child's Song." Whether this was because these tunes are better suited to a more attentive, coffeehouse audience or because he just wasn't putting out enough is debatable, but the fact remains, Rush was not a commanding performer.

Rush was better during his story songs, songs such as "Makin' the Best of a Bad Situation" that had everyone clapping and hollering to the quick country riffs, fast talking, and rather bizarre situations described. His saloon tales, "Duncan and Brady," for example, were enchantingly visual as he sang lines like "They buried him underneath a no parkin' sign, 'cause that's the kind of guy he was," to a laughing audience.

Although strict and businesslike with both the audience and his music, Rush was able to redeem himself to a certain extent with a little cool humor, or at least insight. Before he let his voice soar during "I Get the Urge for Going," he announced that he was going to sing about fall. A song, he said, "for when the geese are flying south, and the frost is on the pumpkin, and the students return to New England for the fall mating season."

Rush ended with what he called "a social protest song about a steam shovel strike. "I'd like to close with this one," he said with charming cynicism, "because I've been told that Winooski is a hotbed of political awareness." A rollicking tune, charged with gliding blues licks, it brought the audience to their feet for a brief and, well, certainly more than generous standing ovation.

Following Tom Rush's retreat, Jonathan Edwards opened his set with a blazing harmonica solo that, in comparison to the rest of his performance, was merely a gentle indication of the rousing country/rock that was to follow.

Edward's voice is becoming richer and clearer with age and, while his temporary escape from the music industry might have hurt him as far as public exposure is concerned, he is back with more ideas and enthusiasm than ever. Jumping back and forth from acoustic guitar to the piano, to electric guitar, Edwards played both his old and new material with equal vigor.

Throughout the concert, Edwards was experimenting with new sounds and styles while at the same time extending himself personally to the audience. Tender and romantic during his piano solo "Lady," but wild and rowdy during slick country/rock tunes such as "I'm Home," at no time was Edwards boring or repetitive.

He even played "Everything Takes Time," the title cut from his "new" album. "The album," he said, "that's so new it hasn't even been recorded yet." The title song was not impressive, but it was a tribute to Edwards that he introduced new material, rather than resting exclusively on past laurels, like Rush.

Edwards was engaging just by himself; however, with three talented sidemen providing tight vocals and a solid, dynamic rhythm, he was outstanding. They were an interesting combination. Short and squat with platform shoes and wild, curly hair, bass guitarist Steven Dubois glared visciously at the mixer from time to time, looking like he would run him over with a Harley if he slipped up again. With a white shirt and gray suitjacket, lead guitarist

DESIRE!

Photos by Rick Ames

Desire Under the Elms, a classic theatre work by one of American theatre's greatest names, Eugene O'Neill, will be presented at the Royall Tyler Theatre by the University of Vermont Department of Theatre on October 18-21, 1978.

The production will open the season for the 1978-79 academic calendar of productions. Dr. Judith Williams, newly appointed to the faculty at UVM and an O'Neill scholar in her own right, is the director of Desire Under the Elms.

Taking place on a New England farm in the 1850's, the play is about Eben (the step-son) and his desire for Ephraim's (the step-father) new wife, Abbie. Eben is played by Tom Winslow who was seen here last fall as Mack the Knife in The Threepenny Opera. Duncan Stephens, who regaled audiences last summer as Sir Aguecheek in Twelfth Night, turns to a more sombre role as Ephraim. Julie Carmen, who has been seen in many university productions since 1975, portrays the enticing Abbie Putnam. The Cabot brothers, Peter and Simeon, are played by Edward Lindsay, seen as the young lover, Diego, in State of Siege, and Ric Priem, who has appeared in a number of productions at the Royall Tyler over the past three years.

W.M. Schenk, associate professor of theatre, will continue his fine production of the scenic elements among which have been the Festival stage for the Champlain Shakespeare Festival over several seasons, and more recently, the scenery for No Mo' Jim Crow, The Importance of Being Earnest, and From Morn Till Midnight. Diana Greenwood, newly appointed to the faculty of the theatre department, is the costume designer. Robert Lovell will continue his stage managing skills from the Champlain Shakespeare Festival, assisted by John O'Brien.

Desire Under the Elms will offer an evening of intense drama. Curtain time is 8 p.m. October 18-21. For additional information, call 656-2094.

Buffalo In the Apse

By Vaune Davis

Business and ethics conflict with friendship and loyalty in David Mamet's American Buffalo, a play being put on by Second Stage Productions in the Billings Apse this week.

A two-act play set in a Chicago junkyard, American Buffalo is about the aberrant behavior of three small-time businessmen trying to establish their importance by planning and executing an amateur robbery. Adam Zahler plays Don, the junkyard owner who is scheming to rob a customer who has paid him ninety dollars for an old buffalo nickel. Bobby, played by Kent Cassella, is Don's spaced-out sidekick who is pushed out of the deal by "Teach," a two-bit hood played by Sam Pierson.

Although the situation and characters may seem ludicrous, according to Sam Pierson, American Buffalo will not be an evening of light entertainment. "There's definitely funny things in it — the characters' affectations are ridiculous," Pierson said. "But it's not a comedy. The characters are so hemmed in you have the feeling that nothing important happens in their lives."

It is because of this shallowness of the characters that one New York critic condemned American Buffalo, claiming that the three men are so narrowed into a limited perception that audiences cannot relate to them. Other critics, however, have argued that people can relate to the play because big business works in the same petty way. American Buffalo has even been compared to Watergate in regard to the way both the characters and Nixon and his aides used foul language when no one could hear them and how, in both instances, the focus of their lives was on an unimportant, third-rate burglary.

Santana's Slick Spirit

The many faces of Carlos Santana.

By Diana Greene

Santana's performance last Saturday night was as tight and sharp as Cinderella's glass slipper. Playing each song with an enormous amount of energy, enthusiasm, and emotion, Santana's music was more than entertaining – it was empirical.

Having been together since 1967 in the days of the "San Francisco Sound," Haight Ashbury, and psychedelics, Santana stands out as one of the only bands who managed to avoid a burn-out. Santana has been successful right from the start. This Latin-rock band, named after the lead guitarist Carlos Santana, has always held a certain cosmic quality; however it was under the recent direction of guru Sri Chinmoy that Santana changed into a spiritually oriented band. Regardless of time and change, Santana has not forgotten their past, but rather transcended it.

The crowd, drenched from the untimely rain storm, were still searching for their seats when the lights were turned off. Not more than one minute had gone by when keyboard player Chris Ryan filled Dartmouth's auditorium full of electronic hype. One by one the others (nine in all) joined in intensifying the kinetic atmosphere that rallied and tantalized the fans. Then suddenly this whirlwind of sound stopped and Santana with impeccable cadence began to play a particularly melodic rendition of "Transcendence." It was obvious – Santana does not pussy-foot around.

Santana just barely gave the audience enough time to applaud before they started playing "Black Magic Woman," one of their most popular tunes. Needless to say, the smiles abounded. Carlos Santana, dressed completely in white from his gauze shirt right down to his crepe shoes, affirmed his reputation as a guitar virtuoso. During his captivating solo in "Black Magic Woman," one was reminded that it is not only Santana's speed but also his clarity of sound, sensitivity to pitch, and keen awareness to rhythm that make him a master of the electric guitar.

Santana remembered what their audience liked best; whether it was old or new, they played the favorites. Naturally they played "Oye Coma Va" and naturally the crowd went nuts. Everybody tossed away whatever inhibitions they had and started dancing to this super-funky, Latin-based classic. Chris Ryan, the new keyboard player, gave a dazzling expose of his electronic wizardry. No matter if he chose a mini-mogg, fender rhodes, or hammond organ, Ryan sounded his synthesizer with an equal dose of probity and capriciousness.

It was the song "She's Not There" that exemplified both Santana's versatility on guitar, Greg Walker's superior style as a vocalist, and the strength of the rhythm section. To say Santana was cooking when he played in this Hendrix-like vein would not do his commanding performance justice. Greg Walker had as much of the showmanship and stage presence as Sammy Davis Jr. (even if he did stand a foot taller), while the rich deep quality of his voice came through beautifully as he emphatically sang "She's Not There."

The most memorable and moving song of the evening was the love song "Samba Pa Ti," a tune from Abraxis. The background lights went down and the spotlight focused on Devadip Carlos Santana as he delivered a superb solo. Santana was brilliant artistically and flawless technically, proving once again that neither time nor repetition had altered the quintessence of his style.

Even though it may sound trite, every song was as good as the next. Santana juxtaposed the old with the new, the Latin with the rock, and the fast with the slow, which made for the perfect combination, pleasing all preferences and prejudices alike. Their energy was never-ending. One song led right into the next, never allowing more than one minute inbetween tunes. Even after they finished the hour and one half long set, they did not show even a tinge of fatigue.

Santana was incredible in every respect. Not only had they remained true to their Latin rock roots, but they resisted the trent toward commercialism that perpetuates the music industry today. It was not until the second encore when Santana briefly introduced the next tune by saying "This is a song from our new album Open Invitation" that one realized Santana was not plugging and had not sold out – that alone makes this band unique. Words cannot emphasize Santana's spirit and soul enough. Their concert was like a journey through a magical-mythical maze of music – a memorable experience.

Rockfield Sound Spawns Rockpile

By Lori Goodman

Dave Edmunds, Tracks on Wax 4, (Swan Song) ****

Hailed as the 'world's finest producer' by Phil Spector, Dave Edmunds has finally returned to his own recording career with his new album Tracks on Wax 4. Self-produced, this LP is comprised of thirteen tracks of non-stop rock and roll, and each is a no-less-than-perfect single. From Wales, Dave Edmunds was indispensable in creating the now-legendary "Rockfield Sound" and was called to international fame with his one gigantic hit, "I Hear You Knocking" in 1970. Edmunds has produced a variety of artists and groups in the past, including his own Love Sculpture, and the most recently acclaimed Flamin' Groovies album.

Edmunds is complemented by his new touring group Rockpile in which the great pop craftsman Nick Lowe plays bass and doubles as a solo artist. On the whole, this new release evokes the rockabilly rock and roll sounds reminiscent of Billey Lee Riley and Eddie Cochran. The first song, "Trouble Boys," is about the fears of coming face to face with teenage motorcycle hoods. "Not a Woman, Not a Child" concerns a budding young woman who has her parents worried on weekends and all the boys in a rave. Wailing with real vocal energy, Edmunds is not trying to recreate something. It's about kissing in the dark and being loved just right. The relevant rock and roll emotions are sung by Edmunds with absolute conviction.

Edmunds is full speed ahead into the blue suede shoes he's had in the name of rock and roll, and when rock and roll is this great, it makes you feel really good also.

Unknown Messengers

By Tom Nuccio

Art Blakey, *In This Korner

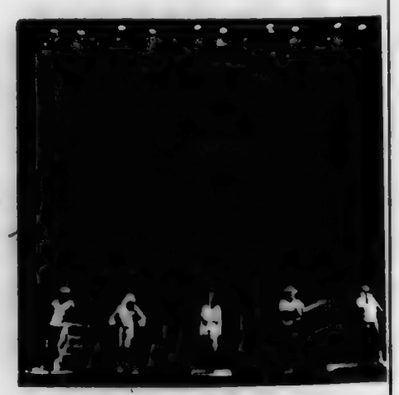
In This Korner will be tossed into many corners by jazz collectors and enthusiasts expecting it to be of previous Art Blakey caliber. Since 1954, drummer Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers group has featured some of the greatest artists in jazz. Musicians such as saxophonists Wayne Shorter and Benny Golson; trumpeters Freddie Hubbard, Donald Byrd and Jackie McClean; pianist Horace Silver and trombonist Curtis Fuller have all performed with this ensemble.



The present group has none of these superstars. Instead, Blakey has installed unrenowned instrumentalists who lack the dynamism and improvisational creativity of their predecessors. These semi-talented unknowns are exposed at their highest mediocrity in live performance on Blakey's latest release, In This Korner. Recorded at San Francisco's Keystone Korner, the disc marks Blakey's debut on Concord Jazz.

The album's only bright spot appears in the presence of the master himself — "Poppa"

Steeleye Span At Last

By Lori Goodman

Steeleye Span, Live at Last, (Chrysalis)

Certainly a remarkably prolific band, Steeleye Span comes forth with their eleventh and last album, Live at Last, recorded live in England at the Winter Palace in Bournemouth. Dedicated to the preservation of English folk styles in rock music, Steeleye Span has been a popular group in Britain since their inception in 1969, and attained their first foothold in the States with their most commercially successful album to date, All Around My Hat (1975).

Steeleye Span has still retained much of their original line-up on this effort: Jim Hart on vocals, guitar, and dulcimer; Rick Kemp on bass and vocals; and Nigel Pegrum on drums and flute. Martin Carthy re-emerges here, a leading figure in traditional folk revival, on guitars and mandolin. Last but far from least is Steeleye's

Mountain Greenery's Opening Celebration a Success

By Tom Campbell

It was a cold, dreary weekend, but at Mountain Greenery, Burlington's new performance center, a dazzling array of folk musicians and entertainers brightened the lives of an enthusiastic audience, not to mention each other.

Officially opening Friday night with a concert and dance featuring blues musician Bob White and Dealer's Choice, a Burlington based string band, Mountain Greenery continued the celebration Saturday with a series of folk workshops. Saturday evening featured a second concert and dance; the celebration culminated on Sunday with a third day of folk music and demonstrations.

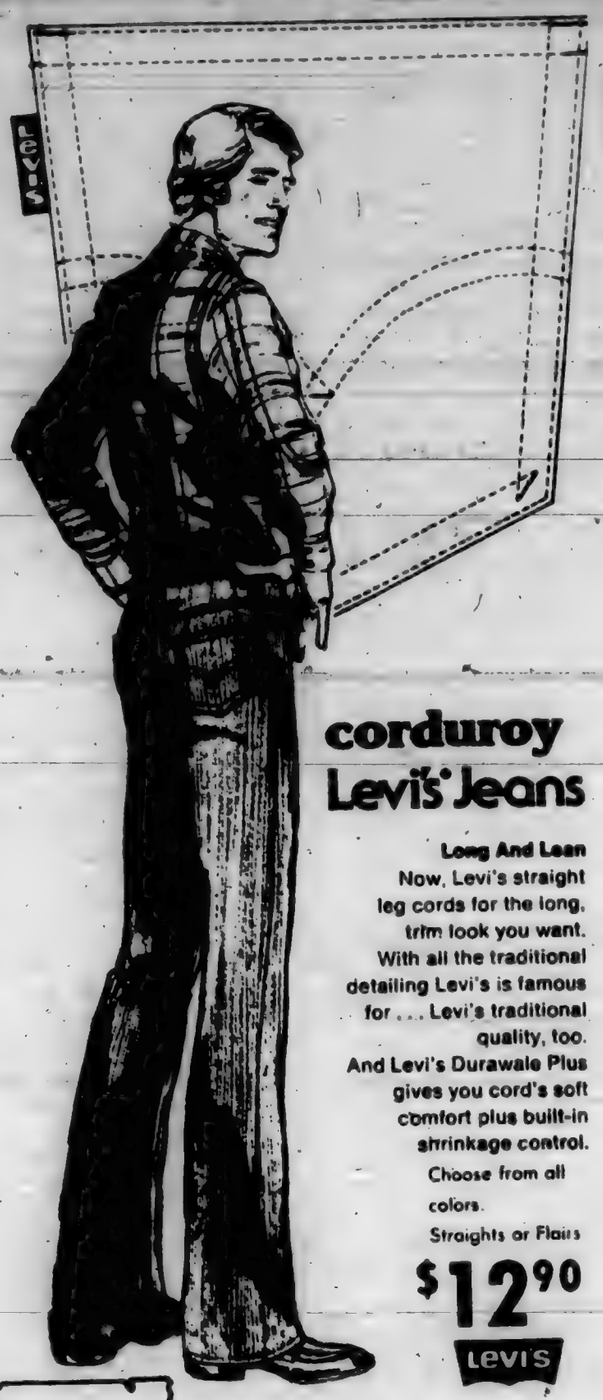
"We didn't get quite as large an attendance as we had anticipated," commented Bob Durand, the building's owner, about Friday night's performance. "But those who did come had a wonderful time. The atmosphere was perfect for the performers and Dealer's Choice played as well as I've ever heard them."

The workshops began with a children's concert performed for an audience that included about twenty-five kids most of whom were pre-school age or a little older. The performers, who included Sara Keller and Bob White on acoustic guitar, Mary Ann Samuels on dulcimer and two ladies, Barbara Freeman and Connie Reagan, known as The Folktellers, completely enthralled both young and old with their enthusiastic children's songs. At times changing the pace from music to story, The Folktellers acted out three different versions of children's books, including "Where the Wild Ones Are," each time receiving a great response for their efforts.

Between the first and second workshop presentations, the melodic sound of button accordian drew most of the audience to the back of the hall where a number of small displays were set up, showcasing the instruments and collections of a few area artists and entertainers. "It's a passion that will sometimes draw me into seclusion for as long as two or three weeks at a time," commented Rich Smith on his drawings that were hung on the wall in front of him. Working almost solely with dots to create scenes that range from an early spring view of a Burlington pier to a majestic white unicorn that gazes skyward from surrealistic mountain scenery, Smith feels that his pointillistic approach to art is the most effective means possible of creating meaningful imagery. "I often get the sensation," he continues, "of being a human camera. My eyes are the lenses, my mind is the camera itself and the canvas becomes the developed plate... I must habitually analyze everything that I encounter."

To the left was Robert Resnick, busy demonstrating the use of his numerous recorders, many of which he has collected from across the European continent. Thoroughly knowledgable about both playing them and their history, his presentation even included an abbreviated lesson in the fundamentals of playing and appreciating the Irish bagpipe.

The highlight of the afternoon was a presentation of the varied musical styles of the country/folk fiddle. Led by Peter Sutherland of The Arm and Hammer String Band and Roy Feldman of Dealer's Choice, the appreciative crowd was also treated to the different styles of Mike Seeger of The New Lost City Ramblers, and an outstanding pair of fiddlers from Quebec, Lisa Orstein and Pierre LaPort. "The fiddle is probably the closest instrument in relation to the human voice because it uses no frets and is played by rubbing the strings, not popping or striking them," commented Seeger later in the program. "More than almost any other musical instrument, the fiddle is able to almost capture the true reflections and emotions of the human voice." At one point the group performed "Soldier's Joy," a song that Sutherland feels is one of the most popular fiddler songs. Closing the afternoon, Ben Bergstein, the acting director of Mountain Greenery, gave lessons in the fine old art of folk dancing.



Performing to a three-quarters capacity house that evening, master of ceremonies Peter Sutherland introduced the rest of his band to kick off Saturday night's concert. The Arm and Hammer Band, which also includes Sid Blum, Hillary Woodruff and Joel Eckhaus, played a brisk and lively set punctuated with large doses of humor. After a lengthy tune-up between songs, Sutherland turned to the audience and said, "If anyone has a particular string that they would like tuned..."

The themes of their songs are equally as funny as their dialogues. "If you want to live a long long time," sang Blum, "don't ever drink your own moonshine." One song which the group said they liked to perform in crowded bars when

Incidentally, Springsteen is Coming

The S.A. Concert Bureau confirmed last Friday that Bruce Springsteen, America's crown prince of rock and roll, will be performing at UVM on Saturday, November 4.

If it's Friday afternoon (10/20) and this is seriously news to you, you're in serious trouble, as student tickets went on sale this (Friday) morning, for potentially the quickest 'sellout' concert since Bob Dylan performed here in 1974.

On a technical level, other than Springsteen's practice of hanging his lighting and sound equipment from the upper support beams (ceiling) and using a stage which slightly drops off to allow the singer easier access to the crowd, don't expect to see anything new. The Concert Bureau's recently increased security force, which, claimed one student, reduced the Van Morrison audience excitement level to that of "a mass meditation rite," will be essentially equal in number for the Springsteen event.

Unless you've been in a coma for six months, the 'word' on "The Boss" pretty much goes without saying. Springsteen's UVM concert is one of his last stops on a world tour which began last May. Since then, he has earned the universal praise of critics for originality, style of play, and the length of his concerts. His first recorded effort in three years, Darkness on the Edge of Town, was released in June and promptly sold platinum (one million copies).

Although the initial phase of the tour has been completed (Springsteen is currently in Europe), Northeastern America will be revisited for a brief sprint in early November.

3,000 tickets reserved for UVM students will go on sale Friday (10/20) at 9 a.m. in Patrick Gym. RUV abused security for alleged inconsistency regarding enforcement of the "camping out" restrictions, so if you're planning a night under the stars, call ahead to either the concert bureau or security to avoid a waste of time. Non-UVM students may vie for 500 randomly selected seats at 3 p.m. in Patrick on Friday.

With regard to the possibility that a number of full-time UVM students (S.A. members) will be turned away without tickets while non-students will receive tickets, Butler pointed out that non-UVM students had solidly supported the Concert Bureau during the Little Feat and Van Morrison shows, and accordingly, were rewarded with the opportunity to view Springsteen.

Wildrose Productions will present Jimmy Cliff and Zzebra in concert on Monday, November 20 at the Flynn Theatre. All seats are reserved, and tickets may be purchased exclusively at Freemark Artists, located above the Patisserie on Main Street, Burlington.

Van Morrison

too-perfect renditions.

More interesting was Van Morrison's older material, which came up increasingly toward the end of the set as the band and the audience warmed up. Songs like "Wild Night" and "Help Me" came off well, the band showing inspiration on the songs they hadn't helped produce and record. "Help Me" was as heavy as Morrison got: Peter Van Hooke pounding out the intro with a thudding bass drum, bringing Van to break loose and blow harmonica while singing, "You've got to help me, I can't do it all by myself."

As little as he moves on stage, Van Morrison was interesting to watch. Toward the middle of the set, when the band began to warm up and get funky, Van's singing became freer and more open to improvising. At the same time, he remained almost painfully conscious of his presence onstage, and sometimes hesitated awkwardly as if unable to decide where to take his performance. Although the band stayed so close to the recorded versions of Van's newer songs that they seemed almost perfunctory, Van himself became increasingly more involved. During "Help Me" he tried growling flatly into the mike, and then dropped the effect, while behind him the music diminished to nothing but sparse rhythm and vocals, abruptly returning to finish in a dramatic crescendo.

While the audience had been consistently quiet and well-behaved through the evening, people began to pick up on Van's gathering energy, and there was some continued response from the seats farther back from the stage. (Off to the left, someone held up the green, white and orange flag of Morrison's native Ireland, but gained little recognition from the stage.) Throughout the show, Van had hardly said a word to his audience, now that things began to move, he seemed to actually enjoy himself more. Smiling briefly to his backing singers, he broke up laughing at the end of a line in "Joyous Sound" and the concert took on a warmer, more personal feeling.

Back on for an encore at eleven o'clock, Van Morrison was inspired enough to do "Caravan," a song from his Moondance album that survives as a classic show tune, with a long stretch of improvised singing in the middle of it that kept the band watching for Van's directions.

At Patrick Gym, he repeated the performance from his set with the Band in their film The Last Waltz, singing out "turn it up, turn it up, turn it up, it's got soul," and kicking his foot out like soul singer James Brown.

Finally, the crowd was stirred to stand up and show signs of life. Onstage, the musicians were more enthusiastic; rhythm guitarist Herbie Armstrong enchanging delighted grins with the backing singers at Van's leaps and kicks. After that, continued cheers and applause drew Van Morrison back to deliver one more fresh version of a familiar old song, "Cypress Avenue," his band punchy as hell and building speed while Van jumped and danced with the microphone, singing, "It's too late to stop now!"

Van Morrison's show could be called inconsistent, as it moved between restrained versions of newer, less exciting songs and totally unabashed pleasure taken in his older successes, like "Moondance," "Wild Night," and "Cypress Avenue." In the course of his show Van seemed at times completely uncertain and at times in complete control of everything he and his band did. It was a little anti-climactic to hear him return to the current single, "Wavelength" a second time, especially as an encore to "Caravan."

One gets the impression that performing live is a mixed pleasure for Van Morrison, and the conflict of his initially withdrawn personality with his impulsive excitement on stage comes through, probably in every show he does.

At Patrick Gym, the pleasure was further diluted by the unsuccessful debut of New Wave music, which left the audience more set aback than warmed up when Van Morrison came on. But it wasn't that simple. The audience was for the most part unresponsive and slow to warm up, even for the headlining act.

When the concert finally did come to life, though, any impatience with the performers or the audience melted away. Inbetween the packed aisles and fevered intensity of previous Patrick Gym concerts and the cool passivity of the Saturday night show, Van Morrison will not be forgotten. He's still Van the man.

this resulted in a few people sitting in the tent and drinking all afternoon, people will have to wait in line and return for refills this year. "It gives more people a chance to listen to the band and it really cuts down on security problems," Searer said.

The Student Association has generously allocated the $864 for the beer, although in the true spirit of a fledgling bureaucracy, they are also spending $200 for the security guards' T-shirts. "But this is our only way of paying them," said S.A. President Charlie Clark, so they are excused.

In addition to 150 gallons of free cider supplied by Family Associates, SAGA, as always, will be there serving a full fare of both German and junk foods, including chicken, German chocolate cake, soft drinks, sandwiches, knockwurst, and soft, hot pretzels. According to Searer, SAGA's contract gives them the exclusive rights to cater all campus events and anyone who would want to sell food as a craft would have to get permission first. Nevertheless, with a truly festive attitude, SAGA is allowing one child to sell fudge this year at Oktoberfest.

Searer said that the entertainment will be "bizarre." Besides the Oompah Band, which is basically a group of five men who dress up in German costumes, imbibe excessively, and play German music in the beer tent all afternoon, the usual array of craftsmen, the OddVark Theatre, the UVM Concert Band, juggler George Sherwood, the Two Penny Circus, and the UVM Folk Dancers will be performing throughout the day. The residence halls are competing for a $65 first prize by designing German motif banners and, at 4:30, there will be a yodeling contest. Searer said they are saving this event until later on in the day because by that time, "people won't be afraid to make fools of themselves." A cuckoo clock is being made out of plywood and clowns will be opening the doors all day and announcing the events. "By the end of the day last year," Searer said, "people were announcing things wildly, whether they had any relevance or not."

Because of the expected crowds, Oktoberfest has been moved this year from the Redstone green to the green in front of Coolidge and Redstone Halls. "We're trying to spread out things so there is more space," said Searer. Usually, Oktoberfest is held earlier in the month when the weather is warmer; however it was postponed this year so it would coincide with the soccer game.

Nevertheless, Searer doesn't expect the temperatures to phase anyone. "It's a little late," he agreed. "But the cold air should just make people flock to the beer tent to get a little anti-freeze in their systems."

Something Old, Something New

Eric Lilljequist looked like he just hopped a plane from NBC studios and, as for Eric Cefontes, the drummer, one couldn't see very much of him because he was obliterated by his towering, gleaming set.

In spite of their disparate appearance, the band had a certain rapport, a communication with one another that made their performance exciting. During "Don't Cry Blue," Edwards was exchanging rhythms back and forth with each guitarist, reverting back to his own fast-paced lead, and then bringing the whole band together again. Together they charged everyone up so much that concert security didn't even notice the increasing number of people creeping out of their seats and slithering into the aisles and in front of the stage to boogie.

But it wasn't until "Shanty" that both Edwards and the crowd really went wild. The familiar, if not classic harmonica introduction signaled the audience and a massive amount of cheering broke out as the band went into high gear. Dubois stood out for the first time, escaping from his more supportive role and playing an intricate solo while Edwards rested up to sing the final chorus about "gettin' a good buzz on." Edwards really knows how to appeal to an audience, both musically and philosophically.

Ina May Wool, however, was the real surprise of the evening. Any experienced concert-goer, accustomed to lame warm-up groups that do anything but "warm-up" the crowd, would have felt a re-awakening of faith in the concert industry. A singer/songwriter from Boston who is currently experiencing a tremendous rise in popularity, Wool was just bursting with life, vitality and talent.

Although she had the short, clipped, inflections of Joni Mitchell, the primitive sounds of Flora Purim, and the elusive scat of the finest jazz singers, Wool's style was still irresistably her own. She sang her own material, drifting energetic tunes that she backed with a quick uptempo rhythm on acoustic guitar. With fingers snapping and feet tapping, Wool sang a spontaneous greeting to the audience at the end of her set while her partner David Conrad played a smooth walking bass line in the background. With nothing more to say, she switched to quick scat singing. Improvising with her voice, twisting from high smooth pitches to low, raspy shouts, there seemed to be no limit to the sounds she could make.

The St. Michael's crowd was well-behaved but not boring, yelling to the musicians when necessary but listening carefully when they demanded. Concert security ran around with tin cans, fastidiously snaffling cigarettes and drugs until later on in the concert, when they gave up and let people have a good time. The atmosphere was more relaxed than that of an S.A. concert, there being a certain element of insanity missing – but the music was just as exciting and the air a good deal fresher.

daughter who can best talk to Dad.

Joey's husband, Jeff (Sam Waterston), only has one problem – the fact that he has married into this fine, impeccable family.

The last daughter, Flyn (Kristin Griffith), is a film starlet who lives in Hollywood and can't get any of the big roles. Her relationship to the rest of the family is limited, though, because she's got form, but little brain-function.

Pearl provides the only comedic escape during the movie, because she's just a little closer to being the type of person we all consider "average." Her problem is that while she loves Dad, she isn't loved by Renata and Joey.

The family get-togethers don't generally involve a great deal of laughing and gaiety, and one wonders whether or not this family ever has any fun. That's the aspect that seems kind of depressing. One wonders how a family with so much money and talent can be so constantly bummed out.

At any rate, whether you love Interiors or hate it, Woody Allen has planted another milestone in his career.

It's doubtful we'll see any Bergman comedies, so let's hope Allen doesn't forget about his ability to be funny.

Buffalo

It is in Mamet's use of dialogue, Pierson claims, that makes American Buffalo engaging. "The thing that is particularly interesting to me," he said, "is the way Don and Teach use language to get what they want," adding that although there "is a constant barrage of crude, ugly talk, it isn't the swears that are ugly, but the way they use them to put themselves up."

Second Stage Productions is a small group that started out by performing a number of one-act plays, including David Mamet's Duck Variations, for a dinner theatre at the Radisson last winter. "It's a lot easier to get things going," Pierson said. "Everyone kind of does everything because the group is so small." Director John Bourne, a theatre major at UVM, has played the lead in the Royall Tyler production of Candide and directed Duck Variations.

So if you want to see what life, or at least business, might be like after you graduate, see American Buffalo in the Apse on either October 19, 20, 21, 27 or 28 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $2.50 for students and $3.50 for the general public.

Blakey

Blakey. Acting like a rhythmic dynamo, he develops more percussive variations of swing with his five piece set than most drummers do with an entire montage. His strongly pressed rolls and lightning rides provide an omnipresent sense of excitement for the listener. However, his impact is not strong enough to prevent his sidemen from ruining the date. Of the three horn players, altoist Robert Watson solos with the least mediocrity, playing rapid boppish lines that quickly and dramatically yield to screeches. Blues-inflected trumpeter Valery Ponomarev possesses excellent technique but suffers considerably due to his narrow range of notes. Pianist James Williams improvises in a choppily predictable manner, lacking fluency and feeling.

If you wish to hear some fine Jazz Messengers, purchase Caravan (Riverside 6074). You will hear vintage Blakey packed with dynamism and intensity rather than inferior musicianship and listlessness.

Steeleye Span

female vocalist Maddy Prior demonstrating her skill as a spicy folksinger, reinvigorating the ballads, sword dances, and mummer plays with all the knowledge of an ivy philologist/medievalist. Steeleye perceptibly rocks out in transition on their fourth song, "The Maid and the Palmer" and on the fanciful "Montrose." If traditionally oriented electric folk bands are your bag, then don't miss this album. A Renaissance fan should fare equally well here.

Their last song is "Rag Doll"... yes, the same "Rag Doll" by Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons. Sound incongruous? Not really. Steeleye Span has previously demonstrated their interest in old rock material by recording an acapella version of Buddy Holly's "Rave On" and a rendition of "To Know Him Is To Love Him," which featured David Bowie on saxophone. Perhaps this is a frank illumination of their repertorial affection for relic and classic material, and as their last song it crystallizes the inclusion of this new release, now archival, in the chronicles of popular rock music.

As the album notes inform us, Steeleye Span disbanded five days after this album was recorded, for reasons it connotes as "irrelevant but amicable." This album, however, is a testament to the relevance of traditional folk, revealing the commensurable talent of a band who, despite all of the above, is still surprised by the popularity and timelessness of their music.

Mountain Greenery

no one was listening features the lyrics "I love to sing to people when they talk, talk, talk. I love to sing to people when they squak, squak, squak."

Following The Arm and Hammer String Band, The Folktellers took the stage and performed a number of both serious and humorous stories. One of them, which was very relevant to the occasion and earned a big round of applause, was a poem by Steven Vincent Binet titled "Mountain Whippowill." It was a story of the Essex fiddlers contest and an underdog contestant who wins the hearts of the "established" fiddlers with his inspired playing.

The big event of the night was the much awaited performance of Mike Seeger, who finally took the stage around ten-thirty. Demonstrating his considerable knowledge of folk music, Seeger changed instruments with virtually every song. He opened by accompanying himself on banjo and pitch pipes on a song called "Tennessee Dog." He performed a little "existential banjo picking" and then switched to the jew's harp for an acoustical piece. Next he played what was probably the prettiest song of the night, this time using the dulcimer to produce a slick, sitar-like sound. During the course of the evening he also made use of the fiddle, the acoustic guitar, the mandolin, and finally, in his encore number, the autoharp. "There's plenty of beautiful music in this country," Seeger told the audience before he left the stage, "and you're very lucky to have a place like this to have ready access to it."

As the audience danced well into the night to the combined talents of most of the evening's musicians, it was obvious that they would be back on the following day for another round of workshops, and the concert performances of Rick Winston, Kate Wolf, and Utah Phillips.

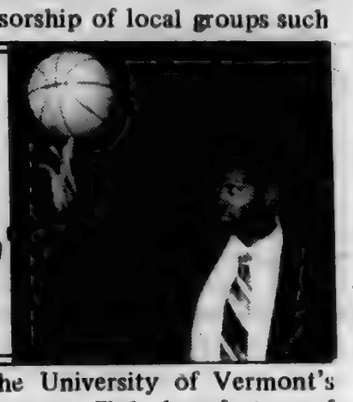
Modern Globetrotters Combine Fund-raising, Sports and Showbusiness

By Steven Larose



The hand clapping, foot stomping strains of "Sweet Georgia Brown" come blasting over the makeshift public address system. From the locker room bursts the National Unit of The Harlem Globetrotters, with the immediate roar of thousands of basketball hungry kids drowning out all other thoughts and sounds.

And so begins another of the 13,000 plus performances of the legendary Harlem Globetrotters, billed as the world's greatest family entertainment. For the next two hours, the Globetrotters perform their special brand of basketball, delighting the crowd with every trick and slamdunk. After the show the Globetrotters will board a jet and travel to the next of their more than 400 performances this year.

Gone are the days when the Globetrotters traveled the hinterlands of America in a beat-up stationwagon with coach and founder Abe Saperstein. Today the Globetrotters are a part of conglomerate corporation metro-media, which has turned the original concept of 'basketball for fun' into a multi-million dollar show business boom, complete with cartoons, nationwide network shows and a vast array of novelty items.

Part of the Globetrotter system is performing in communities under the sponsorship of local groups such as the University of Vermont's Catamount Club, benefactory of Thursday night's Globetrotter appearance at the Patrick Gymnasium.

"Even though the Globetrotters are now part of a large corporation, I think we still reach out and touch people with humor"
-Hallie Bryant

The Catamount Club will receive 25% of the gate receipts from the evening, with the Globetrotters taking the remaining 75%. The Globetrotter management provides publicity, posters and advertising, plus tickets. Al Overton, president of the Catamount Club, explained, "We had them here in 1977. It was so successful that we decided to have them back. It's a no lose proposition for us. The Globetrotters are a good outlet for people to make money, and they've always stood for pure family entertainment. Certainly the arrangement benefits their own coffers, but their organization is so skilled at promotion and the Globetrotters are so widely known that we can't go wrong."

When questioned about the appearance of the Globetrotters to kick off the Homecoming Weekend, Overton responded, "We decided it would be a good time to bring them here and we were lucky enough to get the date." Upon further questioning, Overton conceded that the Catamount Club was trying to build up the Oktoberfest/Homecoming Weekend to get the alumni and the parents interested in the university and its athletic community. "The school's supporters lost a lot of interest when the university dropped both its football program and the Kakewalk. A lot of fans strayed away and some were even offended. So big events like the Globetrotters and the Borg Challenge Match (last May), plus the little things the

Burlington Ski Show:
Schoenberger to Perform Freestyle Exhibition

By Glenn Logan

When ski racer-instructor Alan Schoenberger saw his first freestyle skier twirl gracefully down the mountain, he had a glimpse of his future. Freestyle skiing was a natural fusion of Schoenberger's life-long racing experience and his interest in ballet and gymnastics. "It was a different way to control your skis. I had raced all my life and this was something different," he explained.

Schoenberger was forced to learn freestyle on his own because of the only limited development of the sport in 1974. The absence of organized instruction and well-designed skis made this a difficult task. His first year was riddled with bad luck and injuries. "I broke my foot in my boot and later on I broke my jaw," said Schoenberger.

Schoenberger trained rigorously for his first meet. Every day he practiced yoga for an hour to loosen up and then ran a few miles. He continued [illegible] by doing two hundred pushups. Why so many pushups, you might wonder. "You need a strong upper body to perform some of the tricks as well as to recover from falls," he said.

For any new stunt to be performed in freestyle competition, the freestyler must prove that it can be done safely. In Schoenberger's first safety qualification test at Park City West, Utah, he broke his jaw for the second time. Not a quitter by nature, however, Schoenberger stayed in the qualifiers despite his injury. The next run was to prove the safety of a flip. Unfortunately in that run he broke three ribs and his left shoulder. Then, as unbelievable as it may sound, he tried the flip again and qualified before going to the hospital.

[illegible] first freestyle competition for [illegible] five thousand [illegible] skiers [illegible] pay his expenses. Surprisingly the top contenders showed up. Nonetheless, Schoenberger placed second, signifying the start of a great career.

In 1975, Schoenberger placed first at Stowe, Vermont with an act which mimed a puppet learning how to ski. His unique and original act was widely acclaimed. "The marionette was learning how to ski, then eventually did freestyle skiing and tricks," Schoenberger said. Later, Schoenberger was nicknamed "the puppet."

"The puppet was created to stimulate people's minds as well as their eyes," Schoenberger said. It did. After the introduction of the puppet, Schoenberger won seven second places and two first places in competitions. He then went on to win the world trophy in 1976.

Stone's Goal Earns UVM A Tie with URI; Cats Zonk St. Mike's 3-1

By Hart Van Denburg

Larry Stone's first half goal allowed the University of Vermont men's soccer team to stay in the game and earn a 1-1 overtime tie with the University of Rhode Island Rams in Kingston, R.I. last Saturday.

All morning long the rain was a continuous factor, soaking the players but not dampening their spirits. The Rams revelled in the warm rain and took command of the game only 57 seconds after the kick-off with a devastating goal by Jose Rico. Gillian King broke away from midfield down the left of the field to pass off the ball to Rico, who skidded the ball past goalie Bart Farley low and hard.

After the game Farley, who played while nursing an injured back, admitted it was the kind of goal that he least wanted to concede. "I had the near post covered for the shot, Rico hit the ball from about 10 yards out, but he aimed between me and the near post. It's just like ice hockey for the goalie. It's the side that you meant to have covered, but the shot went in." The error didn't disturb Farley, who continued to ignore his painful back and play a calm and confident game for the rest of the match.

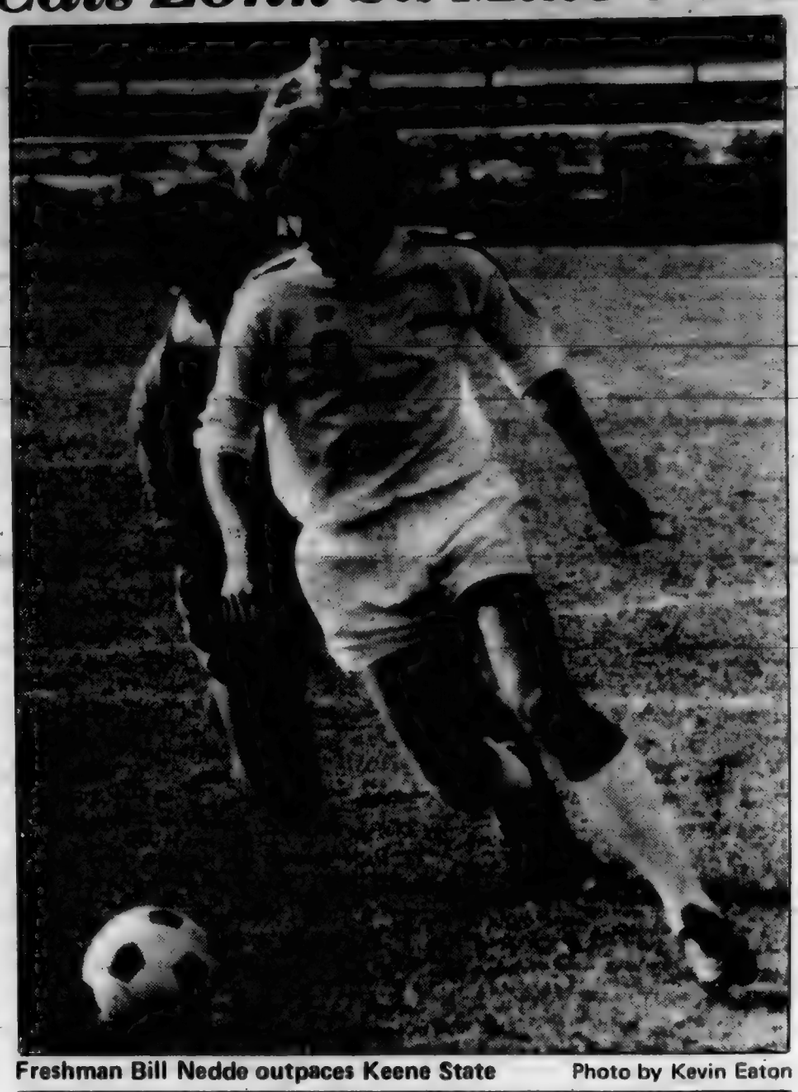
In contrast to Farley, Gonsales Rico was not so confident in the Rhode Island goal. Rico looked a little unsure of himself behind the Rhode Island team, an advantage that could have been further capitalized on by the Cats. Sensing this weakness, the Ram's defense played a commanding game and kept the ball away from the goal as much as possible.

Stone was the man who brought UVM onto the scoreboard and back into the game. With only 6:28 remaining in the first half, Brad Parker crossed the ball to Stone who put it squarely in the back of the net from inside the left hand corner of the penalty area.

After applying a lot of pressure on UVM in the first half, Rhode Island began to show signs of fatigue in the second. Jose Rico and Mario Perieira, who had been firing off shots left, right, and center at the Cats' goal in the first half, began to slip and only managed high and wide shots. Nevertheless, they caused a few unnerving moments that nearly put Rhode Island back in the lead. Twelve minutes into the second period Pereira broke loose down the left wing and unleashed a low hard ball that Farley skillfully lept onto quickly to thwart the Ram's attack.

With nerves taut and tempers fraying, both teams went at each other like mad dogs for the remainder of the second half of regular play. Then with four minutes left to play Cam Diamandis broke down the right wing from inside the Cats' own half and rocketed down towards the Rhode Island goal. Just before he arrived at the penalty area, he was forced out to the right wing by a defender. Diamandis managed to pull off a cross before running out of bounds to avoid being offside. The ball was intended for Jeff Merrill, but in the chaos found its way to Vermont's Parker who slammed the ball at the goal.

The ensuing play sparked a great amount of controversy amongst players, coaches, and officials. Some contended that when Parker shot, a R.I. defender had handballed it in order to prevent a certain goal. Others disagreed. When the ball landed, it appeared to have bounced into and then out of the goal. Diamandis, who was standing out of play at the baseline, later remarked that he could have sworn the ball crossed the goal line, but the referee, who was standing at midfield, ruled it no goal.



Resultingly, the game carried on into the prescribed overtime period. All the extra time allowed was for players to get even wetter than they already were and to gradually lose their tempers to the point of almost having a fight. The game had gone on too long and ended a 1-1 tie.

While Barry Ryan was commended by Coach Paul Reinhardt for "playing his best game so far for the Cats this season," Larry Stone was Vermont's key scorer with the tying goal and seven other shots on goal. His efforts there and in the Boston College game last Monday where he contributed to the 3-0 win, earned him the title of Yankee Conference Player of the Week. Bart Farley was topped in goalie rankings by Wil Temby of UMass who has an average of .33 while Farley dropped his average to .50 after conceding the goal at Rhode Island. UVM's Brian Fleming now ranks tenth in Yankee Conference scoring.

Vermont defeated St. Michaels 3-1 in a home game held last Tuesday. St. Mikes' Keith Heingartner opened up the scoring with a goal one minute into the first half. UVM was not to be outdone as Avakian tallied the first of three for the Green and Gold at 6:40, followed by the second Vermont goal by Fleming at the 8:48 mark. Larry Stone recorded the Cats' third and final goal late in the second half. Farley had 17 saves while the St. Mikes' goalie stopped 13.

The Cats are now ranked seventh in New England with a 5-1-3 record, while Dartmouth led the table with a 5-0-1, and UConn is second with 9-3-0. UVM faces Dartmouth on November 1st and UConn on November 11th. Both games are on the road and promise to be the toughest games of the season.

UVM's next home game is the big homecoming contest against UNH on Saturday.

flashed on the screen of an old marionette who introduces the skits with cue cards.

Schoenberger does not find it difficult to create new skits for his show. "I have a folder of ideas. I have them in my head too. It just takes time to perfect them," he said. Schoenberger acts out his new ideas by himself until he feels confident enough to try them on an audience. When he first started to perform, he had to experiment with many acts. "If I went out and tried an act and it didn't go over as well as I had hoped, I felt really bad," he said.

Schoenberger's most recent show went over extremely well with a bigger reception than expected. About four thousand people attended the show. Even one of his former contenders in freestyle skiing, Wayne Wong, was in the audience. "After three years of hell, the audience was really receptive," Schoenberger said. "They really wanted to see what I had to say."

Schoenberger really wants to provide his audience with some good entertainment. "I don't want to waste the audience's time," he says. Schoenberger is featured in the upcoming Burlington ski show on the weekend of October 20th at the Burlington Memorial auditorium. He will be performing four shows daily during the three-day event.

Soccer Double Header to Highlight Homecoming Weekend

A soccer double-header at UVM's Centennial Field and the Yankee Conference Cross Country Championships at Archie T. Post Field are among the athletic highlights of Homecoming Weekend, 1978, at the University of Vermont.

In preparation for the weekend, Vermont's men's soccer team meets cross-town rival St. Michael's on Tuesday (Oct. 17) at Centennial Field and the women's team travels to Plymouth State on Wednesday before all eyes focus on Centennial Field for a pair of key clashes that should give the Homecoming crowd something to cheer about.

Vermont's women's soccer team hosts Champlain Regional of Montreal, Que., in an 11 a.m. clash, and the men's team hosts Yankee Conference foe New Hampshire in a key game beginning at 2 p.m.

As part of the Homecoming festivities, a special ceremony is planned for the induction of Athletic Hall of Famers Frederick H. "Red" Harris, '22, and George H. "Red" Cook, '35, as lifetime members of the Catamount Club, an alumni support group of UVM athletics.

The women's soccer team, 7-2-1 entering the Plymouth State game, will have a chance to avenge one of its two losses in the Homecoming game. Champlain took a 2-1 decision from the Catamounts on Sept. 30 in Montreal.

"Champlain is strong, but I think we can be stronger this time around," said Vermont's coach Mary Ellen Rathbone. "We missed a penalty kick that would have tied the first game, and we're a much better team now than we were then. Our defense has been solid in the last few games, and all phases of our game seem to be coming together."

Vermont's men's soccer team, ranked fifth in New England in the current week's ISAA – Pepsi Cola coaches poll, battled sixth-ranked Rhode Island to a 1-1 tie Saturday (Oct. 14) in Kingston to move to 4-1-3 on the year entering Tuesday's (Oct. 17) game with St. Michael's. The soccer Cats remained unbeaten in the Yankee Conference at 1-0-2, having played three of the four top-ranked teams in the Conference. The Cats have tied the Rams and Boston University (0-0), and beaten Massachusetts 2-1 in one of the season's most significant upsets.

Saturday's clash with New Hampshire ranks as a key conference game for Paul Reinhardt's booters. The Wildcats, formerly one of the weaker teams in the Conference, have come of age this year. Several of their scores against common opponents mirror Vermont's success.

New Hampshire dropped a 1-0 season opener to Boston University, whom Vermont played to a scoreless tie, tied Keene State, 1-1, the identical score as Vermont, and beat Boston College, whom UVM topped 3-0, by a score of 2-1.

"The ties haven't hurt us," said Reinhardt of the Yankee Conference picture. "But we need to beat New Hampshire Saturday (Oct. 21) and Maine next Saturday (Oct. 28), to set the stage for our meeting with Connecticut, Nov. 11." The Huskies, ranked No. 1 in New England before being upset by Dartmouth, 3-2, were unbeaten in the Conference at 2-0

Globetrotters

Catamount Club does year round will hopefully draw the alumni and parents back to UVM."

Overton also said that "the whole idea behind the Catamount Club is to solicit gifts to benefit the university's athletic programs. With these activities we will hopefully heighten the alumni's interest; and if they would like to donate money, they know there is someone that they can contact. Also events like the Globetrotters will build our image with the parents and the community, trying to make up for the ground we lost when football was dropped."

Although Overton tried to maintain a positive outlook about the Catamount Club's Globetrotter sponsorship, he did have his doubts. "They were here recently, and maybe people still remember them enough so they might not feel that it's worth $6 to come out again. I don't know if the tickets are selling too well, since the price may be too expensive for Burlington."

A CLOSER LOOK AT THE CATAMOUNT CLUB

While the Globetrotters bring their brand of basketball magic to Burlington, they are only a small cog in a big machine geared toward providing extra money for the UVM athletic community.

Joe Choquette, director of sports information at UVM, provided a brief history of the Catamount Club and its function, "The group was formed about a year ago as a support group for UVM athletics. They solicit contributions that go into the UVM Fund. These funds are used for athletics, at the Athletic Director's discretion. Last year they sent the women's ski team to the national finals. In a sense they expedite the alumni contribution program, so that potential donors are aware that they can contribute to UVM athletics. The Catamount Club members, about 250 people, are concerned with the direction of UVM athletics, especially with the current budget crunch. Without the additional monies, UVM might be unable to stay in Division I competition."

The Catamount Club has plans for another event of the Globetrotter's caliber next spring, according to Cindy Kent, director of the UVM Fund Program in the Development office. In its first year the Catamount Club raised $29,000 and last year the figure bloomed to a healthy $49,000, all of which went back into the athletic program as extra budgetary monies to upgrade the programs in terms of equipment, scholarships and traveling expenses. Kent also remarked that the Globetrotters and other appearances of nationally known groups improve the Catamount Club's visibility. According to Kent, the Catamount Club stands to profit $4,000 from the Globetrotter's performance, but long run benefits are even greater due to increased donations from alumni, who might not have contributed had they not become re-involved with the university through the Catamount Club's and Alumni Office's activities. Current activities also include an auction/dance, the Hall of Fame dinner and a special presentation at the UNH-UVM soccer game.

Hallie Bryant Meets the Press.

NO MORE MEADOWLARK

The Globetrotters begin their 1978 world tour without the antics of basketball institution Meadowlark Lemon, perhaps the greatest Globetrotter showman of all times. Lemon retired recently after 23 years of delighting audiences around the world.

The new stars of the Harlem Globetrotters will generate a new curiosity and keep the tradition of good clean basketball fun flowing, according to Hallie Bryant, a Globetrotter advance man who visited the University of Vermont last week to spread the word about the new team.

"Geese Ausbie and Curley Neal have stepped in to replace Meadowlark, but the ingredients of the Globetrotters haven't changed. They still thrive on audience involvement. Meadowlark had all the publicity, but Curley and Geese have blossomed quietly in the background and are now ready to step in," Bryant remarked.

Bryant has traded his uniform for a coat and tie, but still firmly believes in the Globetrotter ideals. He travels around the country hyping the team and what they stand for. While at UVM, Bryant performed a few basketball tricks for the local media, and then sat down to talk about the changes the Globetrotters have undergone.

"Even though the Globetrotters are now part of a large corporation, I think we still reach out and touch people with humor. The Globetrotters do positive things and get instant results with all ages and nationalities. People understand laughter and humor, and if it can help them ease their everyday problems, I'd say we have accomplished something."

When Bryant was queried about the Globetrotters' evolution from a simple group of basketball players seeking to bring a little humor into the lives of their audiences into a conglomerate corporation dependent on profits, he replied, "We've just taken on a different dimension. The cartoons and national TV has helped the Globetrotter cause. No matter how complex the behind the scenes organization becomes, the Globetrotters will always remain a tradition, just like Santa Claus."

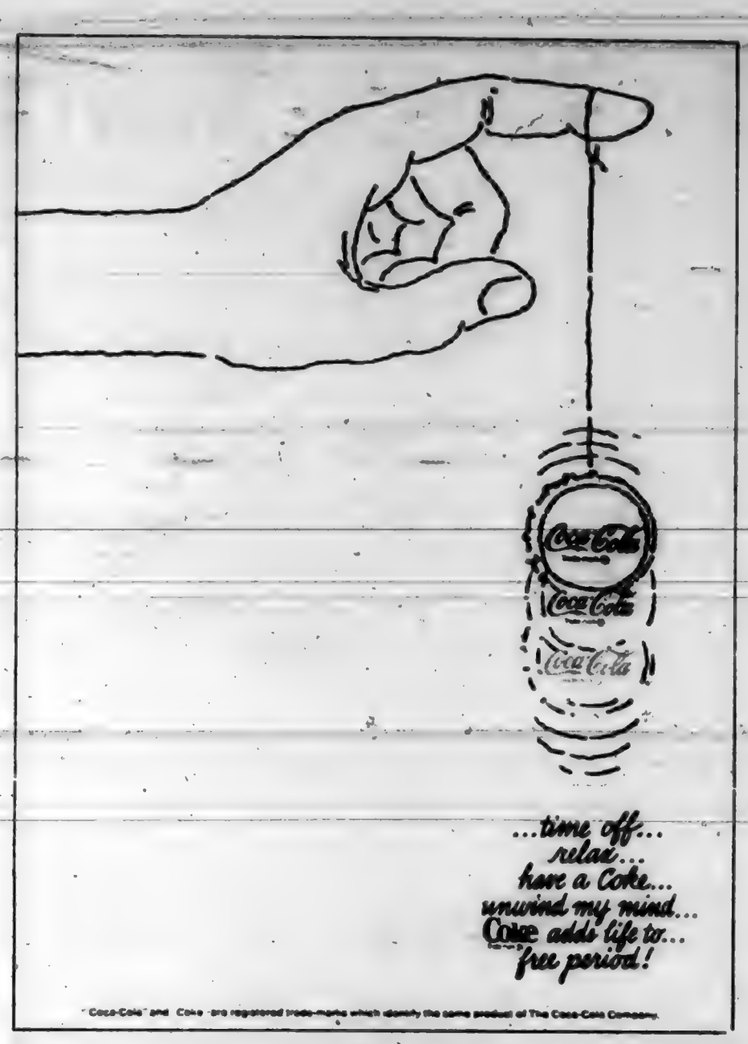
THE PRECISION HAIRCUT EXPLAINED, PRECISELY.

Because your head is unique, the way your hair grows is equally unique.

Precision haircutting is a technique for cutting the hair in harmony with the way it grows. Your hair eventually grows out but it doesn't lose its shape. So your haircut will look as good after five days as it does after five minutes. And because the hair falls naturally into place you won't have to fuss with it. Usually a shake of the head does it.



At Command Performance we shampoo, precision cut and blow dry your hair for twelve dollars. No appointments are necessary.

We also offer permanent waves, coloring, frosting and conditioning. But we really shine with precision. And so will you.

Vermont Runningmen and Women Sweep State Tourneys

By Tom Phillips

In a characteristic showing of dominating depth backed by record-breaking performances, the University of Vermont men's and women's track teams charged on to win the state titles over Middlebury, Johnson State and St. Michaels last weekend at Johnson State.

The women's race, billed as a showdown between Vermont and Middlebury, turned out to be a runaway for the Cats. UVM scored a mere 22 points to outdistance second place Middlebury's 39-point total in the four-team field. Johnson State and St. Michael's, finishing third and fourth respectively, were the only other schools entered.

For the second time in as many meets, UVM's Judi St. Hilaire emerged as the victor. On the hilly three-mile Johnson State course, St. Hilaire recorded the day's fastest time of 17:08. But on this day, the clock was not St. Hilaire's best challenger. Karen VonBerg of Middlebury College, a talented and experienced runner, doggedly ran beside St. Hilaire for 2.9 of the 3-mile race distance. But a final surge by St. Hilaire in the last 100 yards proved sufficient in dashing any of VonBerg's hopes for victory. VonBerg's time of 17:17 was just three seconds slower than St. Hilaire's.

Just behind this expected duel for individual honors, the Vermont women were salting away an unexpectedly easy victory. UVM'ers Donna Raymond (3rd), Anne Schiavone (4th), Amy Bouchard (5th), Robin Snyder (9th), and Kristin Wood (10th) sandwiched themselves between a pair of Middlebury competitors, thereby preventing the second-place Panthers from gaining any ground. Heather Adams of UVM, in 12th place overall, nosed out Middlebury's fifth and last scorer to add insult to injury.

Vermont Coach Perry Bland offered his analysis of the race: "I'm really not surprised with the point spread between us and Middlebury. We've run some good, tough races already this year; so, I knew they (Middlebury) wouldn't be out of our league. I do think, though, that we might have won by a bit more if all went as it has in the past. Our second runner, Donna Raymond, didn't run as well as she has in other meets. But she'll be okay for the New Englands."

The next meet for the Vermont women is the New England Championships set for Oct. 21-22 at Springfield, Mass. The Catamounts will have to be in top shape to be serious contenders for the trophy. Vermont will duel with the likes of UMass, UConn and Williams – teams that have been easily defeating opponents all season long.

The men's race, run over a rolling 4.5-mile Johnson course, saw the Catamounts seize the team title in much the same manner as the Vermont girls – by bunching six runners into the top ten places. The final team standings read like a carbon-copy of the women's results: UVM – 23, Middlebury – 41, Johnson State – 98.

The Cats were not without their individual hero, however, as Mike Myers, a sophomore from Brandon, Vermont, sped to a record-breaking time of 24:20 in capturing the first spot. Myers broke the record of 24:48 set by Johnson State's Larry Martell last year. Martell was competing in this year's race, but was forced to drop out due to an ailment.

After a relatively quick start by the Johnson State squad, the tide of Vermont yellow jerseys gradually rolled to the pack-front. Led by Myers, who grabbed the lead at the one-mile mark, the Catamount line of Mike Landman, Dave Elliott, Paisano Beatini, Randy Sightler, and Kevin Martell took hold on the fourth through eighth positions. Only two fine Middlebury runners in second and third spots prevented the Cats from racking up a perfect score.

Although the State Meet win was not as impressive as, perhaps, the upset over Williams, it was equally important. Coach Bill Nedde explains, "We've built up quite a tradition for winning the state meet and no team wants to be the first one to lose it. We knew the Johnson State team had designs on winning this year, but not one of our guys was ready to lose this meet. We knew we would just have to run up to par if we were to stay on top of this year's results." The UVM victory kept intact the streak of Catamount State Meet wins started in 1946.

The State Meet marked the last regular season race for the Vermont squad. This Saturday, Oct. 21, UVM will compete at home in the Yankee Conference championships. The Cats hope to finish in the top three teams, but they will have to knock off teams like UNH, UConn, and Boston University to do so. Maine may challenge defending team titlist UMass, a powerful cross-country school that has managed to win the Yankee Conference meet the past eight years. Maine defeated UMass by one point last week, but the Red Machine from Massachusetts always hits gear when the chips are down. The race will be held at the Archie Post field at noon.

UVM "Run for Fun" Attracts Large Turn-out

Even though rainy weather pervailed throughout Friday, over 85 runners showed up to run the campus course to support UVM Intramural Program in a "Run For Fun" sponsored by Sigma Nu. The $450 collected will go towards the purchasing of badly needed equipment and supplies.

The race itself was a fast-paced one with Chris Baldwin clocking the winning time in under 13 minutes. Terri Sullivan was the ladies winner. Both received running shoes of their choice from the Downhill Edge. Other winners were Peter Apostalices and Katie Newsom for men's and ladies' most sponsorship money raised. Together, they totaled $140!!! The sorority and fraternity houses Pi Phi and Sigma Nu raised the most money for the Greeks. Keith Miser, the dean of students, Mike Nardi, president of Sigma Nu, and Alex Pasfuszek, athletic chairman of Sigma Nu, presented the awards to the winners.

The success of the race capped many weeks of hard work by S.A. office members headed by Bob and Peter Weiller, Dave Nestor and Bill Mahr. Dean Miser and his office donated the plaques. Intramural program director Norm Strassberg represented his organization.

Several propositions have been submitted for review by the sponsors as to what exactly should be done with the money. One suggestion was to have the sum go to Ice Hockey equipment for the campus and colored jerseys to better differentiate teams. A final decision on where the funds will go will be made this week.

LaCasse Named Chairman Of NCAA Rules Committee

Lloyd F. "Chip" LaCasse, director of intercollegiate skiing at the University of Vermont, has been named chairman of the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Ski Rules Committee.

LaCasse, head ski coach at Vermont since the 1971-72 season, has been a member of the committee since 1975 and is currently in his third year as president of the College Ski Coaches Association of America. His duties include presiding over the bi-annual meetings of the rules committee and direction of the NCAA Ski Championships, which will be held this year at Steamboat Springs, Colorado, on March 7-10. He replaces William "Bill" Marolt, formerly of the University of Colorado, who has become director of the development program for the U.S. Ski Team.

UMaine Stomps on Vermont Leathermen

By Dale Gates

The University of Maine's dominating size and strength proved too much for the University of Vermont's Rugby team as they crushed the Catamounts 40-7 last Saturday.

Vermont opened the contest with a quick score when Al Park recovered his own kick and ran the remaining 10 yards for the four-point try.

Maine responded quickly, connecting for a score and the point after kick to make it 6-4. Both teams played well during the remaining minutes of the first half, UMaine coming out with an eight point lead.

Maine completely dominated the second half as UVM's smaller and less effective scrum could not stop Maine's scoring drives, totaling 26 points in the half. Vermont's only score came after Mike Everett connected for a penalty kick for three points.

Vermont's season record now falls to 2-3 with two games remaining on the schedule. UVM will host Clarkson this Saturday. Game time is 1:00 p.m.

Gymnastic Exhibition Set

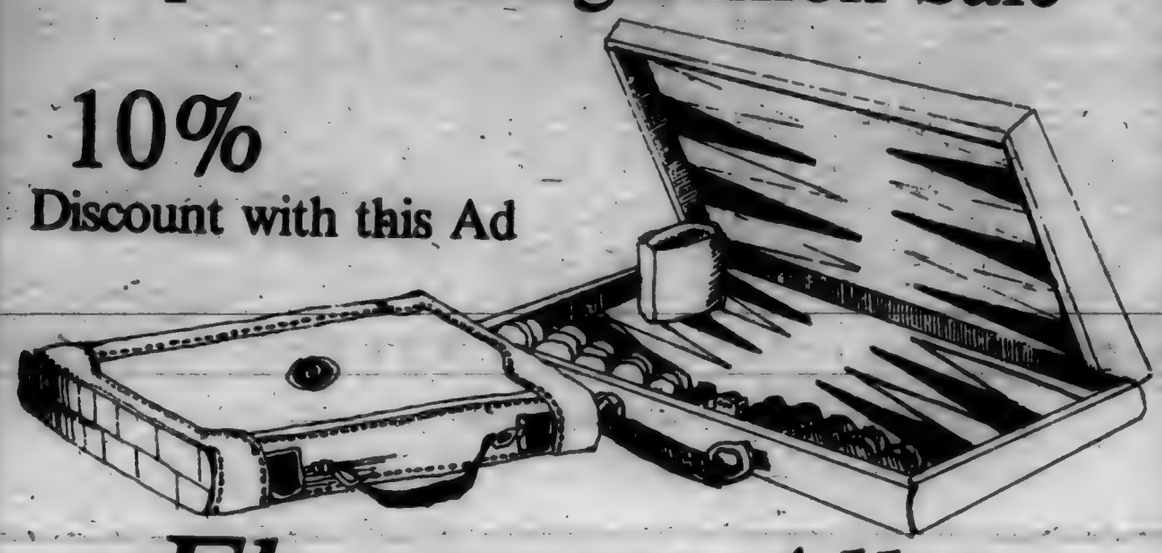
As part of the Oktoberfest celebration, the UVM men's and women's gymnastics teams will present an exciting exhibition of fun and flips on October 20, Friday at 5:15 p.m. at the Patrick Gymnasium.

Performers will display their skills on all pieces of apparatus. The men's team will execute routines on the parallel bars, high bar, rings, the vault, pommel horse, and floor exercise. The women's team will show their grace and skill on the vault, uneven parallel bars, balance beam and the floor exercise. Admission is free.

Fall Wilderness Experience Program in Full Swing

By Carrie Kirkpatrick

On the weekend of September 23-24, fifty students from various parts of the country found themselves out hiking Vermont's Long Trail. They were on a Freshmen Orientation program run by UVM's Wilderness Experience. The leaders were UVM students experienced in the outdoors, so there was more to the trip than just hiking. There were discussions on wilderness survival techniques, the environment, and first-aid skills. Instruction included map and compass work, conservation, basic camp craft, tent setting and even how to pack for a weekend.



With Trek, Wilderness Experience was in full swing again for the fall. There have been three more successful trips since, with another planned for November 4-5. All the trips are similar in format. They are geared to the novice hiker who is interested in learning outdoor skills and knowledge.

The groups are kept small which encourages learning and contributes to a good sense of group cohesiveness, the two fundamentals of the Wilderness Experience program.

Everything for the weekend is provided: equipment, transportation and food. The cost of a weekend is $15. If you are interested in finding out more about the trips, stop by Wilderness Experience in the Student Activities office upstairs in Billings. The phone number is x2060. If you are interested, we also have a composite slide show available to dorms and other groups.

Hall of Fame Dinner To Honor Sports Greats

The tenth annual Athletic Hall of Fame Dinner, featuring the induction of seven former University of Vermont athletes, is set for Friday (Oct. 20), the highlight of sports for Homecoming Weekend, 1978.

Beginning with a 4:30 p.m. tour of the Athletic Hall of Fame Room in the lower lobby of the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium, the program includes a 6 p.m. social at the Marsh Dining Hall followed by a 7 p.m. dinner. The induction ceremony, conducted by master of ceremonies Tony Adams of WCAX-TV, will follow the dinner.

Selected for induction this year are Elmari "Elmer" Bowman, '20, a baseball player and outstanding hitter at Vermont who went on to be a standout in the minor leagues; Richard L. "Dick" Cassani, '63, the No. 1 pitcher in New England in 1962 with a 9-0 record and an earned run average of 0.99; Robert W. Deacon, '53, captain of the 1952 football team who set several records as a quarterback that stood for over 15 years; William C. "Bill" Howard, '52, who still holds the UVM record in the 100-yard dash (9.7); Carl C. Macomber, '29, captain of the 1929 Catamount baseball team and a career .300 hitter; Robert K. "Bob" Mitchell, '68, who set eight UVM, New England and national records in 1966 as the most explosive running back in UVM football history; and Walter M. "Wally" Sargent, '31, a three-sports star at Vermont in the late '20's and early '30s.

During the 4:30 p.m. tour of the Athletic Hall of Fame, guests of the University and members of the general public will have an opportunity to view the University's athletic shrine, which has grown in content since its dedication in 1971. The collection includes trophies, photographs, paintings and sports equipment that chronicle the university's athletic history. Though tickets are required for the dinner, the tour will be open to the general public at no charge, and the Hall of Fame Room will be open Saturday morning from 10 a.m. to 12 noon for those unable to attend the Friday evening tour.

Vermont Tennis Women Look to New Englands

By Rich Chalmers

After a barely challenging 5-0 victory over Castleton and two last-minute cancellations by Dartmouth and Smith earlier this week, the University of Vermont women's tennis squad ended a rewarding 6-2 season. The Cats are now looking toward the New England women's inter-collegiate tennis tournament to be held in Amherst, Mass this weekend.

Pam Hensel and Carol Khachian will represent Vermont in the two singles spots while the doubles teams of Becky Rich – Kathy Stanton and Kathy Borda – Jean Dunbar will enter the doubles competition.

Vermont placed ninth, fifth and 14th in the tournament during the last three years. Coach Marilyn Chase assessed Vermont's chances in this way, "It all depends on the draw. Hensel and Khachian are very capable players. If they get a half-decent draw, they should do well."

Racketmen Edge UConn

By Thomas Cianciolo

The University of Vermont men's tennis team remained cool under pressure to squeak past the University of Connecticut 5-4 last Tuesday afternoon in their final away match of the season, but showed little strength in the Yankee Conference Championships Friday morning.

In the UConn match, Peter Follet rallied to sneak by Ray Bahn of UConn by a 6-4, 7-6 score. Bill Hansen kept the momentum going by downing Steve Bloomquist easily by scores of 3-6, 6-1, 6-2.

But UConn suddenly came alive and dominated the later singles matches by soundly defeating Andy Deery, Kent Friedman and Frank Babbott in third, fourth, and fifth singles play matches respectively.

The Cats take on Yankee Conference Champion BU Tuesday Oct. 17 at UVM in their final contest of the fall season.

Racquetball Tourney Set

By Steve Larose

Top ranked racquetball pros from the eastern U.S. and Canada will converge on the Burlington Court Club for the second annual Oktoberfest Racquetball tournament to be held October 20, 21 and 22nd, sponsored by the Burlington Sheraton and Swisspot restaurant.

$1,000 in prize money and merchandise will be up for grabs during the three-day tournament slated to begin Friday at 4 and run through the finale competition on Sunday afternoon. There will be a full spectrum of divisions from senior to a special men's and ladies' Class C for beginners. Admission is free and refreshments will be provided.

Peter Hawks, manager of the Court Club, remarked that some of the top teaching pros will be participating, including Bruce Christensen, a 17-year-old newcomer to the sport who is setting the racquet world afire with his recent string of victories. Other big names include Ron Mirek, Ross Harvey, and Bill Silverman from Montreal. The Court Club's own former pro Paul Lazure will return to challenge for the prize money.

Hawks termed the tournament an equal to skiing's satellite tournaments, with their pro tour atmosphere. He also pointed out that the Court Club (on Farrell Drive in South Burlington) is equipped with exhibition courts which feature glass partitions so that spectators can virtually become part of the action. Hawks concluded by remarking, "We're providing a service to the racquetball pros by putting on a topflight tournament and generating a lot of excitement. It's also an opportunity for local residents to come out and get a feel for what racquetball is all about."

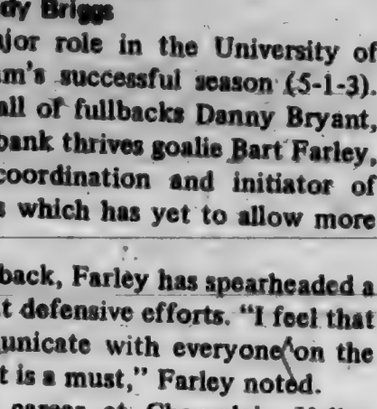
Bart Farley: The Backbone of UVM's Soccer Defense

By Randy Briggs

Defense has played a major role in the University of Vermont men's soccer team's successful season (5-1-3). Behind the looming stone wall of fullbacks Danny Bryant, Greg Bowering and Jack Milbank thrives goalie Bart Farley, the cornerstone of team coordination and initiator of Vermont's defensive prowess which has yet to allow more than one goal per game.



Playing the role of quarterback, Farley has spearheaded a string of outstanding Vermont defensive efforts. "I feel that it is important that I communicate with everyone on the field, and with the fullbacks it is a must," Farley noted.

Farley began his soccer career at Champlain Valley Union High School. In three of his four years of varsity soccer his team reached the Class L finals. Strangely enough, basketball was Farley's first love. It did not take long before soccer became his main sport. "In my freshman year I was playing JV soccer at the beginning of the season."

"CVU soccer coach Bremner then brought me up to varsity in that same year, and I started every game for the next three years," he recalled.

In Farley's first two years at Vermont he has compiled a long list of outstanding individual statistics. In eight games as a freshmen he allowed but 1.00 goal a game. As a sophomore he lowered that figure to a mere .77 goals a game.

"You're never too good to improve. If anyone says I'm the best, then I have nothing to strive for."
--Bart Farley

Despite his outstanding performances Farley felt intense pressure in every game. "I used to put a lot of pressure on myself," recalls Farley. "I felt it was my fault every time the other team scored. Now that I realize that everyone shares the blame or credit in a team game, I don't feel the pressure anymore."

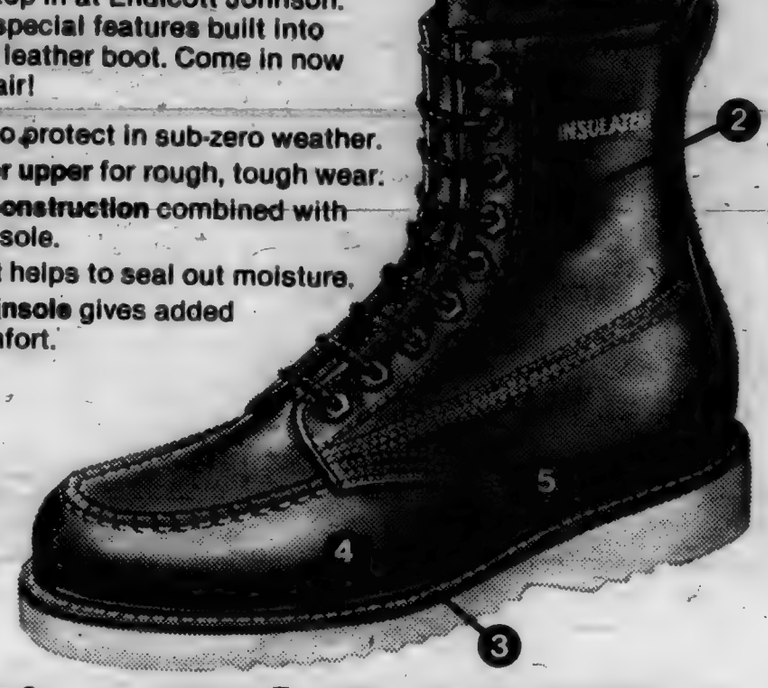
Farley has taken several steps to learn the finer points of goaltending. "I've read a lot of books on the subject; I've also watched other goalies in action. Talking with other goalies also helps a great deal. You know, you're never too good to improve. If anyone says I'm the best, then I have nothing to strive for." Farley also plays summer soccer in order to keep his game tuned up for the college schedule.

Farley knows his weaknesses as well as his strengths. "I need to work on my goal kicks as well as learning how to cover the 18-yard box better. This means cutting down the angle on break-aways and breaking up crossing passes." Farley added, "If you stand flat-footed while playing goalie you are in trouble."

The Vermont goaltender also remarked that concentration is the most important factor of the game. "As soon as the whistle blows, your mind has to be on the game." In testament to Farley's involvement in a soccer game, he noted that he can remember every goal that he has given up in college. He even conceded that he keeps notes on how the goal was scored and under what circumstances for future analysis.

In some soccer games the outcome is often decided by a bad bounce or a ball that was deflected accidentally into the goal. Farley has his own theory about what a goalie should expect. "Reading the flow of the game is the key to goaltending. After you see the play develop so many times in your mind, you often know what is going to happen. The more you play, the better your game becomes," Farley commented.

According to Farley, Vermont is playing more cautious soccer this year than last. They have been successful with this style and Farley notes the reason for success. "With the loss of Koerner, Greig and Christensen, we don't have the offensive punch that we had last year. We're well-balanced this year, so the opposition can not key on stopping one player. I've always believed that the key to a good offense is a good defense." Farley is not currently performing at peak levels, due to an injury. However, he cannot afford to rest, since Vermont has little backup goalie support.



Farley has high praise for this year's team. "The hustle and desire on the current team is just tremendous. We're a young team and we have no big scorer. We have to work hard in order to win every game. The injuries have hurt us,

Vermont Clubmen Tie for Fifth in ECAC Tourney

By Steven Larose

Tim O'Connell's two day score of 157 anchored the University of Vermont golf team's fifth place tie with Dartmouth in the ECAC finals held at the Essex Country Club in Manchester, Mass. last weekend.

Vermont's high finish came as a pleasant surprise to Vermont golf coach Ed Donnelly, who pointed out that this was the first year Vermont has competed in the ECAC finals as a team. Indiana–Penn won the tournament with a 610, Central Conn was second with a 619, Ramapo placed third with 624, Ganan came in fourth and Vermont tied with Dartmouth for fifth with a 638 score.

Steve Pcolar also spearheaded the Vermont effort along with O'Connell with a two-day score of 158. Hank Battles and Ted Olsen both had scores of 162 and Mike Dukette rounded out Vermont's effort with a 173.

"This has been one of our best seasons. Next year we will be without Ted Olsen, but our freshman Mike Dukette is blossoming into a top-notch golfer. He led the ECAC qualifying rounds and with the seasoning he got this year he will be in his prime next year," Donnelly concluded.

Olsen led the Vermont team after one day with a 77, followed by O'Connell's 78 and Pcolar's 80. Battles had a first-day score of 85. Donnelly also pointed out that Olsen and O'Connell were in the top ten golfers in the tournament after the first day.

Battles shot a 77 to lead Vermont on the second and final day. Pcolar had a 78 while O'Connell shot a 79 and Dukette had an 84.

Donnelly concluded, "We had some good golf. The scores were consistent and when you have all four men on the team averaging a 75, it's exceptional golf. They're good young golfers with some prior experience that is now paying dividends. It looks like a rosy future for golf at UVM."

STATE CHAMPIONSHIPS

Earlier in the week Vermont won the Goss Invitational State Golf Championships with a score of 391. Middlebury had a 434 and St. Michael's racked up a 439.

Steve Pcolar tied for medalist, but was defeated on the second hole of a sudden death playoff. Pcolar nevertheless led Vermont with a 75. Randy Miller surprised everyone by pulling off a 76. Ted Olsen racked up a 79 while Tim O'Connell shot an 80 and Hank Battles had an 81.

Coach Ed Donnelly later remarked that "Miller was impressive with his round of 76, along with Freshman Pete Kelly who shot an 81. All our youngsters are looking good and should be a welcome addition. We have a good nucleus for next year."

Hockey Women Whitewash McGill and Colby Sawyer

By Rich Chalmers

The University of Vermont women's field hockey team's impeccable defense proved to be the deciding factor as UVM blanked McGill 3-0 on Saturday and Colby-Sawyer 7-0 last Monday.

The key to Vermont's field hockey success lies in the combination of a quick, aggressive offense and a defense which is like a brick wall blocking other teams' scoring drives. "The defense is doing so well at keeping the ball away from the goal," commented UVM coach Janice Lange, "that our goalie rarely touches the ball."

The Catamounts confronted McGill on a rain-soaked astroturf field and dealt their opponents a 3-0 defeat. "We couldn't dribble or drive because there was so much water," explained Lange. "We just made short passes and dominated the whole game." Lisa Fernandez opened the scoring with a hard shot from the edge of the circle. Jean Gaudrea scored to make it 2-0, assisted by Linda Peabody before the end of the first half. Lisa Fernandez eluded the McGill goalie with a hard-hit corner shot to finish the scoring. When asked about the win, Coach Lange responded, "I thought it would be closer. We fought to a 0-0 tie in pre-season, but our attack and defense has improved considerably. If it had been a dry field where you could drive the ball effectively, it might have helped them. It was a really slow game. We overpowered them."

Both Linda Peabody and Mary Ellen Chickering connected for three goals apiece as UVM traveled to Colby Sawyer and came away with a 7-0 whitewash. Vermont's dominance showed clearly in the shots taken, UVM tallying 22 and Colby-Sawyer subdued to only two.

Chickering gathered the first three at 9:00, 12:15 and 15:00 minutes into the half. Peabody assisted the first goal, Fernandez the third. Diedre Morris tallied the fourth goal on an assist from Fernandez and Peabody scored her first of three at the 19:00 minute mark. UVM goalie Nancy Carpenter had two good saves.

Vermont continued to dominate in the second half but came away with fewer goals. Peabody shot in two before the game ended. Peabody is Vermont's leading scorer with a total of 14 goals.

Vermont now stands at 8-0-3 with 35 goals scored for and only five against. The Cats will lock horns with Middlebury on Friday which promises to be an exciting game. "We beat them 3-1 last time we played," said Lange. "But they have some excellent players and they're not going to give up this time. They're always a good team."

The J.V. squad will hold a game against Champlain College at 10:00 a.m. on Saturday at home.

Varsity Ice Hockey Tryouts

The Yankees: October's Heroes

By Rob Smith

God backs out of the batter's box. "Hold it, try to put one past me Mr. Welch." Welch completes his toss, readies his next lightning bolt, as October's Child gets set. The pitch is fired. God unleases his mightiest swing, and stands to watch the ball sail into the Pacific. California dreamin' is just that — when the money's there, so are the Yankees. New York always wins.

In a World Series which proved the Yankees have strength not only in Munson, Jackson, and Nettles, but in the likes of Bucky Dent, veteran Roy White and fill-in second baseman Brian Doyle, the Yanks repeated as World Champions winning four straight games after dropping the first two.

Nothing new you say. Steinbrenner bought the best players available in the league, thus they should win, right? Not so. This year the Yankees, after losing manager Billy Martin, pitchers Don Gullet and Andy Messersmith, infielder Willie Randolph and numerous other starters during the season, came from 14 games back in July to tie with Boston after 162 regular season games. After eliminating both Boston and Kansas City to get to the World Series, they were a weary and wounded team. Thurman Munson had a lump in his shoulder the size of a golf ball. Mickey Rivers was forced to sit out games two and four because of bad wheels and Chris Chambliss missed games two, five and six with a hand injury. Thus, with subs Paul Blair, Jim Spencer and Brian Doyle starting in place of Rivers, Chambliss and Randolph, the pin-striped Yanks hung tough and fought their way to the crown.

The series was a display of Yankee depth and consistency, as no one player continually was forced to carry the team. In game three, the Yankees switched the momentum as Craig Nettles turned three sure Dodger extra base hits into outs with the ease that only a Brooks Robinson could display. This game also marked the 16th time this year that Cy Young candidate Ron Guidry had led the Yankees to victory after a loss. In game four, a key non-scoring single in the 10th inning by "Sweet Lou" Pinella broke open a tie game and evened the series at two apiece. In game five, a nine hitter by surprise pitcher Jim Beattie along with 18 Yankee hits buried the Dodgers. And in game six, former Oakland Stars Jackson and Hunter combined with Brian Doyle and Bucky Dent's six hits (they had six apiece in the last two games) and superb defense to finish off the Dodgers in six games. In winning the last four games, the Yankees became the first team in history to win four straight World Series games after losing the first two.

The key ingredients of the Yankee comeback could fill up this whole newspaper. However, their continued balance of tough defense, clutch pitching, timely hitting and sheer desire were evident throughout the final four games.

On defense, the superb fielding of third-baseman Craig Nettles throughout the series, but especially in game three, continually turned Dodger threats into mere fantasy. It is no understatement that without Nettles' glove, the Yankees would have lost game three, been down three games to none, and be accepting losers' checks right now. The Yankee infield, believed by many to be suspect without the services of Willie Randolph, proved to be more than adequate. They turned over nine double plays to L.A.'s four, while commiting only two errors. As for the loss of Randolph, Yankee second basemen (Doyle and Stanley) were errorless. The Dodgers made several costly defensive mistakes in the series, in particular, Bill Russell's controversial throw off Jackson in game four and Joe Ferguson's dropped third strike and throw to first base in inning six of the sixth game. Ferguson's play allowed Pinella to get in scoring position and Doyle's subsequent single, combined with Ferguson dropping Rick Monday's perfect strike to the plate, gave the Yankees that ever so important insurance run.

As for pitching, complete games by Ron Guidry and Jim Beattie, along with outstanding relief help from Rich Gossage (in three appearances he pitched six innings, allowing no runs and only two hits) gave the Yanks the edge they needed in games three through six. One must not forget the gutsy effort turned in by old pro Catfish Hunter in game six, after being bombed for seven hits and four runs in his one inning appearance in game two. The Dodgers' two classiest hurlers, Bert Hoofen and Don Sutton, failed when needed most, although their ineffectiveness can be blamed somewhat on clutch Yankee hitting.

The Yankee hitting speaks for itself. Rivers .333, Munson .320 (seven RBIs), Jackson .391 (seven RBIs, two shots to the moon), White .333 (4 RBIs), Doyle .438 (two RBIs), and Series MVP Bucky Dent .416 (seven RBIs). The key to the Yankee attack was that they produced runs from all nine positions in the batting order whereas the Dodgers' most consistent hitting came from only Davey Lopez and Bill Russell. The heart of their order — Smith, Garvey, Cey,

Yankees Capture World Series

The New York Yankees won the sixth and final game of the World Series against the Los Angeles Dodgers 7-2 Tuesday night to give them a 4-2 series victory. A two-run homer by Reggie Jackson off relief pitcher Bob Welch in the seventh inning broke the game open for the Yankees.

The victory capped a four-game winning streak started by the Yankees in New York when they trailed the Dodgers two games to none. The Yankees are the first team in baseball history to win four World Series games in a row after losing the first two.

The playoff MVP award was given to New York's short stop Bucky Dent for his outstanding play during the series. Dent had a .416 batting average with seven RBI's.

Eagles First to Knock Off Redskins

The Philadelphia Eagles were the first team to bounce the Washington Redskins out of the unbeaten ranks with a 17-0 win over the Skins last Sunday. Philly runningback Wilbert Montgomery broke through the seasoned Redskin defense for 125 yards on 25 carries, his fourth game of the season in which he drove for 100 yards or more.

John Sanders intercepted a Joe Theisman pass and returned it for a touchdown to give the Eagles a 7-0 first quarter lead which proved to be the winning margin. Philly quarterback Ron Jaworski tallied 14 complete passes for 99 yards while Theisman connected for eight out of 21 for 163 yards.

"This was the one we've been looking for," said Eagles coach Dick Vermeil. The Redskins defeated Philadelphia 35-30 earlier in the season. The Eagles are now 4-3, the Redskins 6-1.

Colts' Jones Injured as Jets Romp

Quarterback Matt Robinson passed for 215 yards and two touchdowns to lead the New York Jets to a 33-10 victory over the Baltimore Colts Sunday. Colt quarterback Bert Jones bruised his right shoulder in the first quarter and was taken out of the game. It was Jones' first appearance since suffering a shoulder separation in the final exhibition game, also against the Jets. Jones, who completed five of six passes for 51 yards, may not have recovered in time for this Sunday's game against Denver. X-rays after the game showed the shoulder was badly bruised but not separated.

World Series

and Baker – produced only four runs in the final four games, and three of those runs came from a three-run Smith blast in game four. Thus, the lack of production by the Dodger guns, especially Garvey, was a key to the Yankee success in games two through four.

It is no surprise that Jackson, Munson, and Rivers hit with both power and consistency throughout the series, but the efforts of Doyle and Dent, who together collected 17 hits and provided nine RBIs from the number eight and nine spots in the lineup, represented the great team effort and desire exhibited by the Yanks throughout the series.

The Dodgers were obviously beaten after Nettles' infield robbery in game three and the Yankee come-from-behind 10th inning victory in game four. In games five and six their bats went silent (they scored only four runs) and their defense became erratic (four errors and two passed balls). Meanwhile, the Yankees racked up 17 runs and committed no errors in the final two games.

In winning the World Series, the 1978 Yankees completed what has to be one of baseball's greatest comeback stories ever. From July through October, they played like giant killers with a touch of class. The Yankees paid their dues in 78 and even if you don't like them, you've got to respect their accomplishments.

Bart Farley

but our desire has overcome any problems we have had. The freshmen have also contributed a lot to our success. It's a great feeling to be on a team like this," concluded Farley.

There is no question that Farley is on top of his game. Just recently he was named Yankee Conference Player of the Week for his 22 save 2-1 win over UMass and 16 save 3-0 triumph over Middlebury. In other contests he has made numerous acrobatic game saving stops. Against Keene State he stopped two point-blank shots in overtime to preserve a 1-1 tie. Even Farley acknowledges that this is the best he has ever played.

Farley has a number of goals that he hopes to accomplish in the future. "Before I graduate I want to win an NCAA first round playoff game. I also want to continue my soccer career by giving pro-soccer a shot."

If Farley continues to display this high level of defensive skill and team leadership, he may very well attain his goals.

L/LC Running Program To Publish Booklet

The Living/Learning Center Running Program plans to publish a booklet of running courses in the UVM area, including their mileage and difficulty. The program will also produce a slide show dealing with various aspects of running for the benefit of L/L and the community some time next Spring.

Members hope to participate in races and fun-runs throughout the school year. On November 5, members will attend the Harvest Race in Montpelier and next semester take part in a quarter, half, three-quarter, or a full marathon in Montreal in late March.

In the near future there will be a film by Dr. Sheehan called Coping with Life on the Run and next semester, The Marathon, a film from Runners' World Magazine, will also be held at L/L and will be open to the college community.

A series of six weekly workshops on the physical and psychological aspects of running is already in progress at L/L until Nov. 7. Everyone is invited to attend.

For more information concerning the Running Program, call x4269.

GSU Disco Dance

The UVM Gay Student Union will hold its second monthly Disco Dance, Friday, October 20 at 10 p.m. The dance will be held in Billings Round Room. Soda and chips will be served. Everyone is invited to attend. Donation is $1.00.

Grief Relief

The University Health Services has a new addition to its present facilities. Starting October 16th there will be a "Grief Relief" box for all comments and/or criticisms students have about the present UHS medical care. Please support this effort toward improving your satisfaction as a consumer of medical care.

What Is A Lilliput?

Lilliput Children's Programs is a volunteer, non-profit organization dedicated to bringing the finest in theatre to children in Chittenden County and surrounding areas. For over a decade, Lilliput has held a series of children's plays at Burlington High School Auditorium, bringing professional companies from New York and New England to present a variety of productions including fully staged musical comedies, mime, puppetry, historical drama, story and improvisational theatre. Lilliput also sponsors an in-school theatre program where professional companies travel throughout the area during school hours presenting a full range of theatrical experiences to children in grades K – 8 (this year the in-school program will be for high school age).

Lilliput's goals are to further an interest in and knowledge of theatre, to broaden opportunities for hearing and seeing the best in the performing arts, and to provide opportunities for personal involvement in the arts.

The in-school theatre program is supplemented by grants from the Vermont Council on the Arts only when Vermont artists are scheduled.

Lilliput uses box office receipts to fund performances for the next year. Last year we were one of the beneficiaries for the box office receipts from Lyric Theatre. This year some funding came from local businesses.

This week, Friday, Oct. 20, at 4 and 7 p.m. Emil and the Detectives is being presented at BHS auditorium. A series ticket for three shows is $4.50. Simple tickets are $2.50, purchased at the door or call 985-2367.

Craft Marketing

Middlebury – Noel Clark of National Crafts Ltd. in Gapland, Maryland will conduct a one-day workshop on craft marketing November 9 at the Frog Hollow Craft Center in Middlebury. The workshop is sponsored jointly by Craft Professionals and the Vermont State Craft Center at Frog Hollow.

Clark has coordinated several wholesale and retail craft fairs on the east coast which were widely attended by professional craftsmen. He will discuss such aspects of marketing as selling at fairs, advantages and disadvantages of being in business for yourself and how to develop new product ideas.

In addition, Clark will offer critiques of slides brought by workshop participants. Enrollment is limited to 30 professional craftsmen. The program will run from 10:00 a.m. – 4:00 p.m. with a fee of $5 for current Frog Hollow members and $6.50 for non-members.

To register for the workshop, send the full tuition to Frog Hollow Craft Center, Middlebury, VT 05753.

Lieutenant Gubenatorial Candidates Differ Sharply on Proposed Budget Ceiling

By John Letteri

Democrat Madeline Kunin, Republican Peter Smith, and Liberty Unionist Dashiel Barney, all candidates for Lt. Governor, debated the campaign issues at UVM's Simpson Dining Hall Monday night.

Kunin said her experience as a three term Vermont legislator and chairperson of the House Appropriations committee will make her the choice for lieutenant governor in November.

Kunin said that without prior legislative experience, a person cannot be expected to accurately or competently make the critical decisions necessary as lieutenant governor. "You can't ignore past achievements. The more you know, the more you understand, the more you can contribute," said Kunin.

Smith, who has never held an elected office higher than chairman of the Middlesex School Board, said he has "a lot to learn." But his experience as President of the Community College of Vermont necessitated spending a lot of time in and around the legislature, and Smith said he feels this satisfied his experiential needs. He does not see the value of the "pat" claim of his opponent that "I've been there" determines worth, but thinks people are looking for a candidate with a vision of what Vermont could be first, with specifics such as experience coming into play afterwards.

Kunin said visions are often interpreted as promises, and stressed the fact Smith had had no prior experience in the legislature. She said it was "impossible to ignore" experience in the political arena.

Ms. Barney claimed it was to her advantage she has never held an elected office. She said politicians need an outsider to remind them "this is the way the system is supposed to work" when they themselves go awry in decision-making.

If elected Kunin said she would be an independent lieutenant governor, but would still work productively with the governor. She is not running to become an "assistant governor or errand boxboy for the governor," but plans to assert her own point of view on the issues. She stressed she would not fall to the same fate as her precedessor, Republican T. Garry Buckley, by being so independent as to provoke confrontation and public indignation.

Responding to what he called an oblique reference by Kunin that he and Governor Snelling are running "as a team" with the same viewpoints on all the issues, Smith said he "shares a vision with Governor Snelling," but is "willing to stand up and fight for what he believes in," nonetheless.

Ms. Barney said the position of lieutenant governor is for "career politicians looking to forward their careers." She advocated being a person in an office, and not a "slick politician." Mrs. Barney, however, "is not so sure she would make a terrific lieutenant governor anyway."

ON THE UVM APPROPRIATION

Kunin said she could not make a commitment on the UVM appropriation until she had seen the entire budget. She said in the past UVM has never been treated as a state university by the legislature because of the difficult political situation presented by the large number of out-of-staters attending UVM. "When the legislators in Montpelier look at UVM, they ask 'where are the Vermonters?'," said Kunin. She cautioned those present at the debate that to ask for an increase in an appropriation as large as the $2.18 million the trustees are requesting in one fiscal year "should be looked at realistically."

Smith predicted UVM will get some of what they are asking for, but not all. He advocated an

UVM Security Attempts to Change with Shifting Campus Attitudes

By Sarah Bailey

"It's a thousand times better than it was ten years ago, but there are still things that I'd like to see changed," said Detective Richard Scott-Smith of the University of Vermont campus security.

Over the past decade, the image of campus security around the nation has shifted as campus demonstrations have lost momentum and people in uniform no longer were identified as an enemy.

Scott-Smith is optimistic about the role that security plays on campus. "The student attitude towards college has changed – they're here to study, to work, and not so much to party. The incidents of eight and ten years ago had a drastic effect on campus security. They were not willing to try to understand students – if they had been, a lot of things might have been different. You won't get many people to admit that, however."

At UVM, campus security personnel must have either a law enforcement background, or two years of college. "We prefer both," explained Scott-Smith. "It's hard to use just the law enforcement background on a college campus. Without a knowledge of the college scene, there is a real lack of understanding."

UVM also requires a 50-hour "indoctrination" in civil liabilities and other specifics that affect a college situation. "It takes a while to change their attitude (from other forms of law enforcement)," said Scott-Smith. "In a city it's reaction after an event, while here it's more prevention or service-oriented."

All of the security on campus are deputy sheriffs and have the same rights as any Burlington officer or any county sheriff. "However, we have a verbal agreement with the city and the sheriff that we limit our jurisdiction to the campus property," said Scott-Smith.

Firearms are carried only for cash escorts, explained Scott-Smith, such as the money received from the tickets for a concert. "Hopefully we'll never have to carry them on a regular basis. We have two good police services in the area who can respond to a call at least as fast as we can."

The average age of the security staff is between 27 and 30, but it actually ranges over a wider span. The security force is also comprised of older people and students. UVM can often be considered a training ground for local police because between July and September 6-8 people are lost to local law enforcement agencies. However, students who work part-time on the force often end up staying permanently after they graduate.

The security receive benefits aside from their salary, such as free tuition for any of their children who attend the university. Its format has changed drastically from 1972 when it was merely a watchman service. "We had a lot of older guards then," said Scott-Smith, "and their attitude was often that of 'damn college students.' Our involvement with the work-study program really helped. It made people realize that we're just trying to do a job."

"people in uniform no longer were considered an enemy."

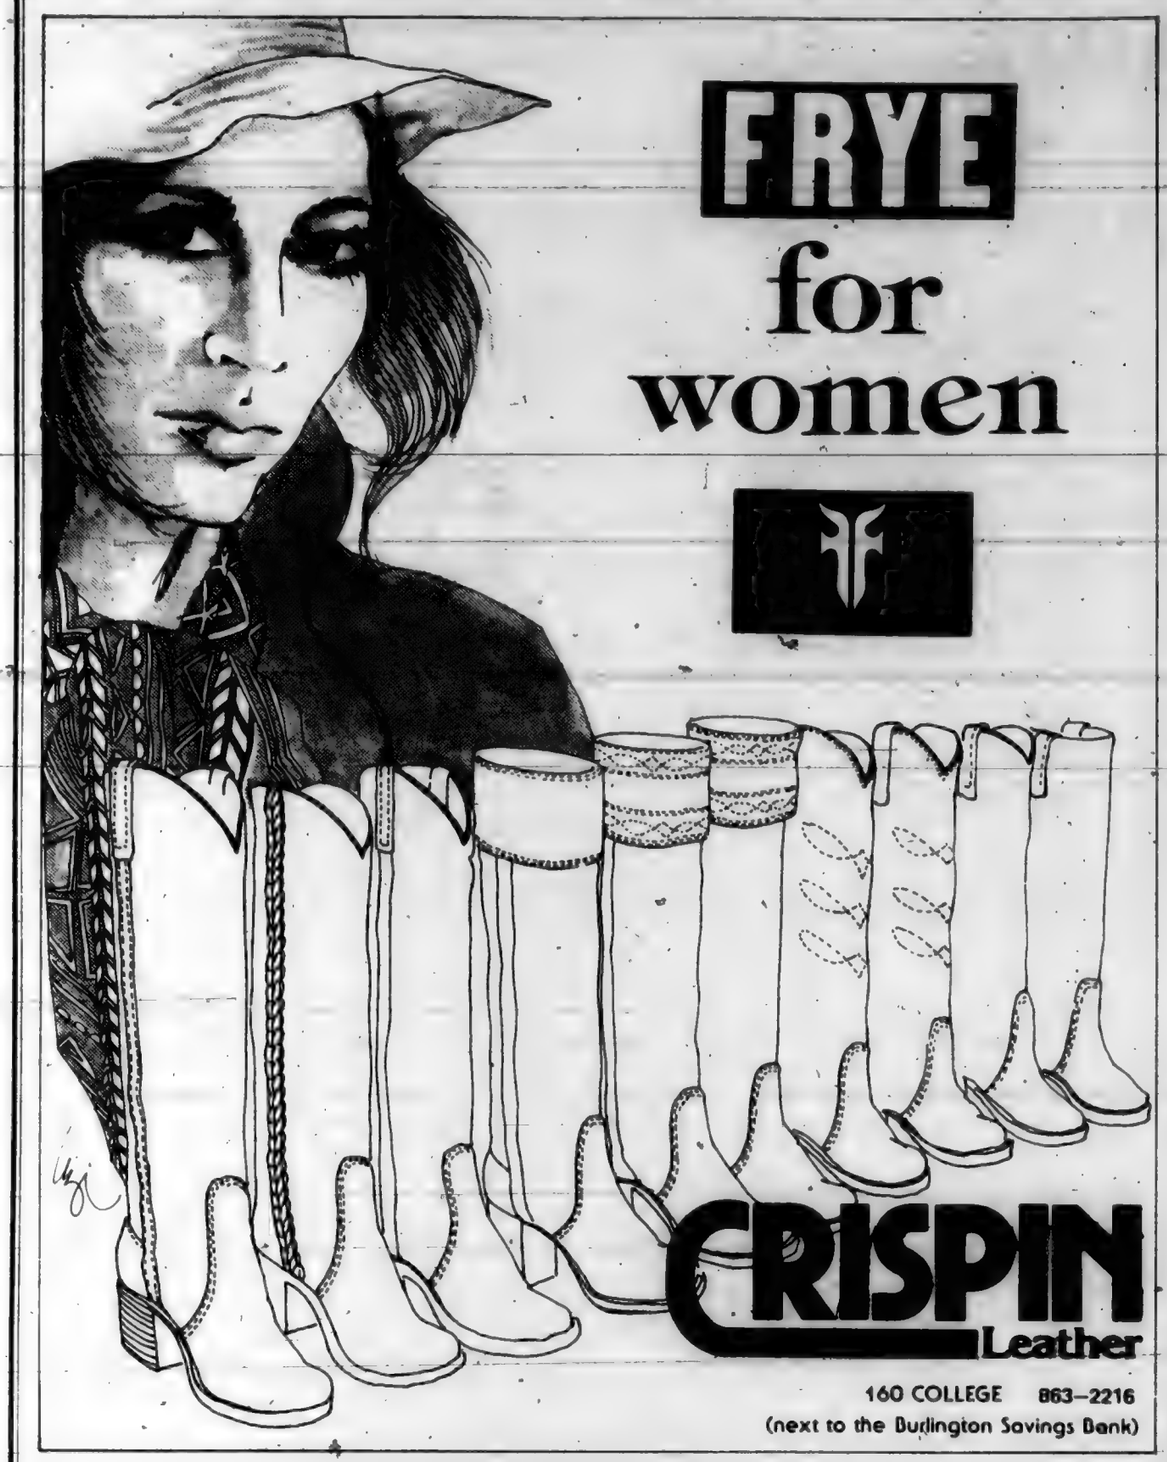
"There are still things I'd like to see changed." Photo by Liz Dunn

When asked what the biggest problems on campus were, Scott-Smith cited thefts in the dorms. Things such as stereos, cameras and wallets are most commonly taken items. "We've cut the problem down some by having uniformed guards in the dorms from 8:00 at night to 4:00 in the morning," he said.

According to Scott-Smith, rapes have not been a problem this year; five were reported last year, but this year only a few 'grabbings' have been noted.

"We've tried to set up programs and more light on heavily traveled paths, but girls are allowing themselves to be isolated. Lights really don't deter people that much."



UVM appears to get along well with the city of Burlington, according to Scott-Smith. "Naturally they were a little upset with the incident after exams last year, but we can't do too much about it, and it's going to happen again."

A complaint commonly heard is that campus security don't get where they're wanted soon enough, or that there aren't enough people on the force. But Scott-Smith counters that they have "35 men running safety, security, and traffic, and a budget of $400,000. We don't really want to get larger either in number or in budget; the students are already paying for it, and we're effective enough

Ugandan Refugee to Speak on Amin Terrorism

Bishop in exile, Festo Kivengere from Uganda, will speak and lead a discussion about Uganda from 3–5 p.m. on Redstone campus in Christ Church, Presbyterian, Tuesday, October 31.

Bishop Kivengere recently escaped from Uganda following the arrest and death of Archbishop Janani Luwum in 1977. It has been estimated 50,000 other refugees are in exile from Uganda and the current government of President Idi Amin.

Uganda is roughly the size of the state of Oregon with a population of about 11 million. It was a British protectorate until gaining its independence in 1962. In 1966, the first president was deposed in a military coup by Milton Obote, who was in turn deposed by Idi Amin and his troops in 1971. Members of the two tribes who were loyal to Obote are now among those who are persecuted in Uganda by Amin.

Yet, Amin was first greeted with enthusiasm. When he first came to power, he promised free elections, released 55 to 60 political prisoners and encouraged all Ugandans to be faithful in worship at their church or mosque. Within three months, it was realized the military had gained extraordinary powers of arrest and instant execution of anyone seeming to endanger the regime.

In 1973, Amin announced over the radio that a number of men had been arrested for "subversive activities." The military tribunal had decided to hold public executions in different parts of the country, and each man was to be shot in his home community as a warning to others.

In 1974, Amin made statements against the church of Uganda. The economy of Uganda was getting to a desperate state, with both imports and exports nearly stopped. In 1977, the economy had not improved, and persecution of the church of Uganda continued. It is estimated today more than 50,000 Ugandans have been forced to flee from the Amin regime. International outcries against Amin have accused him of genocide.

Bishop Kivengere will be speaking on the problem of the Amin regime and the plight of the thousands of Ugandan refugees.

Future of Vermont Wetlands Focus of VAAS Conference

By Dr. Jerome L. Wyant

Pollution, resulting primarily from industrial waste, has taken an immense toll on America's lakes. In many cases, the damage incurred is irrevocable. For instance, Lake Erie is a vast, watery desert reeking from pollutants. While Vermont's lakes have escaped, for the most part, such tragic decadence, it has not been without difficulty. A case in point: Vermont's lawsuit against the International Paper for dumping pollutants, in violation of the law, into Lake Champlain.

Important ethical questions arising from these and other social and environmental concerns will be raised at the Fall Symposium of the Vermont Academy of Arts and Sciences on October 28th at the Radisson–Burlington Hotel – registration begins at 8:30 a.m. for the full day conference on Vermont's Wetlands and Lakes. Featuring Governor Richard A. Snelling as keynote speaker, the conference will also include presentations, with slides by a diverse group of expert speakers and panelists, ranging from professors in the biological sciences to environmental planners and conservation consultants.

Following Governor Snelling's keynote address, which might have considerable political impact on environmental policy, the audience will hear William Countryman, vice president of Aquatec, Inc. on "Wetlands: Their Definition and Classification" and Ben Henson, Professor of Zoology (UVM), on "Wetlands and Plant Nutrients." Professor of Biology, Gerhard K. Gruendling and Research Associate Justin Brande will follow with presentations entitled "Wetlands Mapping" and "Perceptions and Valuation of Wetlands" respectively.

After lunch and the VAAS annual meeting, the second session will commence with speakers Mr. Tony LeSauteneur

The Question of UVM's South African Investments

Students form Ad-hoc Committee

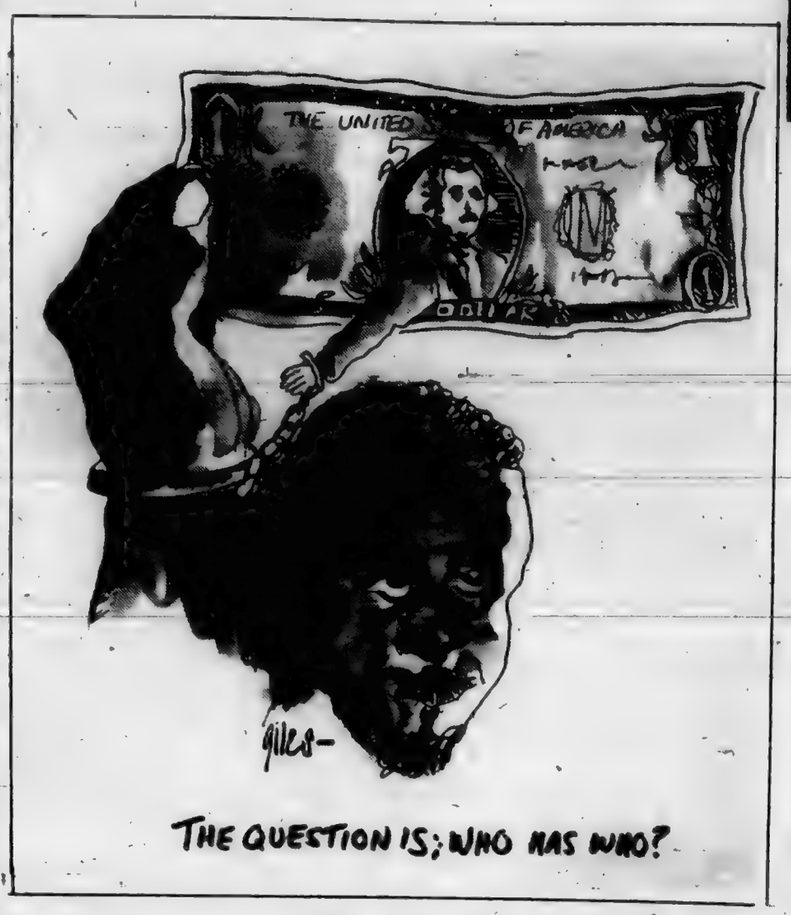
By Richard Hyland

The Student Committee Against Racism (SCAR), an ad hoc student movement, was spontaneously created last week at an informal meeting of students promoting greater awareness of UVM's 2.6 million dollar investment in businesses with holdings in South Africa.

The meeting, led by speakers Eric Kilburn, Phil Fiermonte and others, focused on the opposing moral and fiduciary positions inherent in UVM's investment policy and assessed the need for more information and student awareness before formulation or acceptance of a decision can be made. In creating SCAR, its founders believe, these aims of awareness and information will be achieved.

"Discussion of the issue is healthy for this university," said Kilburn. "It's not something like rape where 99.9% of the people are against it," he said. "Some people are on the other side."

The question of divestiture is very popular on the nation's campuses. Students at over 100 colleges including Harvard and Princeton Universities have voiced objections to their school's conflict between its moral responsibility as an institution of higher learning, and their policy of investing in businesses which are alleged by many to be supporting a racist regime in So. Africa.



Those present considered placement of the divestiture question on the agenda for the trustee's meeting of December 6th. As a long-range possibility, SCAR examined several approaches to heightening awareness of the complex issue.

Among some of the alternatives discussed were distribution of flyers distinguishing fact from fallacy about corporate investment in South Africa, an educational rally similar to that held prior to General Westmoreland's controversial lecture last year, and a debate featuring competent experts on the issue.

To bolster their campaign, SCAR said it would seek the support of several student organizations including the Student Association, the Cynic, the Women's Referral Center, the Minority Student Organization, and the Worldwide Suite at Living/Learning.

A study of other campus movements for divestiture was suggested as well as sending representatives to the Eastern Regional Meeting of Campus Representatives Against Apartheid in New York City on November 17-19. For the immediate future, a second meeting of the Student's Committee Against Racism was scheduled for Wednesday, October 25. The meeting will include a presentation of an authentic film depicting life under apartheid in So. Africa followed by a presentation by UVM Treasurer Gordon Patterson. A discussion will follow.

Asked about the rapid assembly and progression of the ad-hoc committee, chairman Phil Fiermonte commented that he was pleased with the way the initial meeting "showed a lot of support and organization. Already there has been an increased student awareness of this issue and this is, after all, our main goal."

THE QUESTION IS; WHO HAS WHO?

S.A. Senators Voice Their Opinions on the Issue

By Brooke Laffan

In a random survey conducted last week by the Cynic, Student Association Senators were asked to express their opinions on UVM's holdings in South Africa. Of the twenty contacted, nine favored complete divestiture, five were against, and six were undecided.

Presently, UVM has approximately 2.6 million dollars invested in corporations who operate in South Africa. Although blacks make up 73 percent of the population in that country, they have none of the rights of free individuals. Rather, white people control the government and earn over 70 percent of the wages.

The question facing the universities and colleges across the country is whether to continue investing in South Africa or to divest themselves of their interests there.

Those who promote divestiture say continued investments maintain a regime which oppresses black people by law. In contrast, those who favor keeping investments in South Africa say without U.S. corporate money, thousands of blacks would lose their jobs, and possible violent ramifications would result.

Of the five SA Senators who opposed divestment, three felt UVM funds should remain there to provide much needed employment for blacks. They said apartheid may be relieved through non-economic international pressures. Ray Bateman said that if UVM were to divest itself of South African holdings, then "we should divest ourselves of interests in all corporations with foreign operations." Brian Zechinelli, a second term senator, said to merely withdraw money from South Africa without alternative investment plans would be a "premature and rash decision."

Of the nine members who advocated divestiture, six felt the moral obligation in the decision was the overriding factor. Most viewed UVM's economic support of the South African regime as an outright sanction of apartheid practices. Others said UVM should be able to find somewhere else to invest, and were worried about exactly what the money UVM investments represent are being used for in South Africa.

Of the six who were undecided, five didn't feel they were qualified to make a judgment, because both the moral and economic issues have to be more closely examined. In addition, some of these simply didn't know about the South African situation.

Lake Champlain Fish Bill Signed by President

Washington — Legislation paving the way for restoration of salmon and trout fishing in Lake Champlain was signed into law by President Carter today.

Under the new law, Vermont will be able to compete with the coastal and Great Lakes states for funding under the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act. Potentially, Vermont could qualify for as much as $8 million over the next five years to construct a fish hatchery and take other steps for restoration of salmon, lake trout, and steelhead trout fishing in Lake Champlain.

The legislation was introduced in the House by U.S. Rep. James M. Jeffords, R-Vt., and passed by the House Sept. 25. Similar legislation, introduced by Sen. Robert T. Stafford, R—Vt., was adopted by the Senate.

"This is extremely important legislation for Vermonters, and for all of us who live in or near the Champlain Valley," Jeffords commented. "In the long run, it will create new sport and commercial fishing opportunities, and may aid in improving the overall environmental quality of the lake, one of our most valuable resources."

Noting the legislation had been initially opposed by the Carter Administration, Jeffords said he was "extremely pleased" that the President had agreed to sign the measure into law.

The states of Vermont and New York have been working since 1973 on a master plan to restore salmonoid fishing in the lake, to supplement the present fishing of rainbow trout, walleyes, northern pike, bass and bullhead. These efforts had been impeded, Jeffords said, because of inadequate funding and insufficient basic research.

The new legislation, Jeffords said, should make it possible to put the plan into effect.

THE VERMONT PUBLIC INTEREST RESEARCH GROUP

Saudek Receives Turtle from VPIRG

By Ann Seidenberg

Last week the Vermont Public Service Board (PSB) was the recipient of a symbolic gift from the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG).

In a ceremony at the PSB in Montpelier, VPIRG Director Barry Steinhardt and Assistant Director Charles Sheketoff presented PSB Chairman Richard Saudek with a gift wrapped box containing a live turtle.

Saudek abruptly left his office, refusing to accept the turtle or the accompanying poem, entitled "Ode to the PSB."

According to Steinhardt, "He (the turtle) symbolizes the torpidity with which the PSB makes decisions on major cases."

The 16-month-old Central Vermont Public Service Corp. rate case helped provoke the advent of PSB the turtle. An 18.7 percent rate hike was requested by the state's largest utility and filed with the PSB in June, 1977.

In December 1977, a temporary increase automatically went into effect when the PSB failed to decide the case within the six-month time period required by Vermont law.

This allows the utility to collect two-thirds of its originally requested 18.7 percent increase while the case is pending. It is still pending today.

Saudek explained the board's "torpidity" by citing a need to be thorough in gathering and interpreting the facts surrounding the case. "We are concerned that we write an opinion that will stand up," he reportedly said.

He compared the Central Vermont rate case with the New England Telephone Company case which was pending for more than two years when it was appealed to the state Supreme Court. Parts of the case were returned by the high court to the PSB for further hearings. Saudek said that the PSB hopes to avoid a repeat of the telephone company case with the CV rate case.

In discussing the appearance of PSB the turtle, Saudek blasted VPIRG for staging "an inappropriate media event," and having "a genius for a simplistic analysis of difficult issues."

He also reportedly charged the consumer group with trying to "introduce a Connecticut turtle (the turtle came from Connecticut) to the Vermont turtle population."

"It probably has been swimming in polluted water," he said.

Steinhardt expressed disappointment in Saudek's apparent inability to appreciate the humor surrounding the incident. He also noted that "because of the PSB's reaction to the turtle, we felt it was no longer appropriate to force it to bear the PSB's name, so we (VPIRG) are holding a "rename the turtle" contest.

Did the Christian World Condone the Holocaust?

By India Guadalupe

The slaughter of innocent Jews by the Third Reich was condoned by the Christian world, said John S. Conway, history professor at the University of British Columbia, during a speech at Benedict Auditorium last Thursday night.

Conway, who was the second speaker for the Vermont Seminar Holocaust Series, said the years of the Holocaust present a "somber picture of a failure of humanity relieved only by few occasions of courage, understanding and charity." Many people believe the church had more powers before than it does now and could have done something about the killings. But the fact is, as Conway said, the Holocaust took place in the heartland of Christendom, where everyone was professing Christianity.

The noted historian said that the willing condoning of the persecution and killings of the Jews by the Christian world calls for the examination of the roots of Christian anti-Semitism. He said that Christian anti-Semitism derived from centuries of deeply entrenched dogmatic hostilities which caused the systematic attempt to belittle the Jews and to teach the Christians to despise and reject them. This teaching of disrespect and worthlessness of the Jewish people has led the Christians to look at the Jewish people from a "sound-proof room," said Conway.

Also, since the Jewish people rejected Christ as their savior, they exacerbated the anti-Semitic attitude of Christians. Christ was rejected by his own people but found a willing audience amongst the gentiles who aided the opening of the Gentile mission and the destruction of Judaism in the year 1817. The Jewish faith became invalid from then on, said Conway.

Conway did not go into the Christian intolerance and persecution of the Jewish people because he believed they did not need to be recapitulated. He stated that the most popular feature of Jewish persecution was the accusation by the Christian Church of ritual murdering of Christian children which continues to flourish in central Europe even to the present century. Christians also placed religious sanctions against contamination by Jewish unbelief that were zealously preached from the pulpit especially by the Roman Catholic Church, century after century, said Conway.

The professor said the Holocaust is regarded as the culmination of 16 centuries of Christian intolerance. Some critics believe that the extermination of the Jews was an unfortunate crime or a dreadful accident of history unrelated to the cultural and religious past of Western society. There are also those who believe that Hitler and his associates were a unique bunch of crooks who gained power and inflicted their evil purposes and manipulated the new-found technology of the totalitarian state.

Conway said the Protestant theology gave a different, but possibly no less insidious bias versus the Jews, particularly the superstitious theory also known as the displacement theory. This theory leads people to believe the Christians inherited the promises of God and that they took over from the superseded Israel. He said "the new people of God were substituted for the old." Jesus was then proclaimed the sole mediator without whom salvation was impossible. The liberal protestants were easily led to regard the Jewish faith as nothing more than a "fossilized relic."

The end of the 19th century brought about many changes in the intellectual and social environment. It caused the Catholic Churches to lose their power. The Protestant losses were less visible but no less serious. The bitter criticism led to widespread abandonment of the orthodox and protestant beliefs. In its place came the search of anthropology, man and his origins in place of the book

Literature and History Discussed

By Stacey Cushner

"In the course of these years, more than five million people were killed, approximately one third of all world Jewry," said UVM Professor Raul Hilberg about the Holocaust when speaking as part of the "Return to the Classrooms" lecture series held over Oktoberfest weekend.

Hilberg, an international authority on the Holocaust, proclaimed the "Holocaust" is designated as the 12-year relentless destruction process pursued by the Germans against the Jews of Europe between 1933-1945.

The author of "The Destruction of European Jews" said the Holocaust was bureaucratically carried out. Certain ministries of the German government specialized in Jewish matters. These ministries employed engineers, doctors, and lawyers who applied their expertise at the appropriate area and at the right moment. Everyone capable "would do his bit to assure the final result," said Hilberg.

Questions, seemingly trivial, arise out of thi rocess, but are of the utmost in portance, said Hilberg. For example, "Who was responsible for payment to transport operators, transports carring Jews to their death?" Hilberg also discussed the Jewish Warsaw ghettos, and the financial arrangements there.

UVM English professor Samuel Bogorad, who co-sponsored the Vermont Seminar series on the Holocaust with Hilberg, addressed the audience on the literature of the Holocaust era.

"How does one speak of the unspeakable?" asked Bogorad. The literature of the period "cannot be defined by our usual classifications... the nature of the event rules out the critical perspective." Each writer, critic, and reader must develop their own perspective on these writings, said Bogorad.

Bogorad cited the text of Eli Wiesel's latest book as showing the inherent contradiction in trying to write of the Holocaust. Wiesel says "ask any survivor (of Auschwitz) and he will tell you that it was easier to imagine yourself free... than to imagine yourself a prisoner." Therefore, said Wiesel, whoever has not lived through the event can never know what it was like, and whoever has lived through it can never reveal it to others.

Professor Raul Hilberg

Holocaust writings, however, serve to commemorate the dead, satisfy a desire for revenge, a personal need to dissolve a guilt that all feel, and to warn the rest of humanity that genocide was the humble fact of the Holocaust, said Bogorad.

Most importantly, said Bogorad, the Holocaust literature was written because of the need to bear witness so that the acts of atrocity would never happen again.

Trustee Seminars November 2

By Peter Vanderbilt

Student Trustee Seminars — The first of a series of required meetings for persons interested in filling the opening student trustee position will take place on Thursday, November 2nd at 7:30 p.m. in the Marsh Lounge of the Billings Student Center. This seminar will feature Dean of Students Keith Miser discussing the position of the student trustee, and the structure of the university in general. There will be four required seminars taking place on Thursdays throughout the month of November.

The student trustee position is a two-year commitment and all students at the University of Vermont are eligible. We urge anyone who is interested to attend these seminars.

Vermont House Candidates to Debate — Torrey Carpenter (Republican), Tom Daniels (Democrat), David Mitiguy (Democrat), and Ted Rieble (Republican), candidates for the two seats in the State House of Representatives for Burlington District 4-9, will debate at 8:00 p.m. on Thursday, November 2nd, in the W-D-W Lounge on the Redstone campus Burlington District 4-9 includes the area between South Prospect St. and St. Paul St. from Main St. South to the city limits, as well as the Redstone Campus. All students and other persons living in this district might do well to attend this debate, which will consist of a forum with a panel of student questioners, followed by a question and answer session with the audience.

Vermont Council to Visit UVM. Host Students Needed — The Vermont Council, a group of Vermont citizens from all walks of life headed by Louise Swainbank (who is also Chairman of the UVM Board of Trustees), was set up in order to advise the university of the needs and concerns of Vermonters. They will be visiting the university on November 9th, and host students will be needed to show them the sights on campus. Any interested students should call the Student Association at 656-2053.

S.A. Committee Chairpersons — The chairpersons of the Communications Committee, Special Affairs Committee, and the Student Action Committee are as follows: Communications — Henry Chamberlain; Special Affairs — Peter Riegelman or Holly Zecker; Student Activities — Jesse Gadson. The other committee chairmanships are constitutionally appointed, with the Finance Committee chaired by Treasurer John Myers, and the Student Action Committee chaired by Vice President Missy Burke.

Applications for Academic Honesty Panel Being Accepted — The Special Affairs Committee of the S.A. Senate is accepting applications for the student positions on the University Hearing Panel. Students accepted will become part of a pool from which student members of the University Hearing Panel are selected and will serve two year terms. The University Hearing Panel is to be made up of three senior faculty and two student members, and will hear charges of Academic Dishonesty brought against students. Applications are available at the Student Association Office and are due on Friday, October 27.

Notice to S.A. Clubs and Organizations from the Treasurer's Office. Any club or organization treasurer who has not taken the treasurer's quiz should come to the S.A. office and take the quiz as soon as possible. No money may be withdrawn from S.A. funded accounts until this quiz has been passed by said treasurers.

Also, the UVM Family Associates gift applications for clubs and organizations are available in the mailboxes in the Student Association office.

On top of all this, any club or organization wishing to address the S.A. Finance Committee should plan on seeing John Myers, S.A. Treasurer, before the committee meetings for scheduling and/or advising. The Finance Committee holds its meetings every Wednesday at 5:00 p.m. in Conference room "C" in Billings Student Center.

Other S.A. Committee Meeting Times — Student Activities Committee holds meetings Wednesday afternoons at 3:10 in conference room "C". Communications Committee has tentatively scheduled its meetings for Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m. in the S.A. office.

If you have any questions or problems that may pertain to S.A., please feel free to stop in at the office or give us a call at 656-2053.

of Genesis.

Born in London, England, Conway completed his graduate work at St. John's College in Cambridge, England, receiving his Ph.D. in history in 1956. An expert in both German history and international relations, Conway is the author of The Nazi Persecution of the Churches and has been active in both the Canadian Institute of International Affairs and the United Nations Association of Canada.

Besides serving as director of the Canadian Council for International Cooperation, he is also a member of the Canadian Historical Association and Historical Association of London. A respected scholar in the field, Conway has lectured worldwide on the subject of "Nazi Policies for Church and State."

increased student awareness to the wealth of financial aid programs available on the state and federal level as a possible aid to the plight of ever-increasing tuition.

"I don't see why everyone in this state who wants to go to school shouldn't be able to," said Ms. Barney. She does not understand the reason for the discussion of the appropriation because, in her opinion, "everyone should be able to go for free."

ON LIMITING STATE SPENDING

Smith said in his travels around the state, the most frequent complaint he has heard is government is growing too large and spending too much money. He advocated a four to six percent ceiling on state budget growth per year. Each program in the state would not be confined to such a ceiling, said Smith. Some programs would be able to increase their budgets by more than the ceiling, while others would be held to far less than the ceiling limit.

Mrs. Kunin rejected the idea, saying to put a ceiling on the budget would become a goal, and result in an increase in the budget beyond what would normally occur without it. She said legislators would automatically be able to allow program budgets to inflate by four percent per year. She favors considering each appropriation request on its own merits, and grant the request on the basis of that merit. Mrs. Kunin said programs should be scrutinized each year to see if they deserve their appropriation request.

ON TAX CUTS

All three candidates were in favor of some sort of tax relief. Mrs. Kunin said she favored the repeal of the sales tax on clothing and medicine, increased use of the land use tax, advantageous to farmers, and property tax relief programs which provide government subsidies to those who are unable to bear the full brunt of their property tax.

Smith was not specific as to where he would make his tax cuts, but said he would consider making tax cuts only after all the money in the general fund is accounted for and the effect of federal tax cuts are approximated.

Mrs. Barney favors giving all the money back to the people. She made mention of the budget surplus, and said there should not be one since the money originally came from the people, and should be given back to them.

The three candidates were in general agreement on the issues of development, which they thought should be balanced with environmental concerns, and the needs of the state; on nuclear power, which all three opposed and felt alternative sources, such as wood, should be exploited and researched; and on agriculture, where they agreed to promote farming through federal grant programs, land use taxes, and low interest loans.

In her closing statement, Dashiel Barney said all people should be treated equally by government, and finds campaign expenditures and TV commercials insulting and offensive. She said she hopes the next lieutenant governor will be more sensitive to the needs of the poor people of Vermont, and not just the furthering of their own political careers.

Mrs. Kunin spoke of her experience and pointed out what she felt is a contradiction in Mr. Smith's ideology. She said Mr. Smith has called for limiting state spending at the same time he wants to increase aid to higher education, and bolster community development through increased state funding. She said "you cannot just make blanket statements and apply them everywhere." She attacked Mr. Smith for relying so heavily on his experience at the Community College of Vermont for the credibility of his candidacy. She pointed out that from 1974 to 1977, the Community College of Vermont's budget rose over 800 percent, and in three of those six years, operated at a deficit. In 1977, the deficit was nearly $200,000.

Mr. Smith retaliated by saying he will offer a fresh approach to state government, and that the Community College deficit was the result of things "largely out of his control." He expressed his disappointment at seeing the campaign take a "nitty gritty turn" toward personal attacks. Yet, he intimated in his closing arguments that Mrs. Kunin had voted for a one percent increase in the sales tax in 1975, as a blemish on her record.

now as we are. I would like to see some new equipment put in – new fire and intrusion alarms and maybe some close-circuit surveillence."

Another frequent complaint is that a security officer hassles students or is rude to them. When asked how often this occurred, Scott-Smith replied, "Occasionally."

"I'd like to upgrade our people so all of them have a college degree," he continued. "The younger ones do, but the older men do not. It really makes a difference."

The average day consists of a great deal of routine, locking and unlocking doors, a job formerly a custodial service. In addition, they handle eight cash escorts a day. "We don't have too many problems with special events such as concerts, because we tend to think ahead. If we have enough people on hand, there's usually no fuss." Burlington police are usually hired for outside the concert hall, and the rest of the extra force is usually students.

More Money for College Students

Federal officials say that tney may be able to make interest free loans available to all college students, regardless of their families' financial income or wealth, in time for the spring semester.

One million students now borrow up to $2,500 a year for undergraduate work, and $5,000 for graduate and professional studies. Most of these are from families with an annual income under $15,000.

A law Congress passed in its final hours in lieu of tuition tax credits threw out the income eligibility level for these loans.

The law will also make B.E.O.G.'s of $200 to about $1000 to students with incomes between $15,000 and approximately $26,000 for the first time ever. Low income students will be eligible for up to $1800.

Peace Treaty Headed for Approval

Despite Egyptian officials' request for a clarification of some technical points, the proposed Egyptian/Israeli Peace Treaty appears headed for approval in Cairo. The Israeli cabinet approved a draft of the agreement. Wednesday. The major point in contention surrounds the linkage of the peace accord to the Palestinian situation on the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The peace treaty and Palestinian question were dealt with in two different accords at Camp David in September.

Will There Be a Sunday Times?

Officials of the New York Times and the Daily News apparently anticipating a settlement to an 11-week-old strike, said Monday they were preparing for a Sunday publication.

While intense bargaining was taking place, officials, who asked not to be named, said the Times may even get a Saturday edition of stories already prepared on major events that occurred throughout the walkout.

It is believed that the striking pressmen had submitted a new proposal to New York's two big, influential newspapers.

However, as negotiators spoke with a private labor mediator, threats of strike surfaced against the afternoon Post, which resumed publications three weeks ago and plans a morning paper.

Bargaining subcommittees were formed after a morning session with mediator Theodore W. Khell by officials of the Daily News, representatives of Printing Pressmen's Union Local No. 2, and the Times.

Peace Treaty

A peace treaty between Japan and China was signed Monday. This formally ends four decades of hostility between two Asian powers and brings the world's most populous nation and the third richest closer together than ever before.

Chinese Vice Premier Teng Hsiao-ping and Japanese Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda witnessed the ratification of documents in a 30-minute ceremony.

When the ceremony drew to a close, Teng was received by Emperor Hirohito, than talked for 90 minutes with Fukuda.

Teng said he understood Japan's need to be tied militarily to the United States but criticized U.S. moves toward detente with the Soviet Union, warning that the Russians are building their nuclear capability.

Southern California Struck by Fire

Los Angeles was surrounded on several sides by erratic sieges of wild fire that were being driven by swift desert winds. Fire destroyed several expensive Trancas Canyon homes, endangered hundreds of others and forced the evacuation of more than 1,500 people.

Two firefighting helicopters crashed while battling one fire, no injuries were reported.

One blaze charred through a 6,000 acre piece from suburban Agoura 10 miles south across the tinder-dry Santa Monica Mountains to Malibu on the Pacific Ocean, where it was expected to burn itself out.

Trancas Canyon was spotted with 100 foot high tunnels of flame leapfrogging from ridge to ridge fanned by the Santa Ana winds.

Approximately 15 miles to the east in Mandeville Canyon near West Los Angeles, another brush fire destroyed at least two homes valued at more than $200,000 each.

The residents of the Canyon frantically hosed down their roofs before packing their belongings into their cars and fleeing down narrow canyon roads.

U.S. Fencing out Mexicans

The Carter administration plans to build 12 additional miles of fences along the Mexican border. Some Mexican-American groups are referring to this as the "Berlin Wall."

At both El Paso, Texas and San Ysidro, California, fences are being constructed to reduce illegal immigration.

A league spokesman added that the fences are the "manifestations of the prejudice and hate people in this country have against Mexicans and thus Mexican Americans."

UFO's Sighted

In the skies of West Virginia this past weekend there were bright objects that were observed by residents, policemen, and were picked up on radar screens.

A state policeman, Captain Don Sharpe, said that he and several other officers watched seven objects for about 30 minutes Friday evening.

One of the officers tried to take color photographs, but the results were less than satisfactory.

In one county alone over 30 sightings were reported of slow-moving objects that displayed green, blue, white and sometimes red or yellow lights. Most reports indicated at least three objects traveling together.

An airport control tower supervisor, and a director of a National Radio Astronomy Observatory, said that the weather conditions were more than likely the cause of all the strange sightings.

Republican Party Buys T.V. Air Time

Republicans announced Monday that they will sponsor national television spots accusing the Democratic Congress of big spending and not pursuing the truth about South Korean influence-buying.

The National Republican Congressional Committee announced that one of the four advertisements run will say that every congressman suspected of taking South Korean money should have been questioned under oath.

The other three deal with the accusation that the Democratic Congress is fueling inflation with big spending and of not controlling bureaucracy.

The committee is spending about $820,000 for spots on CBS and ABC, said Vander Jogt. NBC didn't have any desirable times available that the Republicans wanted.

Canadian Mail Still Not Moving

The Canadian postal strike goes on despite continuing attempts to stop it. The leader of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers walked out of a meeting Monday that lasted only 26 minutes and said they planned to continue the walkout.

According to Union President Jean-Claude Parrot, the meeting did not go well.

Parrot went to the meeting with Acting Labor Minister Andre Quellet prepared to make proposals and counter-proposals.

Panama Piled with Garbage

Along the streets of Panama City are six-foot piles of garbage heaped like small mountains. Sanitation men and teachers are striking and have made no moves to end their strikes against the 13-day-old government.

President Aristides Royo was elected on October 11th, the day primary and secondary school teachers struck. Sanitation workers walked out a week ago.

Mothers fear that if classes are not reopened soon their children will not be able to pass exams to advance to higher grades.

Carter on the Move

President Carter will be in Buffalo, N.Y. briefly on Saturday Oct. 28 to aid the campaign for Gov. Hugh Carey and other New York democratic candidates, the White House announced Monday.

In addition to Buffalo, the president will also be stopping in Hartford, Conn., Lynn, Mass., and Portland, Maine on his one day campaign trip.

Soviet Physicist Leaves Russia

A Soviet physicist, Dr. Benjamin Levich, who applied to emigrate to Israel nearly seven years ago, was told Tuesday he may leave Russia.

Scientists throughout the world and others including Senator Edward M. Kennedy, D—Mass, interceded on behalf of Levich and 17 other Jews seeking to get an exit visa granted.

Legionnaire's in Tucson

Officials at Tucson Medical Center said the first death due to Legionnaire's disease was confirmed Monday.

A man who died there July 28th was Arizona's first victim of the fatal disease.

After analyzing a tissue sample from the man's body, the U.S. Center for Disease Control at Atlanta said in a prepared statement that they had confirmed the cause of death.

Five days after being admitted to the Hospital John E. Spitz, 70-years-old, of Tucson, died, officials said. Spitz's case was diagnosed as acute pneumonia.

Legionnaire's disease is a form of bacterial pneumonia. Its name is derived from an American Legion Convention held in Philadelphis from which a large number of persons contracted the disease and more than 20 of them died.

Carter Confronts Inflation

In a nationally televised address on Tuesday, President Carter announced a series of economic guidelines to combat the nation's rising inflation rate.

In support of his essentially voluntary program, Carter's promises included the lowering of the federal deficit to $30 billion next year and a reduction in the number of federal employees.

In Our Own Self-Interest

If students become actively involved in Vermont politics, in-state tuition might stabilize, rather than continue its steady rise.

By Henry Chamberlain

The largest untapped resource at the University of Vermont is the student body. Despite the ever-increasing tuition rates which result from their legislators' minimal state appropriation to UVM, students do not take an active part in the election of their representatives. Undergraduate students are the school's greatest salespersons, as they are visible products of the school. If they become actively involved in Vermont politics, in-state tuition might stabilize, rather than continue its steady rise.

Vermont has two unique problems as it evaluates its ability to finance UVM. First, the state has a population of less than one-half of a million residents. A state that small has its task cut out for it to adequately support a school the size of UVM. However, Vermont also supports six other institutions to varying degrees. These state-supported schools include UVM, Castleton, Johnson State, and Vermont Technical College, to name a few. With seven schools vying for a limited amount of money, in a state with a modest economic foundation, the money is spread out instead of being effectively concentrated in a few select schools. Thus a major dilemma. How do you support seven different institutions without an adequate financial base?

One solution would be to consolidate the state system, so that fewer "state" schools could receive increased appropriations. While reducing the number of schools seems plausible, it is not possible to carry out. Each state school has its own unique qualities, which its respective constituency pushes through lobbying at the state house. Each school has a purpose and a body of people around it. Since they collectively comprise the state system, it is extremely hard to discriminate against certain schools when it comes to financing them.

What remains is the lobbying necessary to acquire all possible funding. In the fiscal year 1960-61, 27.4 percent of UVM's total budget came from the state. However, for the current fiscal year, only 18 percent of the total budget is being supplied. Over the eighteen years, UVM has slipped dramatically; its influence with the Vermont House is on the wane.

As a consequence of reduced state appropriations, UVM became increasingly constricted in its financial behavior. In the years 1970-78, while U.S. per capita personal income increased by some 13 percent, UVM faculty income declined by nine percent. UVM salaries were not able to remain at parity with the economy, nor with the salaries offered at other institutions around the country.

A school's life blood is its faculty. Without adequate salaries, the faculty begins to move on to better-paying jobs. It also becomes difficult to attract new personnel with salaries that are not competitive. One faculty member departs, followed by another, and so forth. The same is true of the administrators who direct the school. This erosion of the school's intellectual and administrative base has to stop if the quality of its service to the students is to be maintained, or ultimately improved.

Given this situation, attitudes towards UVM must be taken into account when evaluating candidates for state-wide office. Candidate's views on the environment, nuclear energy, farm relief, and taxes are also important considerations. But UVM has got to take advantage of its student resource, and work toward the election of candidates who are sympathetic to the financial plight of UVM.

With that in mind, candidates such as Edmund A. Bemis Jr., of the Liberty Union Party, and democrat Thomas L. Daniels should be endorsed when they support state appropriation of an additional $2.18 million, the amount requested by the board of trustees and President Lattie Coor.

Further, when democratic gubernatorial candidate Edwin Granai says he is in favor of increased funding for UVM and other state colleges, he is giving you a vague political statement which must be pursued to the advantage of UVM. Granai is for increased funding for the state-wide school system. Students should lobby for Vermont's only true state-wide institution, UVM. Governor Richard Snelling has not made a statement regarding an increase in money ear-marked for UVM. However, last year when the state amassed a sizeable state surplus, Governor Snelling allocated only $300,000 in additional funding, a figure that did not match the school's actual need.

Politics may be dry; candidates may be uninteresting. But UVM's institutional integrity, as well as the quality of its students' education, is at stake. The University of Vermont is the state-wide institution that serves the needs of all Vermonters. Students have got to lobby to insure that, in the future, UVM gets its fair share of the state's resources.

The Vanishing Hippie

By Eric Kilburn

While waiting my turn in a barbershop recently, I noticed a fellow customer reading a magazine, alternately shaking his head and sobbing. "It can't be true, it just can't be true," he repeated, tears welling in his eyes. Not accustomed to seeing such painful emotions in public, I leaned over to investigate.

"What's the matter?" I wondered.

"It's the hippies," he said. "They're disappearing."

"Oh come on now, I saw one just last week."

"Well, I didn't believe it either," he maintained. "But this article in Natural magazine quotes a Michigan researcher as saying that "unless present trends reverse, the United States hippie, freakus americanus will be virtually extinct by 1985."

"That's outrageous," I persisted. "Where does he get the data to back such a ridiculous prediction?"

"From none other than a study done by the U.S. Department of Wildlife, in cooperation with the FBI," he said. "Apparently this guy banded several thousand hippies in the late sixties and studied their migration patterns. He found that over half left for Canada between 1967 and 1973, and only a few have returned. Many of the others are now working in Manhattan or doing EST seminars in hopes of becoming corporate moguls."

He quoted a few more statistics, and in spite of my previous assertions, the truth of his argument gradually won me over. I wondered whether I could have been deceived by outward appearances, and asked if my companion had experiences anything similar. "All the time," he said. "I thought I saw a real hippie once — he was walking through a used car lot in California. The guy had all the proper qualifications: beads, old jeans, peyote buttons. Well, as it turned out, not only was I wrong, but he sold me a '63 Chevy."

"That's just an unfortunate individual case," I persisted. "Haven't the hippies been able to replenish their diminishing numbers with a new generation of Freakus americanus?"

"New generation?" he scoffed. "Where have you been the last few years? Can you call a long-haired macho wearing pre-washed Levis, drinking Heineken and trying to seduce a mascara'd maiden at Simga Nu a hippie?"

Gee, I thought. Is it that bad?

"And no one sings Bob Dylan songs anymore," he continued. "They're too busy learning the latest disco steps and memorizing facts for next week's business administration test."

By now he had worked himself into quite a frenzy, and I sought to calm him with a safer, more optimistic discussion topic. "But look at the military," I counseled. Even if the hippies are nearly gone, at least they've succeeded in abolishing the draft."

The effort failed abysmally.

"Don't feed me that line, man," he said. "Haven't you seen the ROTC recruiters on campus lately? In the old days, if just one sergeant showed up, you could get 100 people shouting "ROT-CEE, NAZI, ROT-CEE, NAZI" in four part harmony. Yesterday I saw a line of people waiting to sign up. They pay good money you know."

There seemed no end to his abject misery, and he let his long-damned-up sorrows cascade over my brow. What could I possibly say to brighten his spirit?

"Wait a minute! I know a genuine hippie," I remembered. "He lives halfway up a mountain in a teepee — no phone, no car, just simplicity and peace. We should go and visit him. Maybe he'll know what to do."

At first he was cynical and challenged bitterly, "Oh yeah, and I'll bet he's got a solar-powered hairdryer and a windmill to run his color TV."

It took several minutes of concise explanation to convince him I was sincere, but once the thought was

GRADUATING COLLEGE STUDENTS . . .

WHAT'S AN NSA CAREER?

Take the PQT and find out.

Graduates from a broad spectrum of academic disciplines may now enter challenging career training programs with the National Security Agency. If you are receiving a liberal arts, business, or mathematics degree before September 1979, the Professional Qualification Test (PQT) could be your first step toward employment in one of these programs.

You must register by November 4, 1978 in order to take the PQT on campus. It will not be given again during this school year. By scoring well on this test, you will qualify for an employment interview. During the interview, an NSA representative will discuss the specific role you might play in furthering this country's communications security or in producing vital foreign intelligence information.

The PQT helps to measure your potential for career areas such as:

PROGRAMMING — Our vast communications analysis projects could not be effectively managed without the latest computer hardware/software and people who know how to use them.

LANGUAGES — Foreign languages are valuable tools for research, analysis, and documentation projects. Advanced training in language (perhaps a new language) can be expected.

COMMUNICATIONS — Scientifically devised, tested, and managed cryptographic systems insure the maximum degree of security in transmitting sensitive information around the globe. Since cryptography is a unique pursuit, the training of new employees here is extensive and esoteric.

OTHER OPPORTUNITIES — A limited number of applicants will also be selected from the PQT to enter our Information Science, Logistics, Resource Management, Security, and Personnel fields.

PICK UP A PQT BULLETIN at your college placement office. It contains a registration form which you must mail prior to November 4 in order to take the test on November 18. There is no registration fee.

Electronic Engineering, Computer Science, Slavic, Mid-Eastern and Asian language majors and Mathematics majors at the Masters level may interview without taking the PQT.

U.S. Citizenship is mandatory. A thorough background investigation and medical examination are also required.

When was the last time you read about ndustrial development aiding, if not prompting, a successful archeological excavation? When was the last time you saw any part of Winooski being determined as eligible for the National Register of Historic Places?

It's not as fairy taleish as it seems. In fact, it came as no surprise at all to the Vermont Archeological Society (VAS) that a section along the Winooski River could be a haven of valuable artifacts left by what is believed to be numerous occupations of Aboriginal Indians from 100-800 A.D. And the plot leading up to the successful dig, like that of a Hemingway novel, fits together perfectly. For once, it seems, commercialism made an almost timely appearance.

The site, about a mile downstream from downtown Winooski, was originally discovered by former UVM student Bob Johnson in 1972. He was on the east bank when he noticed arrowheads and ceramic pieces in the soil. It was later determined to be a likely place for Indians to have settled upon: a flood plain with nice, fertile soil, and a slow-moving section of the river which would be good for fishing.

What was noticed, however, was that the Winooski River was eating up some of its history. The banks were eroding considerably each year, and the artifacts — many of them delicate pieces of pottery or subtle soil marks — were being washed away. Subsequently, the Burlington chapter of the VAS began intermittent excavation works that lasted through 1973.

HERE COME DA CARPET

Four years later, the site was again brought into focus, this time by the Winooski Community Development Corporation, who was beginning to see dollar signs along the previously ignored flood plain. They contracted the University of Vermont Department of Anthropology to survey south of what was then determined to be the archeological site. The spot was the proposed home of a carpet factory, and Winooski developers wanted to be sure they weren't going to pave over something important.

DON'T DIG TILL YOU HAVE TO

One might notice here, that archeological sites are treated somewhat precariously. Many remain untouched until their historic valuables are threatened. According to Jim Peterson, one of the recent excavation's field supervisors, archeology groups prefer it that way. "We basically want to find out where the information is first," he said, implying that other sites in this area may contain artifacts. And even as he was explaining this, a pair of enthusiasts entered the lab, eventually stating that they had found arrowheads in a certain section of Mallett's Bay.

ROOM TO MOVE

But when UVM made its preliminary testing — known as a Phase I survey — of the Winooski site in May of last year, it was indicated that the site was larger than originally expected, and that cultural resources would indeed be impacted by the carpet factory-to-be. This meant that work had to be done on the endangered ground, and without delay.

The first step was a second (Phase II) survey, which established tentative boundaries for the Winooski site. "What we wanted," said Peterson, "was to find out which specific areas should be saved, so the construction (of New England Carpet) could be done according to our plans."

It may seem surprising to hear of industrial planners so willing to allow a group of "lowly" archeologists to alter their construction plans, but it wasn't entirely as altruistic as that. The Winooski site was protected by what Peterson referred to as "laws called to play to preserve cultural grounds." These laws mandate that building done on such grounds must do as little damage as possible.

It was not, however, a case of commercialist-oriented planners grudgingly giving way to environmental-based litigation. "This project happened through the cooperation of New England Carpet, the Town of Winooski, the Federal Government, and ourselves (the Department of Anthropology)" said Peterson. "Everybody helped out a lot."

THE FEDS TOO?

The federal government did more than its share, according to Peterson. In fact, they became generally responsible for the excavation project (and most of its funding) when the Winooski site was deemed worthy for the National Register of Historic Places in January of 1978. Along with this honor came $37,000, which, when added to the donations supplied by UVM and the Town of Winooski, came to $45,000. It was a nice sum of money, but not enough, as planning errors and other problems plagued the archeologists so that they had to request more federal funds later on. The final amount came to $61,000, but as Peterson added, "We still didn't pay everybody enough."

The Winooski site became eligible for the National Register when it was determined that roughly five percent of the area would still be impacted by New England Carpet after planning adjustments. This damage would come in the form of a parking lot and a needed pipeline to the river.

TO THE DITCHES

The actual field work began, after some delay, in early July. The digging was done along an L-shaped corridor — about 6000 square meters of land — that marked the base of the foundation and the planned pipeline route.

With a limited amount of time, the 12-member field crew could hardly expect to run their fingers through every inch of dirt; so a process known as random sampling was implemented. Through this process, 65 one-by-two meter excavation ditches were plotted along even intervals like points on a graph. The amount of land sampled, after six weeks, represented about two percent of the total area under excavation. This was not a thorough enough investigation, however, the field crew decided, so more time and money were requested to allow further search through areas of "data-rich concentration," mostly on the river bank (which was not surprising, Peterson explained, as it is reasoned that most Indian activities occurred there).

The field work was done in teams of two. One would dig and the other would search the extracted soil through a process that Peterson referred to as "shovel shaving" which would screen off the layers of sand and silt and expose whatever else was left. When something delicate and valuable was at hand, a masonry trough and dust pan would be used to go through the dirt.

FORCES BEYOND THEIR CONTROL

The field crew was both helped and hindered by forces beyond their control.

To begin with, the L-shaped corridor being worked along had actually been carved out by a bulldozer, which Peterson said had both useful and destructive effects. "The bulldozer," he said, "did us some favors. It uncovered areas of red-stained soil (indicating the site of an ancient fireplace) as well as some pottery by removing the top layers of soil. On the other hand, most of the pottery in these layers was pulverized."

The "layers of soil" referred to here imply that — as in most flood plains — different layers of mud have been deposited vertically over time. This is useful, explained Peterson, not only as an indicator of geologic time, but also as a ready cover-all to protect many cultural artifacts.

Another unavoidable factor were the summertime visitors and armchair archeologists. Many of these people, whom Peterson referred to as "amateur pot-hunters" were more than a small nuisance. "Most times," he said, "they were unconscientious people who dug holes to find their own little goodies. I can understand their excitement, but they sure screwed up our records."

There were also those who would wander by, and upon learning of the money being spent on this project, would "offer their philosophies on government spending," said Peterson.

ARTIFACTS ON RECORD

The field work, having ended two weeks ago, has brought the excavation project to its final and foremost segment. "The record keeping is most important," said Peterson, "because if your records are good, you have a fair chance of accurately reconstructing past relationships."

Some of the artifacts will be sent to the government, but most of them are being worked on in the Anthropology lab in UVM's Williams Science Hall. Much of the processing is done through "flotation:" sifting the dirt through water, which uncovers many tiny but informational fragments, such as Butternuts and Hickory nuts, an Aboriginal delicacy. "They were eating loads of Hickory nuts," said Peterson. Bones and gills of fish have also been found, indicating that this was another food source.

Through flotating the soil, explained Peterson, it has been determined that some of the layers are chock-full of artifacts, while others are virtually barren. This supports the theory that more than one band of Aboriginal Indians made the shores of the Winooski their home.

Peterson himself speculates that a camp of 30-40 Indians were there between 100-200 A.D., while a larger group (300-400) habitated the land around 600-700 A.D. Both of these groups would fall roughly into the Middle Woodlands era of time.

Bits of Indian pottery were among the most rewarding discoveries, claimed Peterson. The Winooski site was blessed with some "unusually large pieces," he said. Many of these pieces fit together. The pottery is intricately decorated with

Why Vermont Hates Burlington

By Curtis Haynes

Q. What's green and goes backwards? A: Vermont!

Burlington — The Queen City of Vermont — a sprawling metropolis of 40,000 is the largest city in the state and not even the capital. Reclining on the shores of spectacular Lake Champlain with majestic views of the Adirondacks and Green Mountains, Burlington boasts as picturesque a setting as any postcard New England town.

Economically, Burlington is primarily a retail center and commands a 50 mile radius of devoted customers on either side of the lake. Industry seeking to move into Vermont looks at Chittenden County first and for good reason. Local schools and universities are among the state's best, and the Medical Center is one of the finest hospitals in the U.S. Consequently, Chittenden County, with Burlington as its hub, is the fastest growing county in the Northeast.

Compared to the rest of Vermont, Burlington is "where the action is," unless you can afford Stowe. Area universities bring in several cultural attractions (FADC, Oktoberfest, Lane Series, theatre, movies, and bodies). Chittenden County contains one-fourth of Vermont's population, and Burlington and its suburbs contribute more to the state coffers than the rest of Vermont combined.

Why then is Burlington the favorite whipping boy of rural Vermont?

"Burlington is the town that thinks it's a city, where it's bad taste to show off your good taste," quipped James Leopold, perennial gadfly of Woodstock. "Burlington is all bars, crime lights, and student apartments. It's a great place to be an alcoholic and chase women, but it's nowhere to settle down."

"Yeah, Burlington has more bars than some Vermont towns have houses," was how another observer put it.

There is also a feeling that Burlingtonians live too comfortably — and that's not what Vermont is supposed to be about. Jobs pay better in Burlington, and creature comforts are in heavy demand here. Vermont ranks 42nd in the nation in per capita income, and the Bureau of the Census defines Vermont as the most rural state in the Union. What these two figures mean is that there is a lot of poverty not so hidden in those luscious green hills and under six months of white winter. And there's plenty of resentment toward the increasingly modern atmosphere of Burlington.

"Whenever I travel in Vermont and I'm asked where I'm from, I say Burlington" and quickly add, "I was born there," said woodchuck Wally Gunther. The hinterlands have a perception of Burlington as a community of non-Vermonters who moved in to outdo their old neighbors back in Connecticut, New Jersey, and New York.

"It's the 'traditional rural distrust of anything urban. Cities are traditionally seen as hotbeds of sin and corruption," a professor lectured to me.

Housewife Irma Maitland of Montgomery in Franklin County complained that "too many of my friends go on shopping binges in Burlington just to show each other up. Then I have to drive there and buy something just to keep pace. And I can never find a parking place."

"I go there only when I have to," said Bill George, a farmer from Hyde Park, on a "foraging expedition." "And I get out as fast as I can. Too many people, too much traffic, and too much gol durn noise!"

According to certain citizens of Williston and other outlying towns, Burlington is progressing at their expense. Burlington played an instrumental role in blocking the 82-store Pyramid Mall in Williston and based its argument on "what's good for Williston isn't good for Burlington." At stake was Burlington's shopping area supremacy, and the city spent close to $250,000 to protect its vulnerable though modestly successful downtown merchants from the threat of overwhelming Pyramid competition.

"We never think of Burlington," says Karen Shehadi of Pawlet. "We figure that if we ignore it, maybe it will go away."

After reading Vermont Life's recent expose on Burlington, a friend lamented, "I wish they would tell it like it is: more tourists come to Burlington than do Vermonters. And Burlingtonians don't speak with the right New England accent, and they talk too fast."

"It isn't the real Vermont. I haven't seen a horse and buggy here in years," shrugged one old-timer. "But it's still a good place to live."

Rescue Keeps Proving Itself

UVM's Rescue Squad is noted as one of the finest in the country. Not bad for an organization that four years ago could barely receive funding.

By Valerie Vier

July 31, 1978:

9:54 – Burlington dispatcher receives notification of a plane down on Williston Road and dispatches the fire department ambulance to the scene.

9:56 – State Director of Emergency Medical Services Earl Gettinger arrives on the scene and reports a plane down on airport grounds and then reports four critical patients.

9:56 – UVM dispatched along with St. Mikes and Essex

9:59 – UVM on the scene.

10:07 – Burlington Fire Dept. leaves with first critical patient.

10:10 – UVM leaves with second critical patient followed by the other two ambulances with other two patients.

******

Three minutes, a respectable mean response time, actually one of the best in the state. This rapid response time combined with the high quality of care that patients receive from UVM rescue and others has established the immediate Burlington area as one of the best locations in the nation for those in need of emergency medical care.

Few people realize that UVM Rescue is a strictly volunteer student service, and one that continues service when the rest of the students leave for vacations. Their job is a 24-hour unpaid one. Any UVM student, faculty, or staff member within a five-mile radius in need of emergency medical care is the primary responsibility of Rescue, but their services are also extended as a back-up unit for the other ambulances in the district. Since about half of the 700 calls dispatched annually are off-campus, each squad of four or five student volunteers might respond to anything from emergency infant delivery to the scene of a suicide.

Five years ago, before the formation of Rescue, there was no such totally student initiated and organized emergency service in the country. UVM's squad was the first, the ball of fire behind it being an underclassman named John Schmidt.

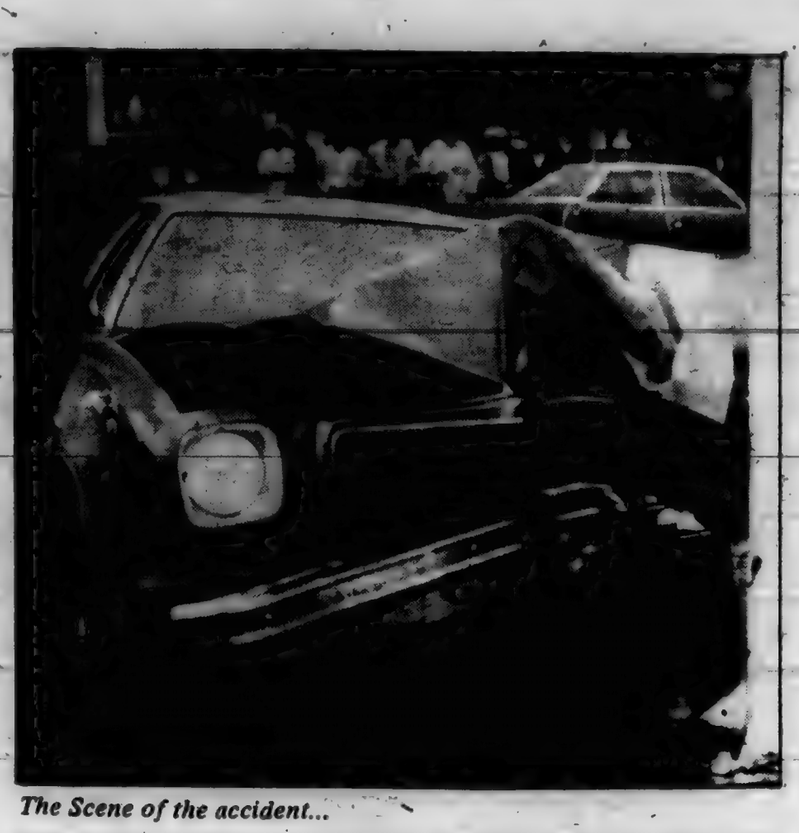
After its funding was approved, a small additional charge was added onto each student's health fee for a total of three semesters to pay for the first ambulance. In those days Rescue was operating out of a station behind the UVM barn. Since that time, the infirmary has been expanded to house the ambulance as well as provide sleeping quarters and a dispatchers room for the volunteers. Recently, a study room was even set aside for them upstairs.

This year, through $6,500 received mostly from federal funds given to them by the district and money donated to Rescue by a faculty-staff drive, they have purchased a new ambulance. "Actually it is the same box off the old rig transferred onto a new chassie," admits Shaun Leech, assistant director of public relations. "We saved a lot of money by not having to replace the box, and instead modified its interior to make it more workable."

Residing as a faculty adviser over this student organization composed of 31 volunteers is Dr. Richard Amidon, director of UVM Health Services. He has accompanied them on demonstrations given from New Hampshire to Denver at various college health association conventions. A constant source of support to Rescue from its beginning, he speaks of it proudly. "They have provided a tremendous service to the entire Burlington community. Their activities are multitudinous." He is referring to the fact that Rescue acts not only as hospital transport but also gives talks, as they did this summer, to the teachers of driver education on emergency first-aid for accident scenes. "I would hate to imagine what it would cost the university to produce a viable substitute for their service," Dr. Amidon continues.

Despite such high praises and the vital service it donates to the UVM community, Rescue's continuation was threatened about four years ago by S.A. The Finance Committee denied the normal budget request that Rescue applied for. The S.A. felt Rescue served a great population outside of UVM that was not sharing in its fiscal responsibilities. The majority of the student body felt this was an outrage, believing this club to be certainly worthy of funding in comparison to other S.A. financially assisted clubs. Many felt it was undoubtedly a better use of their money. "This resulted in the largest S.A. general assembly in recent history, at which students overwhelmingly voted for support of Rescue against the recommendation of the S.A. Finance Committee," says Bob Gale, who has been a member of Rescue for over three years. This overruling of the Finance Committee by the student population demonstrated their appreciation of Rescue as a rare and valuable opportunity for students to organize and maintain this ambulance service.

Consequently, Rescue has continued to receive $500 annually from S.A. funds to the cost of its maintenance, with whatever federal and state funds it receives coming to it through Vt. District No. 3. Rescue receives free gas and oxygen from the Burlington fire department in return for their back-up services. The fire department still collects the standard ambulance service charge even on the calls UVM answers.



The volunteers of Rescue, aside from having to meet a set of preliminary qualifications, are involved in an ongoing training program. A new member usually begins his services by being a dispatcher, then works his way up to being a medic, and may ultimately enroll in an Emergency Medical Technology course. The EMT program in this area is rated very high, and presently there is one EMT on every UVM Rescue shift. Strict qualifications are imperative since Rescue must be ready for any situation. For example, this summer Rescue was dispatched along with the Burlington Fire Department to the site of a construction accident on Spear St. After the brakes apparently failed on a forklifter, it plunged into a 15 foot ditch, spilling 2 construction workers along with it. As Bob Gale described the scene, one man was pinned between the wall of the pit and the "dozer" while the other lay directly underneath the suspended vehicle. With the combined efforts of BFD, the ambulance district, and the utilization of some of their extrication equipment, the forklifter was secured while the man on the bottom of the pit was freed first, and then the other.

"They must be ready to handle calls as serious as the extrication of a passenger from a burning plane."

Not all the calls Rescue is dispatched to are quite so serious. Recently they responded to a call of an "unknown problem" in Burlington. When they arrived at the scene the squad was led to a 3rd floor backroom apartment. There, sitting at a sewing machine, was a woman with the needle completely through her finger. Since the needle was bent in such a way, it could not be removed from the machine. With the use of two surgical clamps, the needle was cut from the machine, and the woman transported to the hospital.

Rescue treats a lot of broken bones and car accident victims, though in the summer it is likely

Down In Jungleland

In the midst of frenzy and love for my rock and roll idol I agreed to camp outside of Patrick Gym in order to get good tickets for Bruce Springsteen's arrival to Burlington. I was inspired by pure dedication.

About midnight Thursday, my two companions and I set out. The rain had ended, the sky was clear, and the night was crisp. We arrived to what appeared to be a gathering of migrant workers and established our domain complete with lantern, burner and drugs: an American ideal. We found ourselves between solitary sleeping bags, a group of people huddled in lawn chairs, wandering canines and various ramshackle habitations. The general atmosphere was jovial. Most everyone was numb from the cold and illicit goods. Many had been waiting since early afternoon.

Though Springsteen was our motivating factor, the sociological phenomenon we were involved in took precedence. I'd always heard and read about Banatical Stones freaks sleeping outside of Madison Square Garden but never really could identify with them — I had made the leap. Patrick Gym isn't the Garden, but the phenomenon remains.

After surveying the situation and doing some compulsory socializing, we bundled our bodies and tried to sleep. Activity around us began to settle down — I'm not sure if it was because we were all played or frozen, but the nudging dogs and feet stepping on our tent ceased.

The next thing I remember is being very sorry that I woke up because the world outside my polyester sleeping bag and my two sleeping pals was not as lovely as inside. However, I ventured forth at about 6:30 a.m. to find a magnificant sunrise and, to my dismay, many people lined up ahead of us. Most of the tents had been taken down and the real waiting commenced.

Those of us who had endured the night proudly maintained the fact and thus justified our subversing movement toward the front of the line ahead of the recent arrivals.

However, the greatest strength of our fortuity was yet to come.

We were a docile group until about 8:30 a.m. when the tension began to mount and we became a crowd. As the minutes ticked toward 9:00, the more it began to feel like the subway at rush hour. In the daylight I could see remnants of primitive existence: beer bottles, dunkin' donut boxes, a lot of sheeted plastic, old Cynics, and a pair of Bean boots.

Some fortuitous soul began to play live Springsteen real loud to rile us and direct our focus on our true mission: to get good fucking seats!

In such close proximity, relationships invariably develop. There was mention of midterms and missed classes, but they weren't matters of great concern. Snatches of Springsteen anecdotes filtered through the air: "I've seen him five times... His best show was at the roxy, though." "Well, I hung outside his garage when he was just gettin' into it," "Well, I'm from N.J. and used to see him in the clubs in Asbury."

The countdown continued: four more minutes! Excitement surged. As the last seconds neared, the adreniline began to flow. 10... 9... 7... 6... I don't know where we expected to go when it hit 9:00; it wasn't as if a space ship was going to take off. I suppose somehow we expected the doors to magically open and we would surge forward en masse... 5... 4... 3... 2... 1...0 wild cheers... and nothing happened. The doors didn't open.

The sadists inside did not respond. The natives began to get restless and all sorts of analogies came to mind. Despite the fact that we were all hyped up with no place to go, the crowd moved forward.

The collective hypothalamus began to send instincts to the brain and the mob instinct was aroused.

"1-2-3-4 open up the fucking door!" Still no response and still forward momentum.

Finally, after what seemed like an eternity, 9:10 a.m., the doors opened. Those not alert before were then. Anticipation moves "the crowd" forward. Nothing can be done.

We were about 125th in line (I counted), the drugs were beginning to take effect, so the fact that I was being thrust against the fence barricade didn't bother me... what did bother me was the fact that the fence began to break leaving me no choice but to fall gracefully.

As we got closer to the door breathing became more difficult and pleasant social intercourse became a barrage of moans and complaints.

Reaching the door was not the utopia I had imagined since my face was compressed against it and my arms were forcibly pinned to my sides. I had no choice but to push and be insane like everyone else. Nothing could be done — treaties, pleas, curses and screams proved ineffectual. It was too late to stop now.

Finally, pulling myself to the opening and stumbling in, I found relief and open spaces that were almost too liberating to handle. The seats I bought from the most cordial ticket agents were not spectacular and certainly didn't compensate for the madness. But my optimistic nature assured me of one thing: Bruce loves his fans and Saturday November 4th, 8 p.m., this will be a memory and my idol, as always, will prove it all night.

SYSTEM $379

Our stereo systems have become known for the high quality and value that they present. It's taken over 12 months to find just the right products to achieve such a fine system, priced under $400, and yet worthy of your ears. System $379 will bring years of high fidelity performance to you, with the same high standards of performance that you might have paid twice as much for several years ago. In this sense, System $379 is truely a value breakthrough.

System $379 consists of the new Technics SA80 receiver, it features a powerful 30 watt RMS output, and an FM tuner that is as sensitive as many receivers costing more. And it has many of the same high performance characteristics that are found in even the most expensive Technics receivers, such as: flat group delay IF, phase-lock-loop FM, 90dB phono S/N radio.

We've coupled this first class receiver to the Fisher MS 135 passive radiator speaker system. These very efficient speakers will surprise even the most critical ear, for their high clarity and accurate base handling response are very good. When you listen to System $379, you'll agree that these speakers are far from ordinary.

Last, but not least, we've included the BSR2260 automatic turntable. It comes equipped with the QLM 30 MDIII stereo cartridge. The BSR2260 is a very reliable performer. It features cue control as well as auto eject at the end of a record. It can also be operated manual as many audiophiles prefer.

Upon credit approval System $379 may be purchased for as little as $37 down with $17.10 a month for 24 months (A.P.R. 18.11%)

Richard Medley, a new addition to the political science department, wants a new Left and students that think

By Bruce Veilmetti

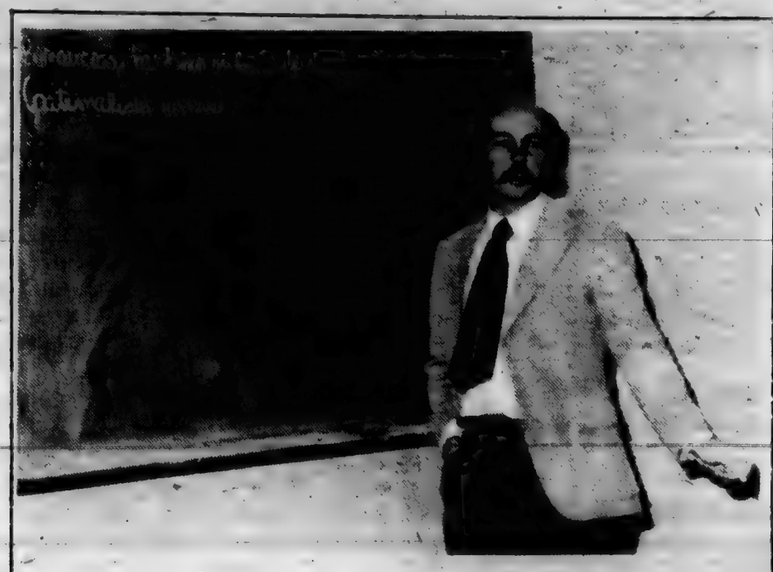
It's not quite Yale, but since arriving this year, Prof. Richard Medley has found UVM much enough to his liking. Medley joined UVM's political science department this summer, replacing Prof. David Rosenbloom, who is on a one-year leave of absence at Syracuse.

Medley's intellectual, cynical, and Lampoonish lectures provide for some well-attended classes. In discussing the extreme rational actor working to maximize his utility, Medley illustrated an example with himself. "If I'm after the most gain for the least work, I could go out at night slitting rich old ladies' throats and taking their money." Then he drew a utility curve chart to illustrate the benefits of such actions.

"But what about the old ladies whose throats you're slitting?" someone asked.

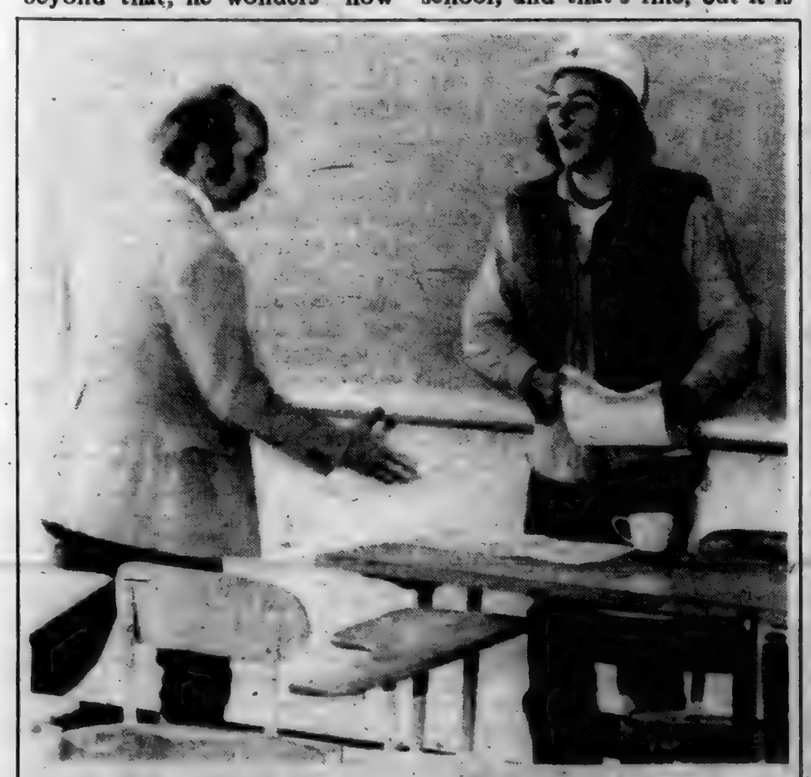
"Hell," replied Medley, "they're dead. Their utility curve goes —" and he drew a curve that bottoms out below the chart, right off the blackboard. A girl in front, finding little humour in dead old ladies and even less in the explanatory charts, asked "Why are you so concerned with curves?"

"I love 'em!" flashed Medley, with a quick turn and maniacal glint. "I grew up watching Miss America contests!" Score another chuckle for the class and a blush for the confused girl in the front.



In comparing UVM's undergraduate political science program to Yale's, Medley said, "In a lot of ways it's much better." He points out that because UVM has no graduate department in political science, the professors teach the undergrad classes. "At Yale, most of the student contact was with teaching assistants." But beyond that, he wonders "how much the quality of a particular department really matters at the undergraduate level." He thinks that what is really important to a student who wants to work hard is for that student to find one or two professors who are willing to work with him and, he added, "You could find that here pretty easily." Medley, even while sitting among the Yale memorabilia in his office, admits there's really no big advantage to graduating from Yale undergraduate school. Nonetheless, he thinks that a UVM student applying to certain graduate and law schools might need higher grades to be competitive.

"There is a difference," said Medley in referral to general student outlook and character at Yale and UVM. "A lot of people who went to Yale were very serious about going to school." But he noted, "There are a lot of people here who are in school for reasons other than being in school, and that's fine, but it is different." Medley doesn't see any essential differences in ability between Yale and UVM students; he has only noticed a difference in degree of motivation. He's quick to defend himself and his alma mater's students against criticism that they are all study, no fun. Medley assures that he did "some awfully mean partying" at Yale. "I mean down all the time!" he added. Medley said he hasn't noticed the proliferation of very expensive drugs around here that he saw at Yale, and that he has noticed the immense popularity and abundance of beer in Burlington. "And that's nice," he said. When he's not enjoying a brew at the Chickenbone, Medley likes to check out the other local fun. "I went to a keg party the first day I got here and had a really good time."



Medley's lectures often become philosophically bent. In one class he brought up a condition he calls "free floating anxiety," that he sees afflicting lots of students and young people who live seemingly hassle free lives. According to him, it's when you sit up at night or your mind just halts during the day, and you get the feeling something's missing, or wrong, or that you're just not doing what's right with your life. Medley offers, "Maybe it's just the old Christian routine, you know, if things are going too well, you start feeling like you're going to get fucked pretty soon."

Medley summarizes causes for free-floating anxiety in another way with the thought, "Nothing to cope with makes it impossible to cope." He foresees epidemic proportions of free-floating anxiety in Sweden, as the socialist government takes care of more and more of the citizens' worries and responsibilities. He sees places like Marin County, California, with its laid-back lifestyle, as another real hot bed of this phenomenon. From talking to friends who have lived there, Medley judges that the predominant character and atmosphere of California lack a drive and impetus that he senses more readily in the east. "Out there," he said, "everyone's into mellow." Medley said he can't get too mellow or he starts suffering from the free-floating anxiety. As he put it, "The way I enjoy things is to work like a sucker, and then just lay back." But just as he fears over-mellowing, Medley fears over-intensity. He sees people who work too constantly, too diligently, losing their creativity.

Although his students describe him as "really radical," "a would-be radical," and "too much for this department," Medley's comments on some recent visitors to the UVM area reveal a more subdued and unique political orientation.

"Doesn't he wear polyester now?" asked Medley about recent UVM speaker Jerry Rubin. With a hint of disgust, Medley commented that the Left in America has sold out to images, and the likes of People magazine. "Everyone wants to be a celebrity," he said. Medley maintains that the Right still holds a big advantage in America, because their leaders have some style: "You pit Jerry Rubin against... Buckley or someone, and it's just wipe-out time." Medley thinks it unfortunate that the people who tend to be spokesmen for any left-leaning principles in America fail to stick to those principles and turn out to be "obvious hypocrites" like Rubin. But on second thought he adds the equalizer, "Maybe it's easier to stick to your principles when they're basically 'look out for number one' than when they're 'look out for everybody'."

"The way I enjoy things is to work like a sucker, and then just lay back."

As Kristina Berster's defense draws more attention, Medley simply adds it to his list of causes that have gone celebrity. With all the other deserving cases in our judicial system, "people are getting screwed day in and day out," Medley thinks it's too bad that so much attention and concern should focus on Kristina Berster and her "jet-set lawyer," William Kunstler. He credits Kunstler with the same sort of fraud he sees in Jerry Rubin. "You get in on the Berster case, you get your leftist rocks off, and walk away with the glory," said Medley. Meanwhile, the unknown common man, and supposed beneficiary of the leftist cause, lives in jail for "stealing $12 from a church," a victim of the system's habitual criminal phenomenon.

In regard to his own current political status, Medley doesn't like to try and classify it within existing descriptions. He hopes, in future writing, to reveal a "new" left, a generation of political theory that would improve upon the radical left of the Rubin stage. He foresees this new theory having "communalist, not communist" overtones, hopefully using the government for "what it does best: collecting and disseminating funds and information." But the reach and role of government would end there; regulations would be cut back, because, as he puts it, "regulations are fucking killing us."

Because he enjoys writing and looks forward to it as a major component of his academic future, Medley doesn't mind the "publish or perish" code that professors have to work under. Right now he is working on a textbook, an introduction to political science, which will be published by 1980. Another book, on private property rights, is nearly finished and should be published in early 1979. In addition to these works, Medley writes fiction, mostly short humorous pieces and satire.

However, other pressures that professors must face bother Medley. For instance, administrative worries about grade inflation. He hears a lot of talk about raising standards of grading, but no mention of raising standards of teaching. He exercises a rather liberal grading policy in his own courses, and refuses to believe that this practice in any way "cheapens the educational process." Whether a student gets an A, a C, or an F matters little in his view. "Grades are beside the point," he maintained. He tries to relieve the pressure on his students by explaining his typical allocation of grades (mostly As and Bs) early in the course: "You'll get a C if someone took an ice pick to your frontal lobe right before the final exam."

Medley harbors certain long-range goals in teaching. He's interested in exchanging "information" with students, but he uses the word to refer to grand information, to concepts and overviews of theories and processes, not to details. He wants to get students to think, and to teach different ways of thinking. "Think, think, think, think, think, think!" Medley agrees that you can't teach creativity, but believes you can certainly harm it, especially by giving multiple choice tests. He claims that he can't even "think up multiple choice questions" and that his "tests are not like tests that normally occur."

Recently turned 27, Medley will receive his PhD in Political Economy from Yale this spring. During previous years in New Haven, he earned B.A.'s in economics and political science, and Master's degrees in political science and philosophy. Prof. Medley presently teaches an introductory American Politics class and an upper level course on the National Executive. Next semester he will teach a two-section introduction to political theory, dealing with both political economy and morality. His upper level offerings will include courses on the philosophy of social science and on the public regulation of private morality, that he wants to call "Sex and the Single Bureaucrat."

cords, comb-like structures, and "pseudo-scallop" shells, all of which were used to make indentations into the clay while still wet. The later pottery is more intensely designed, explains Peterson, and has a round bottom as opposed to the square bottom noted in earlier ceramic works. "Some of the pottery," he said, "is clearly related to Canadian pottery noted around 100-200 A.D.

Arrowheads (also known as "projectile points") were also found, although as Peterson explained, their style didn't change as much or as quickly as the pottery. Nonetheless, they are equally intriguing because apparently not all of them came from Vermont. Some of the stone used in these arrowheads, said Peterson, had origins in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, or Canada. This indicates that the Indians being studies were either travelers or traders, probably traders.

A lone copper bead has also been discovered, which can be traced, claimed Peterson, to the Lake Superior region in Minnesota.

It is quite possible that a similar excavation project will be necessary at the Winooski site, if and when the Burlington Electric Department begins its planned construction along the intervale. And if a mere carpet factory can turn up Indian arrowheads and pottery, an electric generating station ought to be worth at least a Wooly Mammoth or two.

they may handle victims of diving or water skiing accidents as well. Again, however, they must be ready to handle calls as serious as the extrication of a passenger in a burning plane. The basic three requirements to join as a volunteer are: (1) to be a UVM full- or part-time student; (2) to have taken American Red Cross Advanced First Aid Course; (3) to have cardio pulminary-respiration training. There is a minimum of five hours a week time commitment between 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m.. Rescue volunteers are right now putting in between 10-15 daytime hours, as well as one night (6:00 – 7:30 a.m.) a week, and one full weekend on duty a month. With a policy initiated this fall, volunteers who qualify for work-study can now receive credit for their night hours.

Not only do all of the 31 volunteers carry the full or partial work load of being a student, but some have even simultaneously held such positions as the Chairperson for the District Training Committee, as does Betty Glen or Dan Manz who graduated this past spring but was also the Head of the District Logistics Committee.

Rescue would like to expand its staff by about ten people and hopefully keep enrolling their members into the EMT course. There are some minor problems that a Rescue volunteer might experience, however. For example, the students must pay for their own uniforms as well as buy some of their own food while fulfilling their vacation hours obligation on the squad. To those who sacrifice two weeks of their summer job salary, the cost of transportation back to UVM might pose another problem. And lastly, although their expanded quarters at the infirmary are impressive, the furnishings have undergone a great deal of wear and are now either in need of repair or replacement.

However, with continued S.A. funding and assistance from the District and the infirmary, the UVM Rescue Squad hopes to continue extending the same high caliber service that they have provided in the past.

THE PRECISION HAIRCUT EXPLAINED, PRECISELY.

Because your head is unique, the way your hair grows is equally unique.

Precision haircutting is a technique for cutting the hair in harmony with the way it grows. Your hair eventually grows out but it doesn't lose its shape. So your haircut will look as good after five days as it does after five minutes. And because the hair falls naturally into place you won't have to fuss with it. Usually a shake of the head does it.

At Command Performance we shampoo, precision cut and blow dry your hair for twelve dollars. No appointments are necessary.

We also offer permanent waves, coloring, frosting and conditioning. But we really shine with precision. And so will you.

Vitamin C And The RDA

Recommended Daily Allowance or Ridiculous, Dangerous, and Arbitrary?

By Barry Gustin

All of us have heard so much about Vitamin C and the common cold. Is vitamin C effective in preventing or treating the common cold? Some say yes, some say no – the issue has not been resolved. Most of the studies refuting vitamin C's benefit have experimented with levels under one gram (1000 mg) per day. Vitamin C advocates feel that benefit ensures only when much larger dosages are administered.

It is scientific fact that vitamin C has anti-histamine properties (Subramanian, Biochen. Pharm. 22: 1671, 1973). It is also known that vitamin C plays a significant role in the body's ability to resist infection (Williams R.J. Proc. Nat. Acad. Sci. 57: 1638, 1967). Yet the level of intake at which vitamin C elicits maximum activity is hotly debated. Adding perplexity to the issue is the fact that no two bodies are alike. The body's requirement for vitamin C will vary from person to person.

The concept of individuality is applicable to all aspects of the living organism. There is anatomical variation, biochemical variation, nutritional variation, and so on. In normal humans, blood levels of vitamin C vary widely from 0.02 to 3.1% mg and the requirement for tissue saturation ranges at least from 0.6 mg or less per kilogram of body weight up to 2.85 mg per kilogram (Merrow S.B. J. Nutr. 46:445, 1952).

Several experiments have conclusively demonstrated a wide spread between the amount of Vitamin C needed to prevent scurvy and that required for the maintenance of best health. In young growing guinea pigs, about 0.2 mg per kilogram of body weight per day will protect against scurvy symptoms, but there are distinct gains in health when the intakes are up to 250 times this amount (Yew M.L. Proc, Nat. Acad. Sci. 70:969, 1973). In humans, this has not been studied. It should be emphasized that scurvy is the immediate most devastating effect of Vitamin C deficiency. It is characterized by weakness, anemia and spongy gums. Short of this, however, are marginal deficiencies which tend to show their effects over a long period of time. Latent vitamin C deficiencies as they relate to atherosclerosis, cancer, thrombosis (clotting of the blood), and gallstones are examples of this.

An intriguing evolutionary argument has been raised by G.H. Bourne (Brit. J. Nutr. 46:445, 1949) and the two-time Nobel Prize winner Linus Pauling (Proc, Nat. Acad. Sci. 67:1643, 1970). They have noted that only a few animals do not have the capacity to synthesize vitamin C within their bodies. These animals include guinea pigs, some birds, non-human primates, and man. I.B. Chattergee of the University College of Science in India has estimated that some 350 million years ago, the ability to synthesize this vitamin arose in amphibians, but that a gene mutation about 25 million years ago, in a common ancestor of man and other primates, led to a loss of the enzyme which converts glucose to vitamin C. He goes on to say that the loss of this pathway was advantageous in that it freed glucose for energy use by the body. This mutation was not lethal only because a substantial amount of the vitamin was present in the vegetation they fed on. It was sufficient to prevent overt disease (Scrimshaw N.S. Scientific American 235:51, 1976). This, however, may have relegated man to a life of suboptimal nutrition based on the amounts of vitamin C found normally in food. Adequate vitamin C consumption was dependent upon warmth of climate, geographical location, the time of year, and the prevalence of food containing significant amounts of the substance. Thus, vitamin C wasn't always easily procurable. This evolutionary handicap has persisted to this very day. We remain unable to synthesize the vitamin within our bodies and do not always choose foods having a high content. Even if we consumed foods high in Vitamin C, this still will not even approach the levels synthesized by man's relatives 25 million years ago. An important question is: Were we able to adapt to this mutation over these millions of years? The answer is probably not.

Getting back to Yew's study with guinea pigs, he found that by measuring certain parameters of health (wound healing, growth rates, and responses to surgical stress) the dietary level of vitamin C required for optimum health was about 250 times greater (5 mg per 100g of body weight) than the amount required to prevent scurvy. Since the amount of vitamin C needed by guinea pigs and humans to prevent scurvy are about the same when figured on a body-weight basis (about 0.2 mg per kg per day), it is reasonable to conclude that human needs may be correspondingly high.

The need of 5 mg of vitamin C per 100g of body weight per day in young guinea pigs for healthful development is equivalent to the need on the part of a developing 30kg youngster for 1500 mg (1.5g) daily, rather than the present recommended daily allowance (RDA) of 40mg. It should be noted that a glass of orange juice provides the RDA yet one would have to drink nearly 40 glasses to procure the amount that corresponds to the level of vitamin C needed for superior health in guinea pigs.

According to Linus Pauling, most animals manufacture about 10 grams of vitamin C per day per 70kg of body weight. Any form of stress such as strong emotions, cold weather, exercise, illness, or air, water, and food pollution increases the rate of production by a factor of four. (Nutr. Today, March/April p. 21, 1978). If this average is extrapolated to the 30 kg youngster, he or she would be expected to consume a little over four grams a day normally and 16 grams a day when under severe stress.

All bases of estimation lead to the conclusion that for young guinea pigs and young humans alike, the needs of vitamin C for healthy development may be much higher than has been accepted. It would appear that young people need vitamin C in the order of one to four grams per day for best health, the actual level being dependent upon the variable requirements of each person as determined by nutritional and biochemical individuality. It is probable that adult needs are comparable especially when stress factors are taken into account. Research on monkeys has tended to corroborate these conclusions since they, too, need much higher levels for best health over what is required to prevent

SILENCE IS DEADLY.

When someone drinks too much and then drives, it's the silence that kills. Your silence.

It kills your friends, your relatives, and people you don't even know. But they're all people you could save.

If you knew what to say, maybe you'd be less quiet. Maybe fewer people would die.

What you should say is, "I'll drive you home." Or, "Let me call a cab." Or, "Sleep on my couch tonight."

Don't hesitate because your friend may have been drinking only beer. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't think that black coffee will make him sober. Black coffee never made anyone sober. Maybe it would keep him awake long enough to have an accident. But that's about all.

The best way to prevent a drunk from becoming a dead drunk is to stop him from driving.

Speak up. Don't let silence be the last sound he hears.

Beyond Act 250

As successful as Act 250 has been in forestalling the Williston Mall proposal, it is not enough. The Act is essentially only a big stick which cowering Vermonters wave to ward off the hungry, crafty, and ceaselessly circling vultures.

It is time for Vermont to take the offensive in the battle for its land and its future. The state needs to go beyond the protectionist and defensive posture that characterizes the Williston Mall struggle. Only by seizing the initiative and dictating what kind of growth is going to take place will Vermont communities be able to stop the cancerous aberrations like the Williston Mall and Burlington's proposed waterfront "condo village."

Vermont is a poor state. Residents need more jobs and communities need a broader tax base. People need a place to live. We cannot depend on out-of-state exploiters to fulfill these needs and decide what development the state will have. Developers think in terms of what is good in Vermont. Residents must force them to consider what is good for Vermont. Communities must establish definitive and directional guidelines now or they will forever be fighting an endless series of Williston Mall proposals.

Vermont communities should adopt Growth Management Plans (GMP) that will set limits on the annual growth rate and define what kinds of development will be socially acceptable. Under a GMP, development proposals would be awarded points according to the town's set of criteria: the number of local jobs/housing they will provide, how much local and state revenue they will produce, how locally-oriented the businesses and proponents are, how they will enhance the character and future of the community, and what resources and how much of them the proposed development will use, as well as the myriad environmental concerns covered by Act 250. Industries and developers would compete for points and the construction permits under the community's specific growth plan.

At present, development proposals ranging from the Burlington Electric Department's $80 million wood chip plant to the Williston Mall are master-minded by Wall Street investment interests. Exorbitant feasability studies are conducted by engineering outfits that have little interest and less concern for such esotericisms as the future of Vermont's way of life.

Vermonters are applauded for their individualism and independence. By not adopting Growth Management Plans, Vermonters are by default forfeiting their individualism and independence: they are reduced to debating the value of somebody else's development plans. Unless Vermont communities seize the initiative now to plan comprehensively for their future, others will do it for them.

Environmental Act 250 has for now prevented Williston from being 'malled' by giant vultures, but there are similar struggles about to take place in Montpelier and Rutland. We cannot fight endless and isolated legal matches. It is time to stop wrestling and start shooting — for our future.

Racism Exists in the United States too

To the Editor:

It deeply saddens me whenever I read or hear about U.S. investments in South Africa. The reason is that it diverts attention to South Africa, and relieves Americans of their guilt about socio-political injustices at home.

It is good that some people have guts enough to say that it is wrong to indirectly or directly support dehumanizing racial practices, but they neglect to see that racism is prevalent in the U.S. also, just in a different form. People generally find it difficult to believe this because it arouses a "moral" dissonance; they do not like to feel that they have a role in something which they consider immoral. I am specifically talking about white Americans; there is an element of racism in almost everything that they do. This can be more clearly seen when we accept the following definition by the National Education Association (1973):

"All white individuals in our society are racists. Even if a white is totally free from all conscious racial prejudices, he remains a racist, for he receives benefits distributed by a white racist society - through its institutions. Our institutional and cultural processes are so arranged as to automatically benefit whites, just because they are white. It is essential for whites to recognize that they receive most of these racist benefits automatically, unconsciously, and unintentionally."

It is hypocritical to attack the socio-political system of South Africa, but ignore our own. Although "racism is the law" in South Africa, racism is a firmly rooted and widespread social standard here in the U.S.

Sincerely,
Michael L. Davis

Yearning To Be Free

To the Editor:

I have become very concerned by what has happened to Kristina Berster, the refugee who came to the United States – specifically to Vermont – for asylum.

First, the press prints a statement released by the FBI calling her "a member of the Baader-Meinhof terrorist gang from Germany." A few days later this statement was retracted by the FBI, but it's too late. Everyone thinks she is a terrorist.

It is right to criticize the intense security measures surrounding her conditions in jail and at the Burlington court house. These security measures came not from the state of Vermont, but from outside persons. Do these higher-uppers think that Ethan Allen and his green mountain boys are going to ride out of our bright autumn hills and rescue Kristina?

I would like to know why Vermont, a refugee for many escapees from Russia and Vietnam, is giving this young freedom fighter from Germany such a hard time.

Kristina has tried to come to Vermont as had millions before her who now, along with native Americans, make up the population of America.

I know that all Vermonters who hear the true story of Kristina's daring escape from Germany will support her petition for asylum in the United States.

When I think of Kristina Berster, I think of the words on the statue of liberty – "...Give me your tired, your poor, your wretched masses yearning to breathe free..."

Meeting the Needs of the Handicapped People

To the Editor:

In regard to the article in the October 12 edition of the Cynic, I feel it did not accurately represent what I had hoped to communicate about the situation of handicapped students at UVM.

Since my arrival to UVM in January 1978, I have been confronted with various architectural and attitudinal barriers most of which have been overcome or alleviated permanently by a group of interested disabled and non-disabled people that work for or with UVM. It is impossible to solve all the problems at once, as each new disabled student has different needs and dilemmas to overcome. I personally have seen great strides for the improvement of UVM to the disabled student in the short time that I have attended here.

I feel that it was unfair to write mostly negatively toward the problems of the university and less of the positive accomplishments that have been developed in the past years.

The majority of the handicapped student's needs have been met through Personal Care Attendents, the Visiting Nurse Association, and Work Study Students. The fact that the student body must be on guard to help me at all times is not necessarily true. To be aware of my needs and not to be "put out" if I ask for help occasionally is all I ask. If you don't want to help, say so, I do understand. I have feelings just like you to know what it is like to be taken advantage of. Please, express your feelings, fears, and questions; I don't bite. If I bark, maybe I am having one of those bad days that anyone can have, just don't give up.

I wrote this letter to say that the disabled students are not the "bad guys" and we do appreciate the university and what is available to us. We've come a long way, but we have a long way to go.

Jimmy at the Bat

By Scott Sartorius

"Well folks, it's the bottom of the ninth, and this is the last chance for the Whiffers to pull it out," says TV announcer Joe Garbagiola.

"Yeah Joe, the Whiffers have had some tough breaks today, including that error by the left fielder, Burp Lance," responds his "color" man Tom Seeder.

"The scenario is all here," Garbagiola jumps in, preparing to go to a commercial. "The Indianapolis Inflationaries are leading the Washington Whiffers three to nothing, in this, the final game of the 1978 World Series. The Series is tied at three games apiece, and with the most dangerous portion of the Whiffers' lineup scheduled to bat, the Inflationaries have got to be ready for anything. We'll be right back after a word from your local sponsor."

(Two minutes pass)

We've got a new pitcher on the mound for the Inflationaries — ace veteran reliever George Eenie-Meeny," Garbagiola says, returning from two minutes of horrendous viewing about Bob & Sons' Garage and Jack Hunter's Howard Bank.

"Since Eenie-Meeny is a right-hander," Seeder interrupts just having been handed a stat sheet, "he'll have a comparatively easier time than a left-hander would. The Whiffers have batted .154 against righties in the bottom of the ninth when they were behind this season, and .176 against lefties in similar situations."

"The first batter for the Whiffers will be Johnny Kenedy. He's only had one single today and walked and grounded out his other two times at bat," says Garbagiola.

"Yeah, Johnny's really been the sparkplug for the Whiffers this season, hitting singles pretty constantly every time he's up at bat. He's a great guy to have lead off your inning," Seeder continues.

Kenedy takes the first three pitches, all balls, and then gets the green light from his third base coach, The "Tipper" O'Neill. Eenie-Meeny delivers a hard, sinking fast-ball headed right for the strike zone and Kenedy connects, driving a hard shot zipping down the third baseline.

Inflationary third baseman Artie Burns makes a diving stop, but has to retreat to the fringe of the outfield grass, and Kenedy beats out the throw over to the first baseman, Willy Miller.

"Wowie, that was a tremendous stop by Burns!" Garbagiola exclaims into the microphone.

"That could have been a double for Johnny if Burns hadn't been able to knock that down," Seeder surmises.

"Coming up to the batter's box is Whiffer catcher, Dicky Nixon. Nixon's been in a slump ever since the play-offs began two weeks ago, and today he's popped out to the catcher and to the shortstop, and he struck out his last time up," says Garbagiola.

"What's more is that Nixon's .189 batting average this season drops to .078 when men are on base. Kenedy's on first and is a threat to steal, but I don't think Whiffer Manager Bob Strauss will take that chance," predicts Seeder.

Nixon steps into the batter's box and is nearly hit by Eenie-Meeny's first pitch. Then he hits a towering fly ball to right field.

"Boy is that one high, Tom," says Garbagiola.

"Yeah, Joe, but it looks like Bucky Ben-Rabie won't have any problem with this one despite the sun," says Seeder.

"That Arab outfield has been really consistent for the Inflationaries all season. Ben-Rabie's been good, but so has center-fielder Ollie Fatah and left-fielder Denny Yemeni," says Garbagiola.

There is now one out, Kenedy is still on first and Jerry Chevy steps up to bat.

"I'd hate to have to pitch against Chevy," Seeder says. "Most of the time he just stands there waiting for a good pitch, and he strikes out a lot, but when he does connect, watch out."

Chevy gets hit on the helmet by Eenie-Meeny's first pitch, and falls to the ground, looking somewhat stunned. He gets up and takes his base, moving Kenedy to second.

"George is getting a little wild out there on the mound, wouldn't you say, Tom?"

"Yeah Joe, but he's still got that fast ball."

Clean-up batter Lyndie Johnson then steps and advances the count to 0-2 before he makes contact with the ball. He hits it in the hole between short and third but third-baseman Burns gloves the ball, and flips it over to the second baseman, Arnie Miller, who tags Chevy, but is unable to turn it into a double play as he bobbles the ball.

Kenedy advances to third, Johnson is on first, there are two outs, and "Peanut" Carter steps up to the plate.

"Boy, Tom, the pressure's really on Carter this time. Kenedy got to first on a good shot, Nixon popped up, and Chevy was hit by a ball and then thrown out on a hard grounder by Johnson."

"Yeah Joe, and Chevy told me before the game 'We've really got to wip the Inflationaries now or never!'"

"All of the Whiffers' hopes are now resting on the Peanut's shoulders, and although he's been in a slump most of the season, he began to bat pretty well in the play-off games against the Camp David Doves. Most writers predict that he would have trouble against Inflationary pitching, though, and he hasn't done too well in the past six games."

"Yeah, Joe, he's only been hitting .234."

Carter is thrown three balls in a row, and then hits five consecutive foul balls – making it a full count.

"Boy Tom, is this exciting! It's the Old-time, ace reliever on the mound pitching against the hot rookie."

Eenie-Meeny gets the signal, checks Johnson at first and Kenedy at third, and prepares to deliver the pitch.

It's a fast ball right down the chute – Carter eyes the pitch, steps into the ball, prepares to swing and whooosh – strikes out.

The game's over. The Series is over. The Washington Whiffers, for the twentieth year in a row, have lost to the Inflationaries.

"Don't worry Tom. There's always next year," concludes Garbagiola.

Behind the Rhetoric of Human Rights

By Eric Kilburn

"Our commitment to human rights must be absolute," said Jimmy Carter to an attentive American public in his inaugural address. We may have been cynical at first, but considering the past, who could blame him? After more than a decade in Vietnam, Watergate and other assorted scandals, something was needed to revitalize the ailing national ego, and the human rights issue worked like a panacea. The news media dutifully carried stories of the President criticizing Soviet repression or meeting with dissidents, and America surged with pride. Here was the long-tarnished badge of Yankee Decency resurrected and applied the ol' spit 'n polish, and we loved it.

Unfortunately, an examination of the U.S. effort in human rights reveals a picture far different from that painted by the White House and national media. The Philadelphia Inquirer reported in July 1977 that, "...a survey of the ten countries generally regarded as the worst human rights violators among nations receiving U.S. assistance shows that aid to five of them is increasing (in 1978)... The U.S. continues to provide military aid to 98 countries of which many (52) are military dictatorships..."

United States military-economic aid packages are far from bargain basement items, and in certain cases may be the crucial factor in stabilizing a foreign government. Thus, to condemn atrocities while simultaneously maintaining or increasing aid to a country effectively negates any real commitment to human rights. A nation is unlikely to alter its oppressive internal policies if it is not penalized for maintaining the existing system.

When one considers the human rights situation in particular countries with regard to U.S. aid policies, clearer cases of hypocrisy surface. For the 1978 fiscal year, the Carter administration requested a 73% military sales credit (free money to buy weapons) increase for Indonesia, even though Amnesty International estimates that 100,000 political prisoners are currently being held there. Since 1965, according to a study done by the University of Indonesia, one million people have been massacred by the regime of General Suharto. In much the same way as the United States initially ignored the German holocaust of 1933-45, we have sidestepped any confrontation with the Indonesian government which might lead to better conditions for the country's people.

Under the pretense of preventing a communist takeover (a dubious excuse employed by many military governments) Phillipine President Ferdinand Marcos declared martial law in 1972, ending nearly thirty years of relative democracy. Marcos dissolved the congress, abolished freedoms of speech, assembly, and travel, and sharply restricted union activities. Recent reports by Amnesty International and the Red Cross on the Phillipines' 50,000 political prisoners found that "torture was used freely and with extreme cruelty, often over long periods."
